The statute in Michigan provides that "every receiver of personal property that shall have been feloniously stolen, knowing the same to have been stolen, may be indicted, convicted, and punished in any county where he received or had such property, in the same manner that receivers of personal property stolen in this state are indicted, convicted, and punished, notwithstanding such theft was committed in any other state or country." Comp. Laws, 1871, § 7607. Under this statute it is held not necessary to allege the place of the theft in order to admit proof that the goods were stolen in Canada. People v. Goldberg, 39 Mich. 545.

But where it is held not to be larceny to bring property stolen in one state into another state, it is held that one who receives such property is not guilty of receiving stolen property. Golden v. State, 2 Ga. App. 440, 58 S. E. 557. The court here said: "The courts of this state could not inflict any punishment against the principal felon for his crime committed beyond her borders; and the same punishment as to the accessory after the fact in this view would be no punishment at all. . . . We think that the law should be otherwise; but, upon a careful review of the authorities in this country and in England, we are sure that 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) county on the charge of buying and receiving stolen horses, which had been stolen in the state of South Dakota, knowing them to have been stolen, and with the intent to defraud the owners. A demurrer was filed to the information, which was overruled by the district court. Pending further proceedings, this application was made upon the ground that the information and warrant upon which the prisoners are held are each void, for the reason that no offense against the laws of the state of Nebraska is charged.

It is contended that since, in this state, under the rule announced in People v. Loughridge, 1 Neb. 11, 93 Am. Dec. 325, it is no crime to bring into the state property stolen in another state, it can be no crime to receive such property; that, since an act which may constitute the crime of larceny in this state may not be a crime in South Dakota, the courts of this state cannot try such question; that offenses against the laws of a sister state cannot be examined into or punished in this state; that since, in order to commit the offense of horse stealing, with which § 117 of the Criminal Code is mainly concerned, the horses must have been stolen in this state, the offenses of bringing stolen property, concealing the thief and concealing the animal, depending thereon and covered by the same section of the Code, cannot be committed if the prop-it is not. Many states, recognizing this rule as existing in the absence of express statute to the contrary, have enacted laws making criminal the receiving of goods stolen in another jurisdiction. Georgia should have such a statute; but until such a law is passed we must enforce the rule as we find it."

And the rule in England is that it is not larceny to bring goods stolen in a foreign country into the Kingdom, and that one receiving them cannot be held guilty of receiving stolen property. R. v. Debruiel, 11 Cox, C. C. 207; R. v. Carr, 15 Cox, C. C. 131. The court in the first case said: "Nor could the prisoner be convicted of receiving, because that crime consisted in the guilty receipt of stolen goods; that is to say, goods stolen according to the law of England, and that law does not recognize a stealing in a foreign country as a crime which it will punish."

It was held in R. & Carr, 15 Cox, C. C. 129, however, that admiralty had jurisdiction where one in England received bonds which had been stolen from a vessel moored in a navigable river at Rotterdam, and a conviction was affirmed.

As to what law governs in determining whether larceny has been committed, in prosecution under statute against bringing stolen property into the state, see note in 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 556.

erty was stolen outside of the state. By Stat. 3 and 4 Wm. & Mary, chap. 9, if a person received stolen property from the thief, knowing the same to have been stolen, and with the intent to assist the thief in depriving the owner of his property, he is an accessory to the larceny. 1 Hale, P. C. 617. Following this statute, in a number of states the offense is deemed to be accessorial in its nature. In Engster v. State, 11 Neb. 542, 10 N. W. 453, it was determined that this offense is a substantive crime in this state, and not accessorial, and that conviction may be had without regard to the person who stole the goods or from whom they were received. This case was followed in Levi v. State, 14 Neb. 1, 14 N. W. 543, and Ream v. State, 52 Neb. 727, 73 N. W. 227. In the latter case it was contended that it was necessary for the state to allege and prove the conviction of the person by whom the property was originally stolen, but the court say: "That such was the rule under the former practice may be conceded, since one guilty of receiving and concealing stolen property is, at common law, treated as an accessory after the fact; but in this state the offense charged is an independent substantive crime, and the conviction of one charged therewith is in no wise dependent upon the prosecution of the original thief." There are two lines of authority upon the question of whether, in the absence of a statute, it is larceny to bring stolen property into another state than that in which the property was stolen. So far as this state is concerned, this question was settled at a very early period in the case of People v. Loughridge, supra, in which it was held that the bringing into this state by the thief of goods stolen in another state is not larceny. This case was followed recently in Van Buren v. State, 65 Neb. 223, 91 N. W. 201, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 430. An interesting presentation of the arguments pro and con and the holdings of the several courts is to be found in 1 Bishop's Criminal Law, 8th ed. §§ 140, 141. In this state, therefore, it is settled that it is not a crime to bring stolen property into the state, and that the offense of receiving stolen property is an independent substantive offense, with no element of an accessorial nature.

The plaintiff contends, and a number of text-book writers upon this branch of the law seem to agree with him (12 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 210; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 8th ed. § 1142; Clark & M. Crimes, § 503), that it is not a crime to receive stolen property in a state other than that in which it was stolen, unless the laws of the state in which the property is received make it a crime to bring stolen property into the state. This is the English rule. R. v. Carr, 15 Cox, C. C. 131; R. v. Debruiel, 11 Cox, C. C. 207. A contrary view is taken by Judge McClain, 1 Criminal Law, § 720, wherein he says: "It has been held in England that if the goods were stolen outside of the Kingdom, there could not be a guilty receiving of them in the Kingdom. In this country it has been held that it is immaterial that the goods were stolen outside of the state, and there is sometimes a statutory provision to that effect. The venue of the offense, if deemed a substantive one, is in the county where the goods are received; but, if it is accessorial in its character by the statute, the venue is where the goods were stolen." See also Beal v. State, 15 Ind. 378; State v. Crawford, 39 S. C. 343, 17 S. E. 799; Licette v. State, 75 Ga. 253; State v. Stimpson, 45 Me. 608. The arguments of the applicant in this case are identical with those used in a case where it has been sought to convict one of larceny when he brings stolen property into a state where there is no statute making such an act an offense against the latter state. There seems to be no doubt that where a statute makes bringing stolen property into the state a substantive crime against that state, such laws are constitutional and may be enforced. People v. Williams, 24 Mich. 161, 9 Am. Rep. 119. The states of Michigan, New York, Illinois, Alabama, and Mississippi have such statutes. In this state it was said by Holcomb, J., in Van Buren v. State, supra: "That the legislature may declare the bringing into this state property stolen in another an offense, and provide suitable punishment therefor, is abundantly supported by the authorities; but this phase of the subject is not before us." While this remark is dictum, still it indicates that the mind of the court does not run counter to the decisions of those states in which such a statute has been enacted and tested.

Under such statutes the first requisite to a conviction is that the property must be identified as belonging to the class of stolen property. It is the bringing of such property into the state that is made a crime. Now it is no more difficult to identify stolen property in the case of a prosecution for receiving the same knowingly and fraudulently, than in a prosecution for bringing such property into the state. The right of the receiving state to punish, and the manner and quantum of proof that the property falls within the prohibited class, must necessarily be the same. If a statute may be enforced which punishes the bringing of stolen property within the borders of the state, it is difficult to see why a statute making the buying or receiving of such stolen property a crime may not also be enforced. The inquiry is the same in both cases. In the one case: Is the property which is brought into the state "stolen property?" In the other: Is the property purchased "stolen property?" We are unable to see any ground for distinction. If the statute makes it a crime to bring stolen property into the state, the bringing into the state is considered as a substantive offense committed against the receiving state. It is not an offense against the laws of the state where the property was stolen, and its prosecution is not, as is argued, an attempt to punish for an infraction of the laws of that state. There is no better or more logical reason for holding that a conviction may be had in the one case than in the other.

The act of the legislature in either case is not obnoxious to the rule that one state will not administer the penal laws of another; for the act denounced is one committed within the state, though the property received its taint outside of its bounds. What the legislature sought to prevent was the trade and commerce in stolen goods in this state. It had the right to make it a crime to receive goods of this character with the intention to defraud the owner, and this is the gist of the offense. It is immaterial that the owner may reside in another state. The prisoners are not charged with the infraction of the laws of South Dakota, but with the infraction of the laws of this state. It may or may not be necessary for the prosecution, in its effort to establish the class to which the goods are alleged to belong, to show that their original taking was in violation of the laws of South Dakota (People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23, 27 Pac. 523; Barclay v. United States, 11 Okla. 503, 69 Pac. 799); but, however this may be, it does not alter the fact that the offense described in the statute is one committed against the laws of this state.

Whatever may be the rule which is applicable in England under the peculiar conditions surrounding that "tight little island," the conditions existing along the northern and western boundaries of this state are such as require a common-sense interpretation of the statute. If we should construe the law as the relator contends, the effect would be to make possible a flourishing industry in receiving stolen horses and cattle in what is known as "the cattle country," in the western portion of this state, and to foster and build up the pernicious practices which the statute is intended to prevent. If the charge in this case is substantiated by the proof, a more striking illustration of the consequences liable to ensue could not well be had. The prisoners are charged with unlawfully buying and receiving thirteen horses and mares with the intent to defraud the respective owners, well knowing all the property to have been stolen in South Dakota. The profit of such a commerce may be large, as this charge indicates.

It seems clear to us that stolen property is stolen property, wherever it may have acquired that distinctive character, and wherever it may be found, and that, where the receiving of it with the intent to defraud the owner is made a substantive crime, the locality of the theft or the personality of the thief is not material. The material questions are, Does it belong to that class of property, the buying of which is condemned by the statute? and was it bought with criminal knowledge and intent? If so, the buying with such knowledge and unlawful intent violates the statute.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the information charges an offense against the laws of this state, and that the prisoners are not unlawfully restrained of their liberty.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NEBRASKA

v.

JAMES HAND et al.

(— Neb. —, 126 N. W. 1002.)

Marriage — evasion of law — validity.

A marriage which is prohibited by statute because contrary to the policy of our laws is yet valid if celebrated elsewhere according to the laws of the place where celebrated, even if the parties are citizens and residents of this state, and have gone abroad for the purpose of evading our laws, there being no legislative enactment that such marriages out of the state shall have no validity here.

Headnote by FAWCETT, J.

Note. — Law governing validity of marriage.

As shown in those notes the general rule in this country, contrary to the rule sustained by the weight of authority in Eng-

EXCEPTIONS by the state to the acquittal and discharge by the District Court for Otoe County of defendants, who were charged with fornication. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. W. Livingston, for the State:

The alleged marriage was absolutely void ab initio, for the reason that the parties were both under a personal incapacity which followed them wherever they went, so long as they remained domiciled in Nebraska.

Mr. John C. Watson, for defendants:

The validity of a marriage is determined by the law of the place where it was celebrated.

land, is that the capacity of the parties to marry, as well as the formal validity of the marriage, is in general to be determined by the law of the place where the marriage is celebrated, rather than by the law of the domicil of the parties. Some cases, however, while conceding this to be the general rule, refuse to recognize the marriage, though valid by the law of the place where it was celebrated, if the parties were domiciled at the forum and went into the other state in order to evade the law of their domicil, upon the ground that it would be contrary to public policy of the forum to recognize such a marriage. The general rule, however, was applied in STATE v. HAND, notwithstanding the facts were such as to have rendered the exception applicable if the court had seen fit to adopt it. The decision is even stronger from the fact which appears from the briefs, that the marriage was challenged on the ground that it violated the miscegenation statute of Nebraska, and the case involved the right of the parties to live together in Nebraska in the marital relation, and not merely the question of property rights. It would seem that no statute on the subject of marriage would be more likely to be regarded as a distinctive part of the public policy of the forum, which the courts would not suffer to be evaded by a marriage between their own citizens celebrated in another state, than a statute forbidding marriage between persons of the white and colored races.

The case of Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, otherwise substantially like STATE v. HAND, both in facts and decision, differed from it in that it apparently involved merely the question of settlement of the parties for the purposes of the poor law, and not, directly at least, their right to live together in the marital relation.

A marriage valid in the country where celebrated will be held valid in other countries where the parties may be domiciled, though it would have been invalid by the law of the subsequent domicil if it had been originally celebrated there.

The facts in Garcia v. Garcia (S. D.) — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 127 N. W. 586, only required a decision that a marriage between cousins, valid by the law of the state where the marriage was celebrated and where the parties were then domiciled, will not be held invalid in South Dakota, although it would have been invalid if celebrated in that state. The decision, however, is referred to the general rule that the law of the place where the marriage is celebrated governs. There is an intimation that the marriage might have been held invalid as contrary to the public policy of the forum, if it had been incestuous according to the generally accepted opinion of Christendom, which relates only to persons in direct line of consanguinity and brothers and sisters, and does not embrace cousins.

As shown in the earlier notes, the English courts, contrary to the general rule recognized in this country, while conceding that the validity of the marriage, so far as it depends upon form or ceremony, depends upon the law of the place where it was celebrated, hold that matrimonial capacity depends upon the law of the domicil, or at least that if, by the law of the domicil of both parties, they are incapable of intermarrying, the marriage must be held invalid, though celebrated in England, by the law of which it would be valid. The English doctrine rests principally on the case of Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 5 Prob. Div. 94, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 814 (which is discussed at page 163 of the note in 57 L.R.A.).

The subject has been recently discussed at length in an opinion in the court of appeal in Ogden v. Ogden [1908] p. 46, and while the court disclaims any intention to overturn the doctrine of the Sottomayer Case, the opinion seems to evince a doubt in the mind of the court as to the soundness of the doctrine, even within the somewhat narrow limits laid down in that case.

Although a person is rendered by the law of the place incapable of contracting a marriage, yet if he enters into a contract of marriage in another state where the same disability does not exist, the marriage is valid.

And the same comment applies in a measure to the still later case of Chetti v. Chetti [1909] p. 67. Both of these cases, however, on their facts, are clearly distinguishable from the Sottomayer Case, or at least from the state of facts which the court of appeal in that case assumed for the purposes of its decision, and which must therefore be regarded as limiting the doctrine of that case.

The question in Ogden v. Ogden was whether the validity of a marriage celebrated in England, between an English woman domiciled in England and a Frenchman temporarily residing in England, was governed by the law of England, according to which it would be valid, or by the law of France, according to which it would be invalid because the parties did not comply with the formalities required by the French law, and the husband did not obtain the consent of his parents as required by that law. It will be observed that upon its facts the case came clearly within the decision in Simonin v. Millac, 2 Swabey & T. 67 (cited at page 172 of the note in 57 L.R.A.), and exactly within the ground on which the latter case was distinguished in the Sottomayer Case, namely, that the matter of consent of the parents went to the ceremony, rather than the capacity of the parties. And upon the authority of the Simonin Case and the distinction made in the Sottomayer Case, the court in the Ogden Case held that the marriage was valid. While not perhaps within the scope of this note, it may be added that the court further held in this case that a decree of nullity of the marriage entered by a French court at the instance of the husband was not binding on the English court, since, unlike a decree for divorce, it did not presuppose the Fawcett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were informed against by the county attorney of Otoe county for the crime of fornication. There was a trial to the court without a jury upon a stipulation of facts. The court found the defendants not guilty, and ordered that they be discharged. Thereupon the county attorney by leave of court, under the provisions of § 483 of the Criminal Code, filed this petition in error in this court, alleging that the finding and judgment of the court below "in acquitting and discharging the said defendants was contrary to law." From the stipulation of facts, it appears that the defend-existence of a marriage, but declared invalid a marriage which was valid according to the law of England, which the court held to be the governing law.

By referring to page 163 of the note in 57 L.R.A., it will be observed that the decision of the court of appeal in the Sottomayer Case was expressly rendered upon the assumption that both parties were domiciled in Portugal, and that when the case subsequently came before the probate division, Hannen, President, contrary to that assumption, found as a fact that the husband was domiciled in England at the time of the marriage and the wife in Portugal, and taking advantage of the liberty allowed by the opinion of the court of appeal in that situation, upheld the marriage as in accordance with the law of England, where it was celebrated, although it would have been invalid by the law of Portugal.

The Chetti Case came exactly within the last decision, except that in this instance it was the woman who was domiciled in England and the man who was domiciled elsewhere. The court, however, held that that difference would not affect the result, and the decision upholding the marriage rested, in part at least, upon the authority of the president of the probate division in the Sottomayer Case, which the court held was justified by the opinion of the court of appeal in that case.

It thus appears that while these recent English cases show a disposition on the part of the English courts to question the foundation of the English doctrine which refers matrimonial capacity to the lex domicilii, at least if both parties have the same domicil, rather than the lex loci celebrationis, that doctrine cannot as yet be regarded as materially impaired in England, since those decisions are clearly reconcilable with it.

ants are within the class prohibited by the laws of this state from entering into the marriage relation; that on November 23, 1892, while both defendants were residents of this state, they went into the state of Iowa to celebrate their marriage, for the express purpose of evading the laws of the state of Nebraska. This is the question for our consideration. After their marriage, they returned to Omaha, and there lived together as husband and wife for a period of three years. They then removed successively to the states of Utah, Idaho, and Oregon, in all of which states they lived and cohabited together and were known among their friends and acquaintances as husband and wife. Thereafter they returned to Nebraska, where they also lived in that relation until the time of their arrest. It is conceded that by the laws of Iowa the marriage of defendants, when consummated there, was lawful in that state. Did the court err in finding them not guilty of the charge preferred against them and in ordering their discharge? We think not. In Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, the man, a mulatto, and the woman, a white woman, were inhabitants and residents of Massachusetts. Desiring to be married, and the law of Massachusetts prohibiting such marriage, they went into the neighboring province of Rhode Island and were there married according to the laws of that province, such a marriage not being then prohibited by the laws thereof. In the syllabus, the court say: "A marriage which is good by the laws of the country where it is entered into is valid in any other country; and although it should appear that the parties went into another state to contract such marriage, with a view to evade the laws of their own country, the marriage in the foreign state will nevertheless be valid in the country where the parties live." In the opinion the court say: "The law now in force in this state not only prohibits the marriage of negroes and mulattoes with white persons, but expressly declares such marriages to be void. But they are only void if contracted within this state, in violation of its laws. If the marriage takes place in a state whose laws allow it, the marriage is certainly good there; and it would produce greater inconveniences than those attempted to be guarded against, if a contract of this solemn nature, valid in a neighboring state, could be dissolved at the will of either of the parties, by stepping over the line of a state which might prohibit such marriages." In Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505, in the syllabus, the court say: "The validity of a marriage contract is to be determined by the law of the state where it was entered into. If valid there, it is to be recognized as such in the courts of this state, unless contrary to the prohibitions of natural law, or the express prohibitions of a statute. While every state can regulate the status of its own citizens, in the absence of express words a legislative intent to contravene the jus gentium, under which the question of the validity of a marriage contract is referred to the lex loci contractus, cannot be inferred. The intent must find clear and unmistakable expression." The court cites Medway v. Needham, supra, and also quotes from Putnam v. Putnam, 8 Pick. 433, the following: "If it shall be found inconvenient or repugnant to sound principle, it may be expected that the legislature will explicitly enact that marriages contracted within another state which if entered into here would be void shall have no force within this commonwealth." Acting on that idea, Massachusetts subsequently enacted a law as follows: "Where persons resident in this state, in order to evade the preceding provisions and with an intention of returning to reside in this state, go into another state or country, and there have their marriage solemnized, and afterward return and reside here, the marriage shall be deemed void in this state." After the passage of that law, the supreme court of Massachusetts in Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509, in an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Gray, on page 464 of 113 Mass. say: "A marriage which is prohibited here by statute because contrary to the policy of our laws is yet valid if celebrated elsewhere according to the law of the place, even if the parties are citizens and residents of this commonwealth, and have gone abroad for the purpose of evading our laws, unless the legislature has clearly enacted that such marriages out of the state shall have no validity here. This has been repeatedly affirmed by well-considered decisions." And this seems to be the overwhelming weight of the better reasoned cases on the subject. 1 Bishop, Marr. Div. § 880; Courtright v. Courtright, 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 413; State v. Shattuck, 69 Vt. 403. 40 L.R.A. 428, 60 Am. St. Rep. 936, 38 Atl. 81; Norman v. Norman, 121 Cal. 620, 42 L.R.A. 343, 66 Am. St. Rep. 74, 54 Pac. 143, quoting from Com. v. Lane, supra; Sturgis v. Sturgis, 51 Or. 10, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1034. 131 Am. St. Rep. 724, 93 Pac. 696.

To hold otherwise would be to render void numberless marriages and to make illegitimate thousands of children the country over. In 1 Bishop on Marriage & Divorce, 882, this thought seems to have been in the mind of the author. He says: "It was formerly common for English parties wishing to intermarry without a compliance with their own marriage acts to go into Scotland, and there interchange the matrimonial consent simply in the presence of witnesses. Gretna Green was the most convenient point for the required hasty visit; and thus Gretna Green marriages became famous, and there was no question of their validity. But Parliament, in 1856, by Stat. 19 & 20 Vict. chap. 96, § 1, put an end to this by declaring that thereafter 'no irregular marriage contracted in Scotland by declaration, acknowledgment, or ceremony shall be valid unless one of the parties had, at the date thereof, his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for twenty-one days next preceding such marriage.' We do not question the power of a state to pass a law similar to that passed by Massachusetts, as hereinbefore set out, but our legislature has not seen fit to do so. On the contrary, § 5316, Cobbey's Anno. Stat. 1907, provides: "All marriages contracted without this state, which would be valid by the laws of the country in which the same were contracted, shall be valid in all courts and places in this state." See Gibson v. Gibson, 24 Neb. 394, 429, 39 N. W. 450; Bailey v. State, 36 Neb. 808, 812, 55 N. W. 241; Hills v. State, 61 Neb. 589, 57 L.R.A. 155, 85 N. W. 836.

While the decisions upon this point are not uniform, and authorities can be found opposed to those above cited, the reasoning of such authorities does not appeal to us as being sound in law or for the good of society. The District Court did not err in its construction of the law, and the exceptions of the state are therefore overruled.

Damages — measure — destruction of shade trees.

Where shade trees are destroyed by the wrongful act of another, and they have no separable and independent value, or when their value is nominal, the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the land before and after they were destroyed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Nelson County

Headnote by CARMODY, J.
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by the negligent destruction by fire of certain shade trees growing thereon. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. J. Murphy and Fred S. Duggan, for appellant:

The value of the trees destroyed as they stood at the time of the fire is the true measure of damages.

Note. — Measure of damages for injury to, or destruction of, trees or shrubbery not valuable for their timber or firewood.

A note to Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 19 L.R.A. 653, and a note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Beeler, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 930, supplementary thereto, contain the earlier cases on the question here discussed.

It was said in the latter note that the difference in value of the realty before and after the injury as a statement of the measure of damages for the injury or destruction of trees applied with peculiar fitness in case of fruit trees, shade trees, and other shrubbery, which apart from the realty have little or no value.

In addition to the many cases cited in the earlier notes in support of that rule, the following recent cases may also be cited therefor: Jordan v. Delaware & A. Teleg. & Teleph. Co. (Del.) 75 Atl. 1014 (cutting of shade trees for purposes of constructing telephone lines); Doty v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. 136 Mo. App. 254, 116 S. W. 873 (peach trees and grapevines destroyed by fire).

It was also pointed out in the note to the Beeler Case that, since there might be a difference of opinion as to whether a certain tract of land is more valuable with an orchard or with shade trees and shrubbery than without them, the measure of damages in a few cases has been held to be the fair

Carmody, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for the destruction of 95 shade trees situated on plaintiff's property, adjacent to the right of way of defendant. Plaintiff and reasonable value of the trees destroyed, and, if the trees were only injured, the difference in their value before and after the injury.

In observing that, practically at least, these two methods will often lead to the same amount of damages, it was pointed out that many cases which hold to the rule that the substantive measure of damages is the difference between the value of the land before and after the destruction of the trees admit evidence as to the value of the trees, to aid the jury in applying that rule.

This rule of evidence was also recognized in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Mosher, 76 Kan. 599, 92 Pac. 554; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Arthurs, 63 Kan. 404, 65 Pac. 651; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Owens, 6 Kan. App. 515, 50 Pac. 962.

That these two methods of measuring the damages will practically lead to the same amount of damages is also illustrated by Alberts v. Husenetter, 77 Neb. 699, 110 N. W. 657, a case arising in a jurisdiction recognizing the measure of damages for the injury of fruit trees and shade trees to be the lessened value of the trees, where it was held that, in an action for damages to growing trees, evidence showing the effect the destruction of the trees had on the value of the land is admissible when the nature of the trees destroyed is such that they have no value except with reference to and as part of the land.

In Diggs v. Wabash R. Co. supra, evidence of the cost of reproducing as good shade maples as those burned was held ad- 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

missible. To the same effect is Muldrow v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 62 Mo. App. 431 (destruction of hedge).

In Doty v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. supra, besides the difference in value of the land before and after the fire, the plaintiff was also held entitled to the difference in the market value of the apples.

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Warnecke, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 83, 95 S. W. 600, where it appeared that fruit trees were destroyed by fire, the court said: "We understand the law to be that the owner of land upon which growing trees have been destroyed by the negligence of another may sue to recover damages for the injury caused his land by the loss of the trees, or may sue for the value of the trees, and under some circumstances both claims for damage might be asserted; but when the injured party sues only to recover the value of the trees, his measure of damage is their value when detached from the soil, and if they have no value when separated from the land, the only cause of action which arises from their destruction is one for damages for injury to the land, the measure of damage in such case being the difference between the value of the land before and after the injury." It was expressly held in this case that when the plaintiff seeks to recover the value of the trees, he cannot recover the value of the trees when attached to the soil, for that would in effect allow him to recover for the injury to his land, for which he has not sued.

owns about 1½ acres of land adjoining the defendant's right of way, and had on this land on October 4, 1906, a consolidated school building, erected at a cost somewhat in excess of $6,000, and 95 to 100 young shade trees. The trees were set out in the spring of 1904, and formed a double row along the westerly side and northerly end of the school ground. They were destroyed by a fire on October 4, 1906, set out and allowed to escape by defendant's section men, who were engaged in burning off defendant's right of way adjacent to plaintiff's property. The evidence shows that at the time of the fire the trees had three seasons' growth, and were in a thrifty, healthy condition. About 100 trees had been set out, a few had been broken down or died, so that the 95 trees destroyed by the fire were practically all the trees on the premises. Plaintiff in the complaint laid its damages at $950. The jury returned a verdict for $573, upon which judgment was entered. A motion for new trial was made and denied, and this appeal is from such order and judgment. On this appeal the controversy turns on the measure of damages to be adopted in such a case, and the admissibility of testimony of value.

This case was tried in the court below by respondent on the theory that the measure of respondent's damages was the difference in value of the school property before and after the fire, and was submitted to the jury on such theory. The court charged the jury as follows: "In determining plaintiff's damages, if any, you will compare the actual value of plaintiff's property just before the fire and before the trees were burned with the actual value of the same property after the fire and after the trees were burned. The difference in value will be the amount that plaintiff is entitled to recover, if anything." This instruction was excepted to by appellant, and is assigned as error. The case was tried in the court below by appellant on the theory that the cost of replacing the trees was the measure of respondent's damages. In this court, however, the rule of damages for which appellant contends is the value of the trees destroyed as they stood appurtenant to and attached to the realty, and contends that the damage could not in any event exceed the difference between the value of the land before and after the fire. The value of the trees as they stood must be limited to the difference between the value of the land entire before and after the fire. Appellant, however, argues with great force and plausibility that the fact that the damages should not exceed the said difference does not mean that such difference is the most accurate or direct test of the loss. It 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

contends that such damages should be exactly the same, no matter by which method they are measured, if they are properly proven and found, and that it is a settled general rule of law that the measure of damages should be adopted which is the most direct and easiest of accurate application, likewise the simplest; that the rule adopted offends against this general principle; that it is indirect in attempting to ascertain the damages by a proposition in subtraction. It is inaccurate in its practical application for the reason that it compels the jury to think in thousands of dollars in values, where the actual damages could not be more than a few hundred dollars. It seems to us that the rule to be adopted in any case depends upon the character and object of the particular action. Some courts hold that the plaintiff has his election to sue either for the value of the thing destroyed or for the injury to the freehold; that is, for the difference in value of the real estate before and after the fire. Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 3 S. D. 531, 19 L.R.A. 653, 54 N. W. 596. In Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra, which was an action to recover damages for burning and destroying trees and shrubbery, the court says: "A party injured as complained of in this action may bring his suit for destroying his trees, and in such action recover the value of such trees, not as a part of the realty, but their intrinsic value as detached and separated therefrom and proved in the usual mode of proving value; or he may bring his action for injury to his real estate, and recover its diminution in value. Each action has its appropriate rule of damages." In the case at bar, the plaintiff having brought its action for injury to the real estate, we think the measure of damages laid down by the trial court is correct.

Although the authorities are not uniform, the true rule is believed to be that, where property attached to realty is destroyed by fire, the plaintiff may, at his election, seek to recover its value in its detached form, or as part of the realty, in which latter event the measure would be the difference in the value of the realty before and after the fire. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 540, and cases cited. The measure of damages for the destruction of fruit, shade, ornamental, or growing trees or shrubbery is the difference between the value of the land before and after they were destroyed. Y. 199, 15 L.R.A. 612, 28 Am. St. Rep. 563, 30 N. E. 398, the court says: "A party may be content to accept the market value of the thing taken, when he is also entitled to recover for the injury done to the freehold. But if he asserts his right to go beyond the value of the thing taken or destroyed, after severance from the freehold, so as to secure compensation for the damage done to his land because of it, then the measure of damages is the difference in value of the land before and after the injury. In this case the plaintiff was not satisfied with a recovery based on the value of the trees destroyed, after separation from the realty of which they formed a part, as indeed he should not have been, as such value was little or nothing, so he sought to obtain the loss occasioned to the land by reason of the destruction of an orchard of fruit-bearing trees which added largely to its productive value. This was his right, but the measure of damages in such a case is, as we have observed, the difference in value of the land before and after the injury." In Rowe v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra, which was an action for damages for the destruction of an orchard by fire, the court says: "The true rule in such cases is that, 'when the property destroyed or injured is so closely connected with the real estate on which it stands or to which it is attached that it has no value separate and independent of the real estate, or the injury is to the soil itself, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the real estate before the injury and after it.'" In this case the court instructed the jury "that, as to the orchard, the measure of plaintiff's damage would be the 'difference between the fair market value of the plaintiff's farm of 160 acres, upon which said orchard was, not including the grass or fences injured or destroyed, immediately before the fire, and its fair market value immediately after the fire, as injuriously affected by said fire.'" The rule contended for by the defendant was as follows: "The measure of damages in this case is the difference in value of the orchard just before and its value just after the fire as an orchard." The court says: "We think the rule announced in the instruction given by the court is correct, and it is supported by the great weight of authority. It is impossible to separate the orchard from the land in estimating the damages. Appellant's contention results in fixing the value of each tree destroyed or damaged by the fire, and the aggregate of such values would be the measure of plaintiff's recovery. Such a rule may well be held applicable to the destruction by fire of buildings, fences, and other improvements, which may at once be replaced, where the exact cost of restoring the property destroyed is capable of definite ascertainment, and where there is no damage to the realty itself." In support of the rule laid down by the Iowa court it cites 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1239, Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin, New York, Kansas, Texas, Indiana, and 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 36. The rule of damages contended for by appellant in this case is held the correct rule in a few of the states, notably Nebraska, and in an early case in South Dakota. The great weight of authority, however, sustains the measure of damages laid down by the trial court in the case at bar.

None of the assignments of error by the appellant, as to the admission or exclusion of testimony, are well taken. The testimony shows that the growing trees had a nominal value as trees for timber, separate from the ground on which they grew. The testimony offered by the defendant, as stated by its attorney, was the following: "Mr. Duggan: The defendant at this time offers to prove by this witness that the trees such as were upon the Cleveland school district property at the time of the fire have and had then an actual market value, which market value was between $15 and $20 per hundred. Furthermore, that such trees are customarily carried in stock by dealers and transplanted, and that such dealers sell, transplant, and care for such trees, and that it is a known fact among nurserymen that 90 per cent of such trees live, grow, and thrive in this climate and locality, and that all the trees such as were upon the Cleveland school district at the time of this fire, or as many of similar trees, can be planted upon that school district, guaranteed to grow, replaced if they do not grow, and such a number according to all the known experience of nurserymen, all at a cost less than $150; that such trees—that is, box elders—of the age, size, height, and quality of trees that were upon this school district, have an actual market value.” Under the rule of damages as laid down by the court this testimony was inadmissible. It did not tend in any way to prove or disprove the plaintiff’s damages. See cases hereinbefore cited, as sustaining the measure of damages laid down by the learned trial court.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

UNITED POWER COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
MATHENY.

(81 Ohio St. 204, 90 N. E. 154.)

Evidence — res gestæ — ejection from car — complaints of passengers.

1. Where, in an action to recover damages for unlawfully and forcibly ejecting the plaintiff from a street car, evidence was offered by the defendant tending to show that passengers had left the car on account of the conduct of the plaintiff and his companions, and in doing so complained to the conductor or within his hearing in regard to such conduct, such evidence was competent as part of the res gestæ and as tending to explain the motive of the conductor, and it was error for the court to instruct the jury to disregard the same unless they should find that what was said by the passengers to the conductor or in his hearing was in the hearing of the plaintiff, or so that he could have heard it.

Damages — ejection from car — counsel fees.

2. In such case it was error for the court to charge the jury that if they found that the ejection of the plaintiff was not justified, but was without malice or insult, they could award compensatory damages only, and as part thereof they might allow plaintiff a reasonable sum for the services of counsel in his behalf.

(November 30, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cumbiana County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff’s favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection of plaintiff from defendant’s street car. Reversed.

Statement by Davis, J.:

The defendant in error sued the plaintiff in error to recover damages for an alleged unlawful, wrongful, and forcible expulsion from a street car belonging to and operated by the plaintiff in error. The plaintiff in error in its answer denied all the allegations contained in the petition, except that it was a corporation and engaged as a common carrier of passengers, and that the plaintiff was ejected from a car belonging to said company; and it alleged as follows: “The defendant says that the plaintiff was so ejected from said car for being disorderly and for using profane language in said car; that plaintiff was requested and warned by the employees of defendant in charge of said

Note. — Counsel fees and other expenses of bringing suit as part of compensatory damages recoverable in an action for tort.

It will be noted that the court, in UNITED POWER CO. v. MATHENY, recognized that in actions for damages for tort where punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable, the jury may include a reasonable counsel fee as part of the damages, and the sole question at issue was, conceding that counsel fees are recoverable as part of the damages when the tort is of such a nature as to call for punitive or exemplary damages, May counsel fees also be recovered when the tort is of such a nature that only compensatory damages can be recovered?

This note is limited to cases similar to the MATHENY CASE, and is intended only to determine whether the courts in those jurisdictions where counsel fees and other expenses of bringing suit, over and above the taxable costs, are held recoverable as part of the damages in a case where the tort is of such a nature as to call for punitive or exemplary damages, will also permit the recovery of such fees and expenses when the tort is of such a nature that only compensatory damages are allowed.

Bearing in mind the limited scope of the question under annotation it will be readily perceived that cases which, although concerning the recovery of compensatory damages, arise in jurisdictions which do not permit recovery of such items even when punitive or exemplary damages are allowed, are of no practical value in this note; for if it be conceded or held that even in case of gross fraud, malice, or insult, counsel fees are not recoverable as damages, a fortiori the courts would hold that counsel fees are not recoverable as part of the damages in the absence of malice or insult which would sustain a recovery of punitive or exemplary damages. Of very little more value are those cases which, although passing upon the question whether counsel fees are recoverable as part of the damages in a case car to desist from said disorderly conduct and to refrain from using said profane language; but plaintiff refused and failed so to desist and refrain, and the defendant's employees were thereupon obliged to and did eject the plaintiff from said car, but without violence, and not in the manner set forth in the petition." In reply the plaintiff below denied these allegations contained in the answer. On the trial of the issues the plaintiff gave evidence tending to sustain the claims made in his petition, and the defendant gave evidence tending to support the foregoing allegations contained in its answer. The testimony tended to show that the plaintiff and his two companions were noisy and hilarious, perhaps to the extent of using coarse, profane, and indecent language, to the annoyance of some of the other passengers, and that the conductor had at least once admonished them; that there were several white women and three colored women in the car, the latter sitting just in front of the plaintiff and his companions; that something occurred between the colored women and the plaintiff and his company which was not understood by the other passengers; that the colored women got up and went to the rear exit of the car, and in doing so passed the plaintiff and his companions, and some words passed between them, which were not understood by the witnesses, owing to the noise; and that as the women came out and got off the car they said to the conductor in the hearing of witnesses, but not in the hearing of the where only compensatory damages are allowed, contain nothing tending to show that they would hold otherwise in cases where punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable.

The only state outside of the one represented by the MATHENY CASE in which the question here discussed has received very much consideration is Connecticut; and the cases from that state agree with the MATHENY CASE in holding that counsel fees and other expenses of bringing suit, over and above the taxable costs, cannot be recovered as part of the damages in an action for tort. where only compensatory damages are recoverable, although they at the same time recognize that where punitive damages are recoverable, the rule is otherwise.

L. & N. Traction Co.* 5 Ohio N. P. N. S. 495 (damages for ejection from car).

In Maisenbacker v. Society Concordia, 71 Conn. 369, 71 Am. St. Rep. 213, 42 Atl. 67, where an action was brought to recover damages for assault and battery and for the wrongful ejection by the defendant's agent from a dance hall, it was held that since the principal, in the absence of authorizing or ratifying the agent's conduct, cannot be held responsible or punished for the latter's malicious purpose or intent which prompted his conduct, the person ejected could not recover as punitive damages the expenses of trial in excess of taxable costs.

The case of Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 26 S. E. 875, is not strictly in point because it was sought, in an action for damages, to recover attorney's fees paid on a prior injunction suit, but the court, after recognizing that on the trial of an action for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment, where exemplary damages are recoverable, and fees paid or incurred to counsel for defending the original suit or proceeding may be proved, and, if reasonable and necessarily incurred, may be taken into consideration by the jury in the assessment of damages, said: "But if the injury was not wanton or malicious, and exemplary damages are not recoverable, the allowance of counsel fees is improper."

The following cases throw some light upon this question, but it should be noted that unless it is known that in those jurisdictions the rule is recognized that, in cases of tort where punitive damages are recoverable, counsel fees and other expenses will be allowed as part of such damages, too much reliance must not be placed upon them as authorities for the question here under annotation. In this connection, see the annotation referred to at the end of this note.

In Atkins v. Gladwish, 25 Neb. 390, 41 N. W. 347, the court said: "I think it may be said to be a general, if not an universal, rule, that the expenses supposed to be incurred by a plaintiff in prosecuting a suit for tort will only be considered where punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable."

In Cowden v. Lockridge, 60 Miss. 385, it was held improper to allow a recovery by the defendant in a replevin suit of attorney's fees as damages, where no wilful wrong, fraud, malice, or oppression on the part of the plaintiff was shown. To the same effect are Taylor v. Morton, 61 Miss. 24 (replevin for mule); Gregory v. Woodbery, 53 Fla. 566, 43 So. 504 (this case expressly refused to pass upon the question whether counsel fees are recoverable where exemplary damages are recoverable).

In Winstead v. Hulme, 32 Kan. 568, 4 Pac. 994, where an action was brought to recover personal property wrongfully seized by a sheriff, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover as damages attorney's fees for the prosecution of the case, where no malice or wilful wrong was proved. To the same effect is Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Stewart, 55 Kan. 667, 41 Pac. 961 (action for damages for personal injuries received in endeavoring to alight from a train).

plaintiff and his companions, "It is a pity a person can't ride on these cars without being insulted by somebody that is drunk." "If we can't ride without being insulted, we will get off," which they did do; that thereafter the conductor went to the men and said, "I have told you twice now. You will have to cut it out or get off," to which one of them replied, "God damn you, get back in the back end where you belong and tend to your own business;" and that thereupon the conductor stopped the car, tendered the men their fare, which they refused, and with the assistance of the motorman ejected the men with no more force than was necessary, and that in the case of the plaintiff no force was used except to take him by the arm and lead him out.

The court charged the jury, in part, as follows: "The court admitted in evidence the statement of a witness as to what was said by some colored women in leaving the car. At that time the court said in your presence that that evidence would not be proper or competent for your consideration unless it was said in the presence and hearing of the plaintiff. The plaintiff and one or two other witnesses deny that they heard any such statement as was made by these colored women. The court instructs you that, before you should consider what witnesses say they may have said in leaving the car, you should determine whether or not it was said by them loud enough to be heard by the plaintiff in this case, for, if it was not said in his hearing, then that evi-

341, it was said: "Counsel fees for the prosecution of plaintiff's demand in cases of tort for negligence are not a natural or proximate result of the injury, and are not to be regarded in such cases in estimating actual damages, but may be considered by the jury, in a proper case, in fixing the amount of exemplary damages."

In Hughes v. Brooks, 36 Tex. 379, it was held that where a jury find that an attachment was wrongfully sent out, without further finding that it was malicious and without probable cause, they are not warranted in allowing attorney's fees as part of the damages.

In Flack v. Neill, 22 Tex. 253, it was said that the right of a party to recover reasonable attorney's fees as special damages, in cases of fraud, is confined to cases where a party is obliged to take the initiative in order to redress a wrong perpetrated through fraud or malice, and that where a plaintiff has an apparently good cause of action arising ex contractu, and the defendant sets up fraud as a defense, he cannot recover special damages.

In Indianapolis Journal Newspaper Co. v. Pugh, 6 Ind. App. 529, 33 N. E. 991, it was said: "As a general rule in actions of tort, counsel fees are not recoverable except in suits for malicious prosecution. Our own supreme court has never passed upon the question to our knowledge, and though it would seem that in some of the states counsel fees may be recovered in some classes of tort other than malicious prosecutions, we know of no cases where they are allowable as 'compensation', in actions of libel and slander." To the same effect holds Grotius v. Ross, 24 Ind. App. 543, 57 N. E. 46 (action for slander).

In Kelly v. Rogers, 21 Minn. 146, it was said: "It is perfectly well settled that the fees of attorneys and counsel, and other expenses of the litigation beyond legal costs, cannot be recovered by the plaintiff in any actions of contract, or in those actions of tort in which punitive damages are not allowed; for, first, these expenses are not the legitimate consequence of the tort or breach of contract complained of; second, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) to allow these expenses to the plaintiff, which are never allowed to a successful defendant, would give the former an unfair advantage in the contest; and, third, where, as in this state, it is provided by statute that 'the prevailing party' may be allowed certain sums, termed costs, by way of indemnity for his expenses in the action,' it is not in the power of courts or juries to increase the allowance fixed by statute, however inadequate that allowance may be." This case, however, recognizes that even in cases proper for the inflicting of punitive damages, it is the better opinion that no allowance can be made to the plaintiff for counsel fees and other expenses of prosecuting the suit.

There are many cases in which only compensatory damages were allowed, which have denied the recovery of counsel fees without suggesting any distinction between cases where only compensatory damages are recoverable and those where punitive damages are permitted, or intimating that counsel fees are recoverable if the tort is of such a nature as to call for exemplary damages. Among many others the following cases are of this nature: Jacobson v. Poin Dexter, 42 Ark. 97 (replevin for the recovery of hides wrongfully sold by third person); Joslin v. Teats, 5 Colo. App. 531, 39 Pac. 349 (intervention in attachment proceeding to recover goods); Spencer v. Murphy, 6 Colo. App. 453, 41 Pac. 841 (action for damages by fire set out by defendant); Jandt v. South, 2 Dak. 46, 47 N. W. 779 (damages for wrongful detention of property); Young v. Tustin, 4 Blackf. 277 (trespass for killing horse); Irlbeck v. Bierle, 84 Iowa, 47, 50 N. W. 36 (action for slander); Day v. New Orleans P. R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 694 (suit for value of mules killed by trains); Barnard v. Poor, 21 Pick. 378 (destruction of wood by fire); Warren v. Cole, 15 Mich. 265 (action for deceit); Hatch v. Hart, 2 Mich. 289 (replevin); Lincoln v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. 23 Wend. 425 (action for damages for injury received on train); Good v. Mylin, 8 Pa. 51, 49 Am. Dec. 493 (injury from flooding by erection of dam); Stopp v. Smith, 71 Pa. 285 (action for tres-dence would be entirely incompetent in this case; and, if you should find from all the evidence that the plaintiff did not or could not have heard this language or this statement by these colored women who left the car, then I instruct you to entirely disregard such testimony. If, however, you should find that it was spoken in a way that the plaintiff could have heard it, or did hear it, then the court instructs you that you would have a right to consider it along with the other evidence in the case in determining the issue which has been submitted to you. . . . You should also, if you should determine that this ejectment was not justified, and should further determine that the employees who ejected him acted with actual malice and ill-will, and with a deliberate intention of insulting the passenger in ejecting him, I say, if you should so find, then you would be entitled not only to allow him compensatory damages, but should also allow him an additional amount by way of punitive damages; that is, as a punishment for this defendant for having in its service employees who would thus disregard the rights of others. This is a matter, however, which you are not called upon to determine unless you should, as I say, find that this ejectment was done not only without justification, but in a malicious and insulting manner. Otherwise you should only allow such an amount as would fairly compensate him in the respects to which I have called your attention. And, as a matter of compensation, you would have a right to allow him a reasonable amount for the services of his counsel in bringing and maintaining this action against the company."

There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the court of common pleas, and this judgment was affirmed by the circuit court.

pass to property); Welch v. North Eastern R. Co. 12 Rich. L. 290 (action on the case to recover damages for loss of a trunk).

There are a few early cases in which it seems to have been held that counsel fees and expenses of bringing suit are recoverable as part of the damages in an action for tort, even though only compensatory damages were allowed. These cases, however, it is safe to say, cannot at the present time be regarded as authority.

In Boston Mfg. Co. v. Fiske, 2 Mason, 120, Fed. Cas. No. 1681, when an action was brought for infringing a patent, it was held that the jury are at liberty, if they see fit, to allow the plaintiff as part of his "actual damages" any expenditure for counsel fees or other charges, which were necessarily incurred to vindicate the rights derived under his patent, and are not taxable in the 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. Brookes & Thompson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Hollis E. Grosshans and C. S. Speaker for defendant in error.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testimony clearly shows that the plaintiff below, defendant in error here, was one of a party of men who were creating some disturbance in a street car. Whether or not it would be regarded in that locality as "disorderly conduct" is not for us to say, for there seems to be some dispute about it; but it is certain that the conduct of the party was such as was likely to mar the comfort of peaceable and well-behaved passengers in a public conveyance, especially of ladies. There were some white women and also three colored women in the car, the latter sitting in front of and near to the plaintiff and his friends. The testimony tends to prove that something passed between the plaintiff and his party and the colored women which caused the latter to get up and leave the car by the rear door in a manner indicating displeasure; and that, as they left the car, they said to the conductor: "If we can't ride without being insulted, we will get off," and, "It is a pity a person can't ride on these cars without being insulted by somebody that is drunk." There is testimony tending to prove that at the time this occurred the conductor had already warned the men once, and perhaps twice. Under these circumstances, the court instructed the jury, as to what was said by the colored women when leaving the car, that if these words were not spoken in the hearing of the plaintiff, or loud enough to be heard by him, they should entirely disregard what was said. We do not understand that this evidence was offered for the purpose of proving that the plaintiff and his companions were intoxicated and had in-bill of costs. To same effect are Pierson v. Eagle Screw Co. 3 Story, 402, Fed. Cas. No. 11,156 (infringement of patent); Allen v. Blunt, 2 Woodb. & M. 121, Fed. Cas. No. 217 (infringement of patent); Whipple v. Cumberland Mfg. Co. 2 Story, 661, Fed. Cas. No. 17,516 (action on the case for flowing back water of river).

In The Apollon, 9 Wheat. 378, 6 L. ed. 115, where a libel was brought by the master of a vessel for its illegal seizure, the court said that it was the common course of the admiralty to allow counsel fees, either in the shape of damages or as part of the costs.

A note to Hanna v. Sweeney, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1907, discusses the question of expense of litigation as element or as limit of punitive or exemplary damages.

sulted the women. In other words, it was not offered as an admission by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to deny the statement. If that were the sole purpose of the introduction of the evidence and the sole effect of it, there would be nothing objectionable in the instruction to the jury. We are all of the opinion, however, that this evidence was competent as part of the res gestæ, whether the words were or could have been heard by the plaintiff or not; but it was also in issue in the case whether the plaintiff had been unlawfully ejected from the car, and it was also a question whether the defendant's servants acted with malice or insult towards the plaintiff. To maintain the issues on its part, the defendant was not only entitled to show the actual conduct of the plaintiff, but the effect of it on the passengers, and the complaints of the latter in regard to it, in order to show that its servants acted justifiably and without malice. It cannot, with any reason, be said that such complaints must be made in the presence or hearing of the offender. In this aspect of the case we regard the charge of the court as erroneous and highly prejudicial.

Again, the court proceeded to correctly define the circumstances under which, if found by the jury, they might award to the plaintiff not only compensatory damages, but in addition thereto exemplary or punitive damages. The court even cautioned the jury that they should not award exemplary damages unless they should find that the expulsion of the plaintiff from the car "was done not only without justification, but in a malicious and insulting manner." The court then proceeded to say: "Otherwise you should only allow such an amount as would fairly compensate him. . . . And as a matter of compensation you would have a right to allow him a reasonable amount for the services of his counsel in bringing and maintaining this action against the company." In this last sentence we think that the court fell into a serious error.

Although the doctrine announced in Roberts v. Mason, 10 Ohio St. 277, has never been universally accepted in the other states, yet from that time to the present it has been the settled law of Ohio that in cases involving the elements of fraud, malice, or insult the jury may award exemplary or punitive damages in addition to damages merely compensatory; and that "in such a case" the jury may include reasonable counsel fees in their estimate of compensatory damages. Ibid. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. v. Dunn, 19 Ohio St. 162, 2 Am. Rep. 382; Finney v. Smith, 31 Ohio St. 529, 27 Am. Rep. 524; Stevenson v. Morris, 37 Ohio St. 10, 41 Am. Rep. 481; Peckham Iron Co. v. Harper, 41 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Ohio St. 100; Railroad Co. v. Scott, 56 Ohio St. 736, 49 N. E. 1115; contra, Kelly v. Rogers, 21 Minn. 146. But, although we have made a somewhat extended search, we are not aware of any well-considered case in which it was held that, in the absence of statute or express agreement, attorney's fees might be included as part of the damages where compensatory damages only could be allowed. There are, however, numerous cases in which the contrary doctrine has been distinctly announced and applied. We cite a few of them: Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 420, 26 S. E. 875; St. Peter's Church v. Beach, 26 Conn. 355; Eatman v. New Orleans P. R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 1018; Welch v. North Eastern R. Co. 12 Rich. L. 290; Lincoln v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. 23 Wend. 425; Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 14 L. ed. 181; Flanders v. Tweed, 15 Wall. 450, 21 L. ed. 203; Joslin v. Teats, 5 Colo. App. 531, 39 Pac. 349; Spencer v. Murphy, 6 Colo. App. 453, 41 Pac. 841. Finney v. Smith, 31 Ohio St. 529, 27 Am. Rep. 524, is chiefly relied upon to support the rule of damages given to the jury in this case. Finney v. Smith was an action for libel, and, in interpreting the language of the court, it should not be forgotten that, when an alleged libel is shown to be false, malice is presumed. In such a case evidence in mitigation only tends to rebut malice, but it cannot amount to a complete defense or justification. Therefore, so long as the presumption of malice is not entirely overcome, the rule of damages laid down in Roberts v. Mason applies; that is, compensatory damages, including counsel fees, and, in addition, if the jury see fit, exemplary damages. In Finney v. Smith, 31 Ohio St. 535, 27 Am. Rep. 524, the court notes the fact that the record contains evidence tending to establish the charge made in the petition and also evidence tending to show that the defendants may have acted under a misapprehension, and so the court says: "The clause of the charge excepted to is not drawn with accuracy and fullness of expression in itself, but, when taken in connection with the whole charge, which is set out, we do not find it erroneous; and we see no reason to apprehend that the jury could have been misled by it to the prejudice of defendants." In our view of the case, the few lines of opinion by Boynton, J., ring clear and true and meet our approval.

Indeed, it is difficult to understand how the rule of damages given to the jury in this case can be worked out in harmony with Roberts v. Mason, 10 Ohio St. 278, in which it was said that "the better opinion now seems to be that in actions ex contractu, and in cases nominally in tort, but where no wrong in the moral sense of the term is complained of, the fees of counsel ought not to be included in the estimate of damages;" and, as it was said by Mr. Justice Grier, in Day v. Woodworth, ut supra, "It is a moral offense of no higher order to refuse to pay the . . . damages for a trespass which is not wilful or malicious, than to refuse the payment of a just debt."

The court below properly said to the jury that if they should find that the ejectment of plaintiff from the car was not justified, but was not done with malice or in an insulting manner, they could award compensatory damages only; but the court erred in instructing the jury in that connection that, in case they should so find, as a matter of compensation they might allow to the plaintiff a reasonable amount for services of his counsel.

The judgment of the Circuit Court and that of the Court of Common Pleas are therefore reversed.

Crew, Ch. J., and Summers and Shauck, JJ., concur.

Price, J., dissenting:

I am satisfied with the reversal of the case on the first ground stated in the syllabus and in the opinion, but the second ground in my opinion should not be declared to be the law in Ohio.

The plaintiff in the court of common pleas sued to recover damages resulting from an assault made on him by the servants of the defendant company, and it is alleged that the plaintiff was violently seized and tightly grasped by the servant, and violently pushed along the aisle of the car, and ejected therefrom, whereby the plaintiff not only suffered mental and physical pain, but was humiliated by the acts and violence of the servant. The defendant pleaded facts—disorderly conduct, etc.—in justification of the acts of its servants in ejecting the plaintiff. The issues made a case in which it was entirely proper and necessary that the court instruct the jury as to the rule of compensatory and that of exemplary damages, for there was evidence introduced which tended to support plaintiff's charge. As I understand the majority opinion and the second branch of the syllabus, the right of the jury to allow counsel fees as an element of compensatory damages is contingent upon a finding by the jury that a case was made out for exemplary damages; and if a case for exemplary damages is not made out, counsel fees cannot be considered in awarding compensatory damages. This contingency seems unwarranted by the well-settled law of this state. Compensatory damages in such actions sounding in tort—assault and battery, and similar acts of personal violence—are to be awarded as compenensation for the wrong inflicted, and the compensation should be adequate in so far as the law will afford it. As often said in the books and decisions, exemplary damages or punitive damages are awarded to make an example of the offending party so that others may be deterred from committing similar wrongs; or, if not as a deterrent, then as punishment of the wrongdoer. These are not awarded as compensation to the injured party, but for the purpose already stated, and why, after the jury has concluded that there should be exemplary damages awarded, shall it then go back and again take up the subject of compensatory damages and add the fees of counsel? The trial court could not anticipate what the verdict would be—whether it would include exemplary damages or not, and it attempted, and I think correctly, to lay down the measure as to each kind of damage.

There ought not to be any misunderstanding of what this court has decided upon this question. Commencing with Stevens v. Handly, Wright (Ohio) 121, and Sexton v. Todd, Wright (Ohio) 316, we find the rule of damages stated. In Stevens v. Handly, supra, which was a slander case, the court lays down the rule on page 122, as follows: "But if the words were uttered under circumstances merely mitigating, without justification or excuse, the damages should be compensatory; that they should be sufficient to cover all the expenses and costs of the plaintiffs in litigating the matter, including their loss of time,—such as will make them whole. Where the words are spoken without justification, excuse, or other mitigating circumstances, the damages should be exemplary, to express the estimation in which the jury hold a good character in society, and their reprehension of the habit of wantonly attacking it." We have in that case an instance where there were circumstances in mitigation, and not of wantonness, and yet a right of the injured party to compensatory damages, including all expenses, distinctly recognized. Sexton v. Todd, supra, is on the same line. These two cases were reviewed and approved in Roberts v. Mason, 10 Ohio St. 277. Some language in the opinion of the court might be clearer and less confusing, but the syllabus, which is the law of the case, seems entirely plain. It is: "(1) In an action to recover damages for a tort [not merely a slander or libel] which involves the ingredients of fraud, malice, or insult, a jury may go beyond the rule of mere compensation to the party aggrieved, and award exemplary or punitive damages; and this they may do although the defendant may have been punished criminally for the same wrong. (2) In such a case the jury may in their estimate of compensatory damages take into consideration and include reasonable fees of counsel employed by the plaintiff in the prosecution of the action." The counsel fees are classed with compensatory damages, and they form no part of the exemplary damages, and are not to be awarded as part of the same. In Finney v. Smith, 31 Ohio St. 529, 27 Am. Rep. 524, and cited in the majority opinion in this case, this court reviews the cases in Wright's Report already cited and Roberts v. Mason, and points out the difference between the syllabus and some language of the judge writing the opinion in Roberts v. Mason, supra, which was an assault and battery case. The syllabus in Finney v. Smith, supra, is: "In an action for libel the jury may, in estimating compensatory damages, allow to the plaintiff reasonable counsel fees in the prosecution of his action, although there may be circumstances of mitigation, not amounting to a justification." The questions presented to the court in that case called for just such a clear statement of the law; and, while Boynton, J., was not willing to place his concurrence on that proposition, he does not controvert it, nor endeavor to show its weakness. We have not space to quote from the case at greater length. The opinion refers to and approves other authorities which support the doctrine.

Therefore the trial court did not err in that part of the charge relating to compensatory damages. This, like Roberts v. Mason, was an assault and battery case, leading to ejectment from a car. It is a case sounding in tort, in which both compensatory and exemplary damages might be awarded, and it seems to me the trial judge correctly stated the law to the jury on that subject.

Spear, J., concurs in the dissenting opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISA K. THOMAS, Appt.,
v.

J. W. GAYLE et al.

(134 Ky. 330, 120 S. W. 290.)

Landlord — trade fixtures — renewal of lease.

A tenant does not lose the right to remove trade fixtures which can be removed without the least injury to the freehold, by renewing his lease, and entering upon a new term thereunder, without reserving the right to remove the fixtures.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Franklin County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful removal of certain trade fixtures from plaintiff's premises. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lindsay & Edelen, William Lindsay, J. H. Polsgrove, and J. A. Violett for appellant.

Messrs. Greene, Van Winkle, & Schoolfield and B. G. Williams for appellees.

Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, Louisa K. Thomas, is the owner of a certain house and lot on the north side of Main street in Frankfort, Kentucky, known as the "Chiles Drug Store." Appellees, J. W. Gayle and B. Ebner, partners doing business under the firm name of "J. W. Gayle & Company," occupied said premises as a drug store under a lease which expired January 1, 1907. Before the expiration of their lease, they vacated the building and took with them certain trade fixtures, consisting of counters, prescription cases, shelving, etc. Appellant, claiming to be the owner of the fixtures, brought this action to recover the value thereof and damages for the injury done to her freehold. Appellees defended on the ground that they were the owners of the fixtures, and denied that they had in any way damaged the building. They also filed a counterclaim for damages to their goods, alleged to have been caused by the failure of appellant to keep the building in reasonable repair. The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellees. From the judgment based thereon, this appeal is prosecuted.

The facts are as follows: In 1873 one Chiles owned the building referred to. His son, Richard Chiles, bought and placed in the building certain drug store fixtures, consisting of counters, shelving, prescription cases, etc., for the purpose of conducting a drug store therein. The father died, and devised the building to his wife, Unetta Shiles, Note. — Effect of renewal of a tenancy without reserving the right to remove fixtures is treated in a note in 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1135.

In a subsequent case, Woods v. Bank of Haywards, 10 Cal. App. 93, 106 Pac. 730, it was held that the continued occupancy of the premises by the lessee, with the consent of the lessor, from month to month, at an increased rental, following the expiration of the term of a lease for years, which provided for the removal of certain trade fixtures, was an extension of that lease, and that the right to remove the fixtures was therefore not lost by failure to exercise it during the original term.

who died in 1901, and devised the building to appellant. Richard Chiles conducted a drug store in the building from 1873 until his death. Upon his death, the fixtures were appraised as a portion of his estate, and were sold by his administratrix and widow, Sallie Chiles, to Wickliffe Chapman, for $550. Prior to 1891, Chapman leased the building from Mrs. Unetta Chiles, and conducted a drug store therein. John W. R. Williams bought a two-fifths interest in the store and fixtures from Chapman about the year 1891, and he and Chapman continued to conduct the business as partners until Chapman's death, in 1892. Upon Chapman's death, his three-fifths interest in the drug store and fixtures was sold by his administrator, Walter Chapman, to John W. R. Williams, in the year 1893. The lease to Chapman expired January 1, 1892. A new lease was made to Williams for a period of five years, beginning January 1, 1892, and ending January 1, 1897. In the year 1896, and during the pendency of this lease, the building caught fire, and the fixtures were practically destroyed. Mrs. Chiles carried insurance on the building, which she collected after the fire. Williams carried insurance on the stock and fixtures, which he likewise collected. Thereafter Williams bought new fixtures and paid for same. In 1896, Mrs. Chiles executed another lease to Williams, which began January 1, 1897, and ended January 1, 1902. In 1901 Williams sold his drugs and trade fixtures to South-Longmoor & Company. In June, 1901, Mrs. Chiles made a new lease of the building to South-Longmoor & Company for a period of five years, beginning January 1, 1902, and ending January 1, 1907. In February, 1903, South-Longmoor & Company sold the trade fixtures to appellees, J. W. Gayle & Company, and with the consent of appellant assigned the lease on the building to appellees. For these fixtures appellees paid $2,100. In December, 1906, appellees leased another building, and removed thereto their stock of drugs and the counters, prescription cases, shelving, soda fountain, etc., which they had purchased from South-Longmoor & Company. It is the value of these fixtures which appellant seeks to recover in this action.

The first ground assigned for reversal is the failure of the court to give certain instructions offered by appellant. It is the contention of appellant that the tenant Williams procured and held under a new lease commencing January 1, 1897, which lease did not reserve to him the right to remove the fixtures placed in the drug store in 1896, and that he thereby abandoned any right he may have had to said fixtures, and had no title thereto which he could convey to South-Longmoor & Company. The same contention is made in regard to South-Longmoor & Company, who held under a new lease, commencing January 1, 1902, and which did not reserve to them the right to remove the fixtures in question. The instructions refused submitted these propositions to the jury. There can be no doubt that there is abundant authority to support appellant's position that where a tenant having a right to remove fixtures erected by him on the demised premises accepts a new lease of such premises without reservation or mention of any claim of such fixtures, and enters upon a new term thereunder, the right to remove is lost, notwithstanding his actual possession has been continuous. Ewell, Fixtures, p. 174; Bronson, Fixtures, p. 219; Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301. This doctrine, however, has been modified by some courts, and utterly repudiated by others, when the fixtures are what is known as "trade fixtures," and may be removed without injury to the freehold.

In Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, the court said: "The right of a tenant to remove the erections made by him in furtherance of the purpose for which the premises were leased is conceded. The principle which permits it is one of public policy, and has its foundation in the interest which society has that every person shall be encouraged to make the most beneficial use of his property the circumstances will admit of. On the other hand, the requirement that the tenant shall remove during his term whatever he proposes to claim a right to remove at all is based upon a corresponding rule of public policy for the protection of the landlord, and which is that the tenant shall not be suffered, after he has surrendered the premises, to enter upon the possession of the landlord or of a succeeding tenant to remove fixtures which he might and ought to have taken away before. A regard for the succeeding interests is the only substantial reason for the rule which requires the tenant to remove his fixtures during the term; indeed, the law does not in strictness require of him that he shall remove them during the term, but only before he surrenders possession, and during the time that he has a right to regard himself as occupying in the character of tenant. Penton v. Robart, 2 East, 88; Weeton v. Woodcock, 7 Mees. & W. 14. But why the right should be lost when the tenant, instead of surrendering possession, takes a renewal of his lease, is not very apparent. There is certainly no reason of public policy to sustain such a doctrine. On the contrary, the reasons which saved to the tenant his right to the fixtures in the first place are equally influential to save to him on a renewal what was unquestionably his before. What could possibly be more absurd than a rule of law which should in effect say to the tenant who is about to obtain a renewal: 'If you will be at the expense and trouble, and incur the loss, of removing your erections during the term and of again, afterwards, bringing them back they shall be yours; otherwise, you will be deemed to abandon them to your landlord.'"

In the case of Radey v. McCurdy, 209 Pa. 306, 67 L.R.A. 359, 103 Am. St. Rep. 1009, 58 Atl. 558, trade fixtures were placed in a building by the tenant. He afterwards renewed his lease without reserving the right to remove the fixtures. The trial court held that the failure of the tenant to remove before the expiration of the first lease, or to reserve the right to so remove in the new lease, was an abandonment of the trade fixtures to the landlord. In reversing, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "Though this has been declared to be the law by some courts, and the learned judge had authority outside of this state to sustain him, we cannot subscribe to such a doctrine as being either in harmony with reason or consistent with fair dealing with man and man. When a tenant attaches to the land fixtures necessary for him in the conduct of his business, the presumption is that, at the expiration of his lease, he will remove them; and it is right to do so. They are not put in for the benefit of the landlord; and until the tenant, after his term expires, leaves them on the premises in which he no longer has any interest, no intention can be imputed to him to abandon them to his lessor. Hill v. Sewald, 53 Pa. 271, 91 Am. Dec. 209; Watts v. Lehman, 107 Pa. 106."

A very good discussion of the question may be found in Bergh v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. 70 L.R.A. 756, 69 C. C. A. 212, 136 Fed. 368, wherein the court said: "Counsel for defendants have collected numerous authorities in support of this rule, and it cannot be denied that many of them, broadly considered, sustain the defendants' contention; but we are constrained to think that the better reasoning so limits the application of the rule as not to include the present controversy. The rule is of ancient origin and has grown up step by step; the common law accepting some of the harsh analogies of the civil law, until, as trade and commerce expanded, it was found that a harsh application of it to the new relations was producing inequitable results never contemplated at the time the rule had its origin. The trend of recent authority is toward a restricted application of the rule to trade fixtures, so as to prevent manifest injustice. . . . If the fixtures are appurtenant to the land, so that a deed or lease of the premises will necessarily include them, a reservation should be made if the tenant desires to retain them; but, as to chattels which can be removed and carried away without injury [to the freehold], no such exception should be necessary. There can be no presumption that a tenant intends to present his personal property to his landlord because the lease fails to give him the right to remove it. He has that right without regard to the landlord's wishes, and nothing short of conduct which amounts to an estoppel, and evinces a clear intention to abandon his property, can deprive him of that right. The law does not favor forfeitures."

A well-considered case upon the subject is that of Smusch v. Kohn, 22 Misc. 344, 49 N. Y. Supp. 176. In that case the court said: "The defendant [landlord] bases this claim upon Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 702, 6 Am. Rep. 173; Talbot v. Cruger, 81 Hun, 504, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1011, affirmed in 151 N. Y. 118, 45 N. E. 564; Watriss v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694; and McIver v. Estabrook, 134 Mass. 550; but it will be found that these cases relate to buildings erected by the tenant, or to bank vaults, and such like permanent and substantial structures put up by him, which became appurtenant to the land, and consequently an incident of the subject-matter rehired as part of the premises and their appurtenances. They do not concern ordinary movable chattels, which retain their distinctive character as personal property, in reference to which a different rule—one much more liberal to the tenants—prevails. . . . Neither the presumed intention of the parties nor the character of the chattels gives any color whatever to the contention that they were to become the property of the landlord."

For the purpose of applying the rule of law above announced to the facts of this case, it will be necessary to consider the character of the fixtures in question. The evidence shows that the counters, prescription cases, soda fountain, etc., were not attached in any way to the realty, but could be moved about in the storeroom in any manner the tenant desired. The shelving cases were set up against the walls on the side of the building, and the only manner in which they were connected was by a small wire stuck in the wall and attached to the top of the case, merely to keep it in position. Thus it will be seen that the fixtures were such as could be easily removed without the least injury to the freehold. While it is true that this court, in the case of Unz v. Price, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 701, 58 S.

W. 705, recognized to a certain extent the doctrine contended for by appellant, we are not inclined to extend the doctrine any further than announced therein. In that case the tenant erected improvements upon the landlord's land. They were of a permanent character, and necessarily annexed to the freehold. In the case before us, however, no such question is presented. A greater part of the so-called "fixtures" were never annexed in any manner to the freehold. They were simply movable, personal property. Only the shelving cases were attached, and they were attached in a manner that permitted of their easy removal. Such fixtures are more nearly furniture than realty, and are not useful to the next tenant unless he happens to be in the same trade. To extend the doctrine founded upon permanent improvements annexed to the realty to trade fixtures such as are involved in this action would be to work a manifest injury in a great majority of cases.

Complaint is made of the admission of incompetent evidence. Even if incompetent, it was not prejudicial. Appellees, by the overwhelming weight of the evidence, showed title to the property in question.

Appellant's whole right to recover was based upon abandonment by the various tenants because of their failure to reserve in the new leases the right to remove the fixtures. Having held that this doctrine has no application to the facts of this case, appellees were, as a matter of fact, entitled to a peremptory instruction.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE OF OHIO

v.

DELL COLLINGSWORTH.

(82 Ohio St. 154, 92 N. E. 22.)

Homicide — violation of municipal ordinance — "unlawful killing."

The violation of a penal ordinance of a municipality, as a result of which violation death ensues, is not an "unlawful killing" within the provisions of § 6811, Revised Statutes, which defines the crime of manslaughter.

tal in a prosecution for manslaughter. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Webber, McCoy, King, & Game, for the State:

Where the general assembly authorizes municipalities to legislate upon matters pertaining to the regulation and use of the highways within their corporate limits, and, within the scope of their authority, they legislate upon such matters, such municipal legislation is a law, with all the force and effect of a statute.

Markle v. Akron, 14 Ohio, 591; Alvord v. Richmond, 3 Ohio N. P. 136.

Where a penal ordinance of a municipality defines what shall constitute a misdemeanor, and prescribes a punishment for the violation of such an ordinance, it is manslaughter to kill a person while engaged in the wilful violation of such an ordinance.

State v. Horton, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 800, note; 3 Russell, Crimes, § 4, p. 173; Wharton, Homicide, 3d ed. § 4, p. 5.

As to negligent homicide in general, see the note to Johnson v. State, 61 L.R.A. 277. As to homicide in the commission of an unlawful act, see the note to People v. Sullivan, 63 L.R.A. 353. And as to accidents while hunting in violation of law, see the note to State v. Horton, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 991.

Where manslaughter is defined by statute as the unintentional killing of a human being in the commission of an unlawful act, the mere violation of a municipal ordinance, notwithstanding death ensues during such violation, and in connection therewith, does not render the wrongdoer liable to punishment for manslaughter, as one can be held criminally liable only for the consequences of his unintentional unlawful act which, in itself, is in the nature of a wrongful act, independent of the enactment, where the natural consequences thereof are dangerous to life or limb. People v. Davis, 1 Ill. C. C. 245.

Although not within the scope of this note, attention is called to Com. v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 19 Am. Rep. 362, which holds that one would not be guilty of a criminal assault and battery by negligently driving over another person while exceeding the speed limit fixed by a municipal ordinance. The court said: "It is true that one in pursuit of an unlawful act may sometimes be punished for another act, done without design and by mistake, if the act done was one for which he could have been punished if done wilfully. But the act, to be unlawful in this sense, must be an act bad in itself and done with an evil intent; and the law fendant does not turn upon the distinction between malum prohibitum and malum in se.

Messrs. Edward C. Turner and John A. Connor, for appellee:

If that part of the ordinance under which the indictment is drawn states an unlawful act, then such unlawful act is merely malum prohibitum, and not malum in se. The act being merely malum prohibitum, it is not such a one as would be "unlawful" under the manslaughter statute.

Per Curiam:

The grand jury of Franklin county presented an indictment against Dell Collingsworth, of which the following is a copy:

Indictment for Manslaughter.

The State of Ohio, }
Franklin County. } ss.:

In the court of common pleas, Franklin county, Ohio, of the term of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and nine.

The jurors of the grand jury of the state of Ohio, duly elected, impaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire of crimes and offenses committed within the body of Franklin county, in the state of Ohio, in the name and by the authority of the state of Ohio, upon their oaths, do find and present that at the time hereinafter mentioned the city of Columbus, Ohio, had adopted and there was in force in said city the following ordinance.

"Whoever shall ride or drive any animals in any highway, thoroughfare, or public place in this city quicker than or beyond a moderate gait, or shall not slacken the pace of such animal or animals in approaching any cross walk upon which any person may be in the act of passing, or in the act of approaching or leaving a street car, or shall ride or drive any such animal so as to cause such animal or any vehicle there-to attached, to come in collision with or strike any other object or other person, or shall leave any such animal standing in any public place without being fastened or so guarded as to prevent its running away, or shall turn any such animal loose in any thoroughfare, or shall hitch or fasten any such animal to any tree or tree box without the consent of the owner, or shall hitch or fasten any horse or other animal to any lamp post or water hydrant, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon convic-has always made this distinction: that if the act the party was doing was merely malum prohibitum [under which the violation of such an ordinance falls], he shall not be punishable for the act arising from misfortune or mistake; but if malum in se, it is otherwise. . . . Besides, to prove the violation of such an ordinance, it is not necessary to show that it was done wilfully or corruptly. . . . It is therefore immaterial whether a party violates the ordinance wilfully or not. The offense consists not in the intent with which the act is done, but in doing the act prohibited, but not otherwise wrong. It is obvious, therefore, that the violation of the ordinance does not in itself supply the intent to do another act which requires a criminal intent to be proved." See also Com. v. Hawkins, 157 Mass. 551, 32 N. E. 862, infra.

In People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 50 Pac. 376 (which was a prosecution for involuntary manslaughter caused by defendant, while intoxicated, by reckless driving of a team of horses through the principal street of a town at a great and unusual rate of speed) it was held that the charge must rest upon the commission of an act which might produce death if done without due caution or circumspection; and that a county ordinance declaring it a misdemeanor to drive at a greater rate of speed than 6 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) miles an hour, which was offered for the purpose of showing defendant's violation thereof, so as to establish that he was engaged in the commission of an unlawful act, was open to the objection that an act which was merely malum prohibitum is not an unlawful act; and the court, while not deeming a disposal of this question necessary, said that the case could not be strengthened by the admission of the ordinance, and that upon a new trial it had better be omitted.

But it was held in People v. Davis, supra, that the failure to equip a theater with such fire apparatus and equipment as were required by a municipal ordinance, which resulted in the loss of life by fire, was the proximate cause of death, as such omission was dangerous to life and limb, and that an indictment based thereon against the manager of the theater, who was responsible for such omission or neglect, would be sustained. The court said: "But if this conclusion be wrong, then there is another consideration which disposes of the objection; though a violation of the ordinance in question in the manner charged may not constitute an unlawful act within the meaning of the statute [defining manslaughter by wrongful act], even though its natural consequences were dangerous, yet there can be no tion thereof, shall be fined not less than five nor more than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned not more than thirty days, or both."

And that at the time hereinafter mentioned one James Brady was then and there walking upon a certain highway, to wit, Buttles avenue, in said city of Columbus.

And the jurors of the grand jury aforesaid do further find and present that Dell Collingsworth, late of said county of Franklin, on or about the thirtieth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, within the county of Franklin, aforesaid, and within the corporate limits of said city of Columbus, did drive a certain horse with a vehicle attached to said horse, so that said horse and the vehicle thereto attached unlawfully, and in violation of said ordinance, did then and there come in collision with and strike and wound the said James Brady while the said James Brady was so walking upon the said Buttles avenue, as aforesaid, from which said wounds so inflicted by the said horse and vehicle so driven by the said Dell Collingsworth, as aforesaid, the said James Brady then and there died. And so the jurors of the grand jury aforesaid, upon their oaths, as aforesaid, do say that the said Dell Collingsworth, in the manner and by the means aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully kill one James Brady, then and there being, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Ohio.

Karl T. Webber,
Prosecuting Attorney,
Franklin County.

The accused demurred to the indictment, but the demurrer was overruled, and on a plea of not guilty the case proceeded to trial by jury. During the progress of the trial the state offered in evidence the ordinance adopted by the city of Columbus, and which is copied in said indictment. The accused objected to the introduction of the ordinance, which objection the court sustained. To this decision the state excepted. As this ruling was fatal to the case sought to be made by the state, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict of acquittal, which was done. The prosecuting attorney took a bill of exceptions containing the points decided, and obtained leave to file the same in this court, under § 7305, Rev. Stat. to obtain the opinion of this court upon the questions decided.

We have an imperfect record of the proceedings below, but the indictment discloses that the state predicated the charge of manslaughter upon the violation of a municipal ordinance; or, to put the proposition in another form, it is alleged that the unlawful act committed by the accused, which resulted in the death of Brady, was the violation of said ordinance. The present statute defining manslaughter provides that "whoever unlawfully kills another, except as provided in the last three sections, is guilty of manslaughter, and shall be punished," etc. Before the section assumed its present brief form, the crime of manslaughter was defined thus: "That if any person shall unlawfully kill another without malice, either upon a sudden quarrel, or, unintentionally while the slayer is in the commission of some unlawful act, every such person shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter."

However, in an earlier case, People v. Davis, 1 Ill. C. C. 217, an indictment for manslaughter, based upon such omission, against the manager, business manager, and stage carpenter of such theater, was quashed on the ground that the ordinance in question did not specifically designate the person who was to perform the duty of providing the building with fire apparatus and equipment.

But in the latter case (1 Ill. C. C. 245), it was held that the manager of the theater, although no obligation rested upon him, either as agent, owner, lessee, or manager, to comply with such ordinance, was in duty bound to refrain from using the structure as a theater unless so equipped; and that if he did so knowing of its unlawful, defective, and dangerous condition in regard to such equipment, he was within the clause of the ordinance imposing a fine upon any person violating it, and therefore liable to prosecution for manslaughter.

Attention is called to Com. v. Hawkins, 157 Mass. 551, 32 N. E. 862, although not within the scope of this note, which holds that inasmuch as recklessness or gross carelessness lies at the foundation of a charge of assaulting one with a dangerous weapon, where the defendant, who had been annoyed by different persons ringing his door bell, and insulting him when he came to the door, came out of his house in the nighttime, and, in a thickly settled portion of the city, where people were liable to be passing in the street, fired a pistol, the shot from which struck a person standing some distance away, it was proper to show on the question of negligence that the defendant's act was in violation of a municipal ordinance.

But in the last case the trial court instructed the jury that the fact that the firing of the pistol was an unlawful act, or in violation of the ordinance, did not make it an act wrongful in itself, done with evil intent, nor render the defendant criminally liable for the shooting. Com. v. Hawkins, supra.

In addition to what this court said in Johnson v. State, 66 Ohio St. 59, 61 L.R.A. 277, 90 Am. St. Rep. 504, 63 N. E. 607, we think it is sufficient to say that the unlawful act being committed, which results in the death, must be an act prohibited by law, as distinguished from an act forbidden by an ordinance of one of the municipalities of Ohio. It would seem that the case just cited decides the question before us, and leaves little to be said in justification of the decision of the trial court. There are many municipal corporations in this state, and each may have its ordinances, appropriate to its local needs, and therefore there cannot be any uniformity in such local laws, if they should be entitled to the name of laws. Many of the counties of the state contain several municipal corporations. What may be an unlawful or prohibited act in one may be lawful in another, and so throughout the state. We are not permitted to say that what may constitute an essential element of manslaughter in one city or village need not be present in the ordinances of other cities or villages of the state. If the act of killing of a person, which ensues from violating a municipal ordinance, constitutes manslaughter, then we have a law of a general nature, which perhaps is not of uniform operation throughout even Franklin county. Neither is it of uniform operation throughout the various municipalities of the state. The unlawful act contemplated as an essential element of manslaughter must be uniformly unlawful throughout the state. Otherwise, what might be that crime in Columbus might not be such in Dayton, Toledo, Cleveland, or any other city or village in the state.

While the ordinance excluded by the court in the case under consideration may be a wise public regulation for Columbus, its vitality is expended in punishing persons who violate its provisions, according to the scope of the penalties therein prescribed. It may be that there is need for action by our general assembly to provide a general law to cover cases similar to this; but until it answers the call, the courts are powerless in the premises.

In our judgment, the trial court committed no error in excluding the ordinance, and the exceptions to its rulings are overruled.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

E. D. BELL, Admr., etc., of James R. Paris, Deceased.

(— Va. —, 68 S. E. 398.)

Carrier — attempt to prevent leaving moving train — injury — liability.

1. A railroad company is not liable for injury to a passenger who falls from a train in consequence of the attempt of its brakeman to prevent his alighting from it after it is in motion.

Proximate cause — leaving moving train — negligent starting.

2. The negligence of a railroad company in starting its train before one who has entered to assist a passenger has had time to alight is not the proximate cause of his injury in attempting to alight after the train is in motion, without the consent and against the will of the carrier's servants.

Carrier — premature starting of train — duty of passenger.

3. A person who is not given a reasonable time to alight from a train before it continues on its journey is bound to minimize the possible loss to the company because of Note. — Duty of carrier to one who goes upon a train to assist a passenger.

But one case upon this question, in addition to CHESAPEAKE & O. R. Co. v. BELL, has been reported since the note accompanying Arkansas & L. R. Co. v. Sain, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 910, was written.

In Wickert v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 142 Wis. 375, 125 N. W. 943, the liability of a railroad carrier to a person assisting a passenger to board a train, where the carrier has knowledge, or is chargeable with knowledge, of the conditions, was impliedly recognized, but a recovery was denied because it clearly appeared from the facts that the train crew of the train in question was not chargeable with knowledge of the plaintiff's intention to leave the train after rendering assistance to a passenger.

See also Fortune v. Southern R. Co. 150 N. C. 695, 64 S. E. 759, where the question was as to the carrier's duty to a woman who accompanied her husband to the train, on which he was intending to depart, boarded it with him, and was injured as she was alighting. The court held that the plaintiff was present at the time by implied invitation of the carrier, and that it was bound to use ordinary care for her safety. From the facts and from the language of the opinion it would seem that the duty of the carrier in this case was looked upon as owing to plaintiff as merely accompanying a passenger, rather than as rendering necessary assistance, even though the plaintiff actually went aboard the train. its wrongdoing by staying on the train, and not attempting to leave it after it is in motion, to the peril of his life and limb, with the view of holding the company liable in case of injury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Augusta County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. L. Parrish and J. M. Perry, for plaintiff in error:

It was incumbent upon the intestate not to leap from a moving train, and his declaration, showing that the accident would not have occurred but for his attempting to leave while the train was in motion, is insufficient.

Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Morris, 31 Gratt. 209; Jammison v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 92 Va. 327, 53 Am. St. Rep. 813, 23 S. E. 758; Newport News & O. P. R. & Electric Co. v. McCormick, 106 Va. 517, 56 S. E. 281.

In the absence of proof that Mr. Paris was rendering necessary assistance to a sick or infirm passenger, even if he inquired as to whether or not he had time to go on and get off the train, he was but a permissive licensee. No duty was owing to him by the company except to avoid wantonly injuring him.

Messrs. Charles Curry, Duncan Curry, and Harry St. George Tucker for defendant in error.

Kelth, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second time this case has been before this court. In the opinion upon the former writ of error, the circumstances under which the death of the plaintiff's decedent occurred, as they then appeared from the record, are stated, and upon the case then made it was held that the verdict of the jury against the railway company could not be sustained, and the cause was remanded for a new trial. See 107 Va. 408-411, 59 S. E. 398. Upon the next trial there was a demurrer to the evidence and judgment for the plaintiff again. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The duty of a railway company to a person who, in conformity to a custom acquiesced in by the carrier, goes to a railway station to assist a passenger in entering or leaving the train, is declared. It was held that such a person is an invitee, to whom the carrier owes the duty of ordinary care to see that he is not injured, and that, if he enters the train and his purpose is known, it is the duty of the carrier to give him a reasonable time within which to leave it; but if his purpose is not known, and there are no circumstances to put the carrier upon notice, then the carrier is not bound to hold the train till he has had time to alight, or to notify him before the train starts.

Upon the former writ it was not shown that the railway company had notice that the deceased was merely assisting his daughter on the train when he entered the car. The want of such notice, direct or circumstantial, was held on the former writ to relieve the railway company from the charge of negligence in starting its train before the plaintiff's decedent had gotten off. Upon the last trial, on this point the case was different. Two witnesses testified that the plaintiff's decedent, when he entered the car, inquired of a brakeman if he would have time to take his daughter's dress suit case into the car, set it down, and get off before the train started, and was told that he would, to "go ahead." That it had such notice, or that there was any such inquiry made, is denied by the railway company, and the preponderance of evidence, direct and circumstantial, is in favor of its contention; but on a demurrer to evidence, the testimony of the two witnesses to the contrary must be taken as true. The evidence of the plaintiff tended further to prove that the deceased, when he assisted his daughter upon the train, found her a seat about the middle of the car, placed the dress suit case on the seat with her, told her good-by, and started to leave the train, but was delayed in getting off because of the crowded condition of the car and the narrow passage through which he had to or did pass in making his way to the platform of the car; that when he reached the platform it was crowded, and persons were still getting on the train with bundles; that he asked the brakeman not to start the train until he could get off; that he was diligent in his effort to get off; that the day of the accident was Saturday before Christmas, which came on Monday; that the train was a local train, crowded when it reached Staunton, many of whose passengers were getting off; that a large crowd there boarded the train; that the train's usual stop at that station was five minutes; that it only stopped the usual time that day; that, although the train was moving slowly when the deceased got on the steps to alight, he could have done so successfully but for the interference of a brakeman, who grabbed him and then let him go, unbalancing him, and thus preventing him from alighting safely.

Upon all material points the evidence of the railway company is directly in conflict with that of the plaintiff, and upon most of them preponderates. While upon the whole evidence the jury, as it seems to us, ought to have found a verdict for the defendant, yet, as the evidence was conflicting, the verdict of the jury cannot be interfered with, if there was sufficient evidence to sustain it.

We do not think the act of the brakeman, as testified to by the plaintiff's witnesses, makes out a case of negligence against the railway company. As was said in the opinion of the court on the former writ of error, it was the brakeman's duty to have attempted to protect the plaintiff's intestate from damage incident to his stepping off a moving train, and if perchance disaster attended his efforts in that regard, the master cannot be held answerable in damages for the fortuitous result.

The case made by the evidence, it may be conceded, shows that the railway company was negligent in failing to give Paris a reasonable time within which to leave the train. The fact remains, however, that, in attempting to alight from a moving train, he was the author of his own wrong.

Negligence, whether contributory or otherwise, is a mixed question of law and fact. If the facts be doubtful, or about which reasonable men may differ, their determination becomes a question for the jury; but where the facts are undisputed, the law applicable to them is a question for the court.

The decided cases with reference to alighting from moving trains are almost without number. Many of them deal with passengers alighting from street cars, and it is almost universally held that to alight from a slowly moving street car is not negligence per se. Where a passenger is invited to alight by an officer of the train, or is told that he may do so in safety, the cases hold that circumstance to justify his action, provided the train has not attained such a speed that the danger would be obvious; if he is induced to leap from the train by a well-founded apprehension of peril to life or limb, induced by occurrences which might have been guarded against by the utmost care of the carrier, he is entitled to recover for any injury he may have sustained thereby, although no injury would have occurred if he had remained quiet; and we admit that there are cases which have held the carrier responsible where there was no invitation extended, no assurance given, and no peril apprehended. But we are of opinion that the just and proper rule of decision that which we understand to prevail in this state.

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Morris, 31 Gratt. 200, it appears that it was night when the train arrived at the station B.; that Morris had fallen asleep, and when approaching the station, the conductor awakened him, telling him that they were at B. The train went a short distance beyond the freight house and reception room without stopping, and when the engine reached the frog on the west side of the freight house and reception room, it stopped, and the conductor, seeing Morris still in the caboose, asleep, again aroused him. The train stopped about a minute, and Morris could then have gotten off whilst the train was not in motion. The conductor then went to the other end of the car, and, looking back, saw that Morris did not get up. He returned, shook Morris, and told him to get up, or get off; he was at B. Immediately after waking Morris the last time, the conductor went out at the end of the caboose with his lantern in his hand, and stood on the stationary platform about 2½ feet from the platform of the car. The train commenced backing, and Morris got up and walked out to the end of the car and jumped off, not knowing, as he said, which way the car was going, and the caboose car and several others passed over him, injuring him severely. The point where Morris jumped off was opposite the platform, which extended 35 steps west and a much greater distance east of the pumphouse, and was that part of the platform at which passengers going east got off, and was in good condition. It was a dark, drizzly night, and the only lights at the station were two lanterns, one in the hands of the conductor, and the other in the hands of a servant of the company at the station. Upon these facts this court held that "the company was guilty of culpable negligence, and this negligence was the proximate cause of M's injury. The conductor should not have put the train in motion until M. could leave the car; or, if put in motion, he should have cautioned him not to attempt to get off until the train was stopped. Instead of this, he told him to get off, and the train immediately commenced backing. . . . The company was also in fault in not having stationary lights at the place, and this made it all the more incumbent on the conductor to exercise more than usual care and caution in letting off passengers. . . . But whilst the injury sustained by M. is directly traceable to the culpable negligence of the company, the negligence or absence of ordinary prudence and caution on the part of M. contributed to his injury; and he is not entitled to recover of the company damages for the injury he sustained. . . . One who, by his negligence, has brought an injury upon himself, cannot recover damages for it. Such is the rule of the civil and common law. A plaintiff in such cases is entitled to no relief."

It is obvious, we think, that the case just cited was a far stronger one in behalf of the passenger than the one under consideration. The court rightly characterized the conduct of the conductor as culpable negligence, and held that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to Morris; but Morris was in a place of safety, and in attempting to alight from a moving car was held to have brought the injury upon himself, and was therefore not entitled to relief. Judge Burks, who delivered the opinion of a unanimous court, cites the case of Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 147, 62 Am. Dec. 323, and quotes with approval the following language of Chief Justice Black: "It has been a rule of law from time immemorial, and is not likely to be changed in all time to come, that there can be no recovery for an injury caused by the mutual fault of both parties. When it can be shown that it would not have happened except for the culpable negligence of the party injured, concurring with that of the other party, no action can be maintained. A railroad company is not liable for an accident which the passenger might have prevented by ordinary attention to his safety, even though the agents in the train are also remiss in their duty. . . . From these principles it follows very clearly that, if a passenger is negligently carried beyond the station where he intended to stop, and where he had a right to be let off, he can recover compensation for the inconvenience, the loss of time, and the labor of traveling back, because these are the direct consequences of the wrong done to him. But if he is foolhardy enough to jump off without waiting for the train to stop, he does it at his own risk, because this is gross negligence, for which he can blame nobody but himself. If there be any man who does not know that such leaps are dangerous, especially when taken in the dark, his friends should see that he does not travel on a railroad."

Continuing, Judge Burks says further: "It is to be borne in mind, however, that if a passenger is induced to leap from the carriage, whether by coach or railway, by a well-founded apprehension of peril to life or limb, induced by occurrences which might have been guarded against by the utmost care of the carriers, he is entitled to recover for any injury he may sustain thereby, although no injury would have occurred if he had remained quiet."

In Jammison v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 92 Va. 327, 53 Am. St. Rep. 813, 23 S. E. 758, it was held that, if a passenger train fails to stop at a station to which a passenger has purchased a ticket, it is the duty of the passenger to retain his seat until he arrives at the next station at which the train stops; and, if he feels aggrieved, to institute his action against the company for any loss or injury he may have sustained by reason of the failure to stop the train at the proper station. But if he fails to do this, and, in passing from one coach to another, in search of the conductor, to get him to stop the train, he is thrown from the train and injured, his negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, and he cannot recover damages of the company therefor.

The person injured in this case was upon the train, where he had the right to be as an invitee. He was in a place of safety. Had he elected to remain upon the train, his right of action was complete for whatever inconvenience he had suffered, or might suffer, as the direct consequence of the railroad company's negligence. But when he undertook to alight from the train, the negligence of the railroad company had ceased to operate, and it was the voluntary act of Paris which became the proximate cause of his injury.

As was said by this court in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Wills, 111 Va. —, 68 S. E. 395. "The direct and efficient cause of the injury for which this suit was brought was the alighting from the train while in motion. In that act the railroad company had no part."

If it were conceded that Paris was not guilty of negligence in alighting from the train, we do not perceive that his case would be strengthened, for his act of alighting was the proximate cause of the injury. In order to recover, he must show negligence upon the part of the railroad company as the proximate cause of the injury for which he sues. He cannot recover merely because he was not guilty of a negligent act; and in this case the negligence of the railroad company had ceased to operate,—was exhausted,—and his alighting from the train whether under conditions that convict him of negligence or not, is immaterial. If the act of the railroad was a mere condition, and not the proximate and efficient cause of the injury, and if Paris, in alighting from the train, under the circumstances disclosed in this record, was free from fault, and guilty of no negligence, then the occurrence must be classed as an accident for which there can be no recovery.

It has often been held that the act of a responsible agent, intervening between the negligence of the railway company and the injury sued for, relieves the railway company of responsibility. If the intervening act of a third person has that effect, how much more where the person injured was himself the author of his own wrong.

But it is said that if this view prevail, and a person injured while leaving a moving train under circumstances similar to those under consideration is denied the right to recover for such injury, and is left to compensation for damages for the inconvenience, loss of time, and the labor of traveling back, which are the direct consequences of the act of the railroad company, the recovery in many instances would not adequately redress the wrong suffered. To this we reply that experience does not warrant the apprehension that courts and juries may not safely be trusted to do full justice to the citizen in such controversies; and that, even if this were not so, the difficulty or the inability to obtain full compensation for an admitted wrong cannot be made the basis for a recovery against a railroad company in excess of just compensation for the injury which its negligence had occasioned, measured by the ascertained and established rules of law in such cases.

There is another view, which we think is not without merit. Where an injury is inflicted by a negligent act, it is the duty of the party injured by reasonable care to diminish the consequences of the wrong he has suffered, in the interest of the wrongdoer. This is not merely good law, but good morals, and flows from that rule which has the highest possible sanction, that we should do unto others as we would have others do unto us.

Where a passenger has been wrongfully carried beyond his station, or has not been given a reasonable time to leave a train, this principle requires him to submit for the time to the situation, secure in his right ultimately to recover for the inconvenience he may suffer, but forbids him to step from a moving train, thereby imperiling his life and limb, and then turn around and ingraft the consequences of his own rash act upon the antecedent negligence of the railroad, and recover for both.

For a full discussion of the doctrine of remote and proximate cause, we refer to Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Wills, supra, and the authorities there cited. As was said in that case, there is no evidence that any agent of the company directed, advised, encouraged, or even had knowledge of the intention of plaintiff's intestate to alight from the train, except the brakeman, whose conduct was held not to fix negligence upon the railroad company. There was in this case, as in that, the intervening act of a responsible agent, that agent being the plaintiff's intestate himself; and while the railroad company was guilty of negligence in not giving a sufficient time for Paris to alight from the train, it cannot be said that the injury for which he sues was the natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new and independent cause, of that negligent act.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and this court will proceed to enter such judgment as the Circuit Court ought to have rendered.

Buchanan, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the court, in so far as it holds that the plaintiff's intestate, in attempting to get off the train, was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law; nor in the general rule laid down in that opinion that it is per se negligence in every case for a person to attempt to get off a moving train, except under the circumstances pointed out in the opinion. Whether or not the conduct of plaintiff's intestate, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, was negligence constituting the proximate cause of his death, was, in my opinion, a question for the jury, to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case. It is a mistaken view, as it seems to me, to take the single act of stepping off the moving train, and inquire if it alone constituted the proximate cause. The combined effect of the act of the plaintiff's intestate and the wrongful and unlawful conduct of the railroad company, which caused or induced him to attempt to step off the train after it was in motion, ought all to be considered in determining the question of proximate cause. Negligence and contributory negligence are mixed questions of law and fact, and are ordinarily questions for the jury, and not for the court.

It is the province of the jury, as was said in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Griffith, 159 U. S. 603, 611, 40 L. ed. 274, 278, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105, 108, "to note the special circumstances and surroundings of each particular case, and then to say whether the conduct of the parties in that case was such as would be expected of a reasonably prudent man under a similar state of affairs."

"Negligence," said Judge Burks in Carlington v. Ficklin, 32 Gratt. 670, 676, 677, "cannot be conclusively established by a state of facts upon which fair-minded men may well differ."

I do not understand, as stated in the majority opinion, that it is per se negligence in this state to get on or off of a moving train, except in cases under the circumstances pointed out in that opinion. Neither Jammison v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 92 Va. 327, 53 Am. St. Rep. 813, 23 S. E. 758, nor Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Morris, 31 Gratt. 200, cited as settling the rule in this state, involved that question. In the first-named case, the plaintiff was not injured in attempting to get on or off a moving train. The Morris Case was a case of gross negligence on the part of the passenger, and, while there may be language used in both cases broad enough to sustain the statement in the majority opinion, such language was unnecessary for a decision of those cases, and not binding in a case like this, where the facts are entirely different; for the language of an opinion must always be construed in the light of the facts of the case in which it was rendered, and is not binding as a precedent in a subsequent case unless the case called for its expression. Griffin v. Woolford, 100 Va. 473, 41 S. E. 949.

In the Morris Case, the court says that time sufficient was given the person, "according to the proof, to leave the car while the train was standing; and after he was cautioned the last time, if he had at once followed the conductor, who stepped onto the platform with the lantern in his hand, he might have reached the platform with equal convenience and safety, or if, tarrying longer and finding the train in motion, when told to get off he should either have declined, as he had the right to do, to obey the direction, or, if he chose to take the risk of getting off under the circumstances, he should have gotten off on the stationary platform, which, as shown, was alongside of the train. Such would have been the dictates of common prudence. He did not heed them, but, according to his own statement, he got up, walked to the end of the car, and 'jumped off,' not knowing, nor seeking to know, in which direction the train was moving. This would seem to be something more than the want of ordinary prudence and caution. It appears to be gross negligence,—extreme recklessness."

It is clear that a case like that did not call for any expression of opinion which would control a case like this.

Neither did the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 147, 62 Am. Dec. 323, cited and relied on in the majority opinion in this case and in the Morris Case, require a decision of the question involved in this case. In that case, when the passenger, as Judge Black says in his opinion, "was about to jump, the conductor and the brakeman entreated him not to do it, warned him of his danger, and assured him that the train should be stopped and backed in the station. If he had heeded them, he would have been safely let down at the place he desired to stop at, in less than a minute and a half. Instead of this, he took a leap which promised him nothing but death; for it was made in the darkness of midnight, against a wood pile close to the track, and from a car going probably at the full rate of 10 miles an hour."

Not only was the language used in that case not necessary to its decision, but in a later case in the same court (Johnson v. West Chester & P. R. Co. 70 Pa. 357), where the passenger attempted to get on a moving train, in which the trial court had instructed the jury that, "if the train was distinctly running on the track when the plaintiff attempted to enter, he was guilty of negligence and could not recover," that instruction was held to be erroneous, and that "it was for the jury to say whether the danger of boarding the train when in motion was so apparent as to make it the duty of the passenger to desist from the attempt." The language of Judge Agnew, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court in that case, is so apt I cannot do better than quote it as expressing my views, especially as the earlier decision of that court in the Aspell Case is quoted and relied on to sustain the majority opinion in this case.

In that case the plaintiff had not been given sufficient time to get on the train before it began to move. "Now, though the train," says the court, "was distinctly in motion, so that a bystander, cool and unconcerned, could see it visibly running on the track, are we to say, as a matter of law, binding on the jury, that a passenger, having a right to go on the train, and seeing himself about to be left improperly by the wayside, is guilty of culpable legal negligence if he should essay to reach his destination, no matter how slow the motion in running might be or how little danger was apparent to him? He may be guilty of negligence, but of this the jury should judge, under the circumstances. He may not 'set his life or limbs on the hazard of a leap at the running train,' as the judge emphatically said, and doubtless if such were the character of his attempt it would be negligence. The expression 'leap at a running train' denotes a higher effort and less consideration on the part of the traveler than merely attempting to board a car under way. . . . In discussing the conduct of the passenger, merely, we are not to lay out of sight the wrong of the company in its influence upon his mind and act. He may have strong motives to reach his destination. Indeed, no man but must feel, and feel strongly, at being left by the wayside; he is conscious of his right to go aboard, and naturally becomes excited at the sight of the moving train; perhaps is alarmed, and in some degree confused. If the train be running slowly, and the danger is not apparent to him, what so natural as that he should hurry to reach the train and to get aboard? But if we lay down the inexorable rule for this and every other case that, whenever the train can be seen to be distinctly running, it is legal negligence to attempt to get on, we set a premium on the wrong of the company which influenced the very act itself. To say that, whenever the motion of the train is so distinct that bystanders can distinctly see it under way and running along the track, the passenger is to be as cool and unconcerned as they, fold his arms, and say to himself, 'I'll sue you for this breach of contract in leaving me here,' is to him bitterness itself. He may be a stranger and know not where to find accommodation; the severity of the winter may surround him, or the heat of summer oppress him; the elements may war against him, and night or approaching darkness may heighten his alarm; or, if no stranger, his business may be urgent, his family may require his presence, his health may be poor, his means limited, his desire to reach his destination overpowering, and a hundred reasons may influence him to go on. Now, are we to say that the wrong which has caused his mind to be excited and aroused his fears, which confuses him, and has made him less cool and calculating than those who are standing by and can look upon the departing train without emotion, is not to be taken into the account in considering his act? What caused his state of mind? Not his own carelessness or breach of duty as a passenger, but the illegal and wrongful act of the carriers. Surely it does not lie in the mouth of the railroad company to say to him: 'The law will take no account of our breach of duty in its effect upon you. You ought not to have suffered it to move you; but, if you saw our train was moving along the track, the slack taken up, the train stretched out, and the cars under way, so that anyone else could distinctly see it running, you ought to have looked upon our leaving you on the wayside with perfect coolness, made no effort to go, and sued us for our breach of the contract of carriage. No matter how slow the motion of the train was, nor how little danger in getting on was apparent to you, or what the state of your mind caused by our wrongful act, it is not a question for the jury under the circumstances, but the law holds you guilty of culpable negligence in the attempt to board the train, and we are allowed to go free.' This is too stringent a rule for the case. Culpable negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable, prudent, and honest man would do, or the doing of something which such a man would not do, under all the circumstances surrounding the particular case. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 7; Kay v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 65 Pa. 273, 3 Am. Rep. 628. Instead, therefore, of the rule laid down by the learned judge, he should have left it to the jury to say, under all the circumstances in evidence, whether the danger of boarding the train, when in motion, was so apparent as to have made it the duty of the plaintiff to desist from the attempt. There is no objection to the court's assisting the jury in the performance of their duty by reminding them of the danger of boarding a train in motion, and the caution and care that passengers should use, as well as of the duties of the carriers, and the influence of their wrongful acts in producing the catastrophe. But railroad companies are bound to remember that they owe duties to the public, for whose benefit their charters have been granted, and, therefore should not be lightly loosed from the effects of their own wrongful acts."

In Filer v. New York C. R. Co. (a steam railroad) 49 N. Y. 47, 10 Am. Rep. 327, cited with approval by this court in the case of Newport News & O. P. R. & Electric Co. v. McCormick, 106 Va. 517, 521, 56 S. E. 281, in which last-named case it was held that it was not per se negligence to step from a moving street car, it was said by the court of appeals of New York: "That there was more hazard in leaving a car while in motion, although moving ever so slowly, than when it is at rest, is self-evident. But whether it is imprudent and careless to make the attempt depends upon circumstances; and where a party, by the wrongful act of another, has been placed in circumstances calling for an election between leaving the cars or submitting to an inconvenience and a further wrong, it is a proper question for the jury whether it was a prudent and ordinarily careful act, or whether it was a rash and reckless exposure of the person to peril and hazard."

The rule laid down in those cases seems to me to be the correct one, sustained by the better reason, and in accord with the weight of authority. See New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Coulbourn, 69 Md. 360, 1 L.R.A. 541, 9 Am. St. Rep. 430, 16 Atl. 208; Doss v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 59 Mo. 27, 37, 21 Am. Rep. 371; Strand v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 64 Mich. 216, 219, 31 N. W. 184; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Miles, 88 Ala. 256, 261, 262, 6 So. 696; Cumberland Valley R. Co. v. Maugans, 61 Md. 53, 60-63, 48

Am. Rep. 88; Carr v. Eel River & E. R. Co. 98 Cal. 366, 21 L.R.A. 354, 33 Pac. 213; Mills v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 94 Tex. 242, 55 L.R.A. 497, 59 S. W. 874; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Crunk, 119 Ind. 542, 12 Am. St. Rep. 443, 21 N. E. 31; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holloway, 71 Kan. 1, 114 Am. St. Rep. 462, 80 Pac. 31; Sanders v. Southern R. Co. 107 Ga. 132, 32 S. E. 840.

The plaintiff's intestate in this case, according to the plaintiff's evidence, had the right to be upon the train; he was told that the train would remain there long enough for him to find his daughter a seat and deposit her baggage and get off; he was diligent in what he had to do on the train, and in his effort to leave it. He was going down the steps of the coach, almost in the very act of getting off on the station platform, in the daytime, when the train, by the wrongful and unlawful act of the defendant, began to move slowly. Whether, under these circumstances, it was negligence to attempt to get off of the train, was, in my judgment, a question about which reasonably fair-minded men might differ, and was therefore a question for the jury, and not for the court.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

LOWELL LINCOLN et al., Respts.,

v.

CHARLES ALSHULER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.

(142 Wis. 475, 125 N. W. 908.)

Sale — breach by executory vendee — nature of action.

1. If an executory vendee refuses to carry out his agreement to purchase a specified quantity of manufactured goods not identified and made specific at the time of the agreement nor thereafter before the refusal, the remedy of the executory vendor is for damages for the breach, not for the purchase price.

Executory contract — right to breach.

2. The foregoing follows the rule that ordinarily any person has the right to breach his mere executory agreement and submit to legal damages therefor.

Sale — goods to be manufactured — breach by vendee — nature of action.

3. The situation supposed in No. 1 is unlike where there is a sale in presenti, there having either been a transition of title or something equivalent thereto before the breach; or where an article to be manufactured to order, prior to the breach, was in whole or some substantial part created, and has no general marketable quality; it is one where the particular goods to satisfy the agreement have not, prior to the breach, been segregated from a stock of such goods, or the materials for the manufactured product are yet to be acquired by the executory vendor or on hand as ordinary manufacturer's stock, and are available to such vendor without special loss either for sale or incorporation into manufactured articles for others.

Same — measure of damages.

4. In such a case the general rule applies that recoverable damage is limited to such as may be reasonably said to have been in mutual contemplation at the inception of the contract as the probable result of a breach of it.

Same — loss of profits.

5. The more particular rule applicable to the situation supposed is that the recoverable damage is the difference between the agreed price and the fair market value of the property at the time of the breach and place for delivery, subject to the exception that, in case of there being no such market value at such place, such value may be determined at some other place just to the executory vendee.

Same — repudiation of executory agreement — right of vendor to sell.

6. Where a mere agreement to purchase is repudiated by the executory vendee before tender of the subject of sale or before the executory vendor has done all required of him in order to a transition of title, he cannot liquidate his damages by selling the subject, or an ostensible subject, of the agreement as the property of the executory vendee; but a sale fairly conducted by him of the actual or a similar subject might create evidence on the question of damages.

Same — executory sale on credit — default of purchaser — effect.

7. In case of an executory contract to sell and deliver goods on credit, the seller may, if in the meantime the purchaser becomes insolvent, or shows evidence of incapacity to pay for the property by defaulting on existing indebtedness, eliminate such element and treat the contract as an agreement for a cash sale.

Note. — The question whether a seller has the right, upon breach of an executory contract, to maintain an action for the contract price, is discussed in notes to Acme Food Co. v. Older, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 808, and Fairbanks, M. & Co. v. Heltsley, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 248.

A note to Gardner v. Deeds & Hirsig, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, and a note to Ridgeway Dynamo & Engine Co. v. Pennsylvania Cement Co. 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 613, discuss the question of measure of damages for purchaser's refusal to accept goods specifically manufactured for him.

The remedy of conditional vendor for refusal to accept is discussed in a note to National Cash Register Co. v. Hill, 63 L.R.A. 100.

Same — rights of vendor.

8. In the circumstances stated in the last foregoing, the executory vendor cannot eliminate any other element than that of credit; the feature as to time and place of delivery, he must comply with, at his peril of being liable for a breach.

Appeal — nonprejudicial judgment — harmless error.

9. In an action in form, to recover the purchase price of chattels, where the cause of action is in fact for damages for breach of the agreement to purchase, a recovery in form, upon the theory of the pleader, will not be disturbed on appeal if the record shows the judgment is not in excess of the amount plaintiff would have recovered had he proceeded in the proper way.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Racine County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the balance of the purchase price alleged to be due on a contract for the sale of certain cloth. Modified.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action in form to recover a balance due on contract, with some allegations in the complaint appropriate to an action for damages for nonfulfilment of an agreement to purchase. The issues were thus decided as to facts: (1) Plaintiffs sold defendant and defendant purchased from plaintiffs, on July 20, 1907, fifteen cases of cheviot cloth, to be manufactured and delivered at $7\frac{1}{4}$ cents per yard, five cases October 5, 1907, five cases November 15, 1907, and five cases December 15, 1907, of which the first five were delivered and paid for; and also sold defendant and it purchased twenty-five cases of like goods about July 24, 1907, for December, 1907, delivery. (2) The place of delivery agreed upon was defendant's factory at Racine, Wisconsin, or other factories to be designated by it. (3) Under the agreement, shipping directions were necessary and defendant agreed to give such. (4) Defendant refused to give shipping directions for any of the goods subsequent to shipment of the first five cases, which were duly forwarded and paid for, and refused to receive the balance or any part thereof, wherefore plaintiffs were prevented from making delivery though they were ready and willing to do so, which defendant well knew. (5) April 1, 1908, plaintiffs notified defendant that, unless it received and paid for the balance of the goods by April 10th thereafter, they would sell the same in the open market for the best price obtainable, and hold defendant for any deficiency between the amount received and the sale price. Pursuant thereto, July 27th thereafter, plaintiffs sold the goods, using reasonable care to obtain the best price practicable, realizing \$4,032.16, which they applied upon the sale price, leaving \$1,447.36, subject to the freight charges which plaintiffs would have had to pay, had the goods been accepted at the agreed destination, or a net loss of \$1,287.82.

Upon such facts the court concluded that plaintiffs were entitled to recover of defendant the aforesaid balance with interest, amounting to $1,484.55, and costs. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The finding that there was a sale of goods to defendant was based on the making and acceptance of two orders, each in this form:

The only difference between the two orders was the number of cases and time for shipment.

The evidence was to this effect: Shipping orders were given as to ten cases, but there was delay in the matter on the part of plaintiffs. Before plaintiffs were ready to make shipment they were informed by defendant that, on account of the financial condition of the country and its condition in that respect, it would be unable to take the twenty-five cases and requested plaintiffs to consent to a cancelation of the order therefor. At such time defendant was in default to plaintiffs, on the theory that it was bound to pay for goods at dates specified in the order, whether they had been forwarded or not. On such theory plaintiffs refused to ship the ten cases, at the same time refusing to cancel the order for twenty-five cases. Many communications passed between the parties, defendant at no time refusing to take and pay for the ten cases when delivered as agreed upon, but insisting that it would not take any of the twenty-five cases, resulting in plaintiffs refusing, under any circumstances, to cancel the order therefor, and refusing to ship the ten cases except upon payment therefor, and defendant persisting in its refusal to accept any of the twenty-five cases, and requesting plaintiffs to dispose of them for its account, because of their superior opportunity for realizing thereon. In that situation plaintiffs renewed their refusal to consent to a cancelation of the order for the twenty-five cases, continued to neglect to ship or offer to ship the ten cases, and demanded payment for the entire thirty-five cases, but offered to consider any proposition made to give defendant additional time. Thereupon, and on March 19, 1908, defendant notified plaintiffs that it would take the twenty-five cases, paying therefor by July 31st, upon condition of the goods being perfect in every particular and freer from defects than goods previously shipped, and on such condition ordered shipment of five cases at once. Plaintiffs thereupon positively refused to ship any goods in advance of payment for the whole thirty-five cases, and sent their account to defendant accordingly, making claim for the full delivered price and on over 4,000 yards of goods in excess of thirty-five cases of 2,000 yards each, following it by a draft, which was refused payment. Prior to such refusal plaintiffs declined to forward any of the ten cases, though they had in hand urgent shipping orders therefor, till the draft was paid. Thereafter circumstances occurred detailed in the findings respecting sale of thirty-five cases of goods, corresponding as to amount of cloth therein to the bill as aforesaid, ostensibly as defendant's goods and on its account, liquidating their pretended claim to the amount found by the court, for which judgment was rendered.

Messrs. Kearney, Thompson, & Myers, for appellant:

The plaintiffs had no right to resell the goods elsewhere than at the place of delivery, in the absence of a showing on their part that no market existed at such place or in that vicinity, at the time of resale.

Messrs. Simmons & Walker, for respondent:

Benjamin, Sales, Bennett's 7th Am. ed. p. 793, note.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case seems to have been disposed of on a wrong theory. The contracts, notwithstanding words of sale in presenti, were obviously mere agreements to sell in consideration of agreements to purchase. They did not contemplate the passing of title to the goods till arrival at the delivery point in Wisconsin, freight paid. Therefore, as the goods were never so delivered or tendered, the contingency never happened rendering it competent for respondents to sell the goods as the property of appellant. They merely sold their own property.

Again, as the contracts were mere agreements to sell and agreements to purchase, neither sales in presenti, nor agreements to manufacture and sell specific articles, or sell specific identified articles, but to sell quantities of goods, manufactured or unmanufactured at the time, of the ordinary output of the factory, and the second agreement was not only repudiated by the executory vendee before any goods called for thereby were set aside as its particular goods, but before they were tendered at the delivery point, so that the contracts were never completed by the executory vendors, so as to enable them to treat the property as, in any sense, that of such executory vendee, and, after its repudiation the second contract could not have been performed by such vendors so as to enable them to treat the goods as property of such vendee or enhance its liability for the breach,—respondents' cause of action was not for a balance due upon a sale of goods, but for damages for breach of contract determinable as of the time of its breach, and limited according to the familiar rule that such damages can only be such as may be reasonably considered to have been in mutual contemplation by both parties at the time of making the contracts as the probable result of the breach thereof. Guetzkow Bros. Co. v. A. H. Andrews & Co. 92 Wis. 214, 52 L.R.A. 209, 53 Am. St. Rep. 909, 66 N. W. 119; Serlling v. Andrews, 106 Wis. 78, 81 N. W. 991; Malueg v. Hatten Lumber Co. 140 Wis. 381, 122 N. W. 1057.

The optional rights of action suggested in Pratt v. S. Freeman & Sons Mfg. Co. 115 Wis. 648, 92 N. W. 368, do not all apply to such a situation. There the article was specially manufactured and set aside for the vendee at the delivery point, so it was competent for the vendor to deal therewith as the property of such vendee. Here the goods could not be dealt with as property of the executory vendee without its consent, till the executory vendors had done everything on their part, so that, in a case of destruction of the goods by fire or otherwise, the loss would have fallen on the former because of the title having passed.

The rule formulated in Pratt v. S. Freeman & Sons Mfg. Co. supra, is elementary, but was there adopted, as to its phrasing, from Van Brocklen v. Smeallie, 140 N. Y. 70, 35 N. E. 415, where the facts were that the title to the property had actually passed to the vendee, leaving nothing executory but the mere act of delivery. The court held that the rule applies in cases where the title passes in presenti and where the contract is executory, but the property is identified, and there is a valid tender as contemplated in the sale contract, and a refusal to perform. The facts of this case do not satisfy either of such situations. The title did not pass at the date of the contract, the property was never tendered at the agreed place of delivery, and was not specific prior to the breach.

Again, it is an elementary principle that, in case of a bargain and sale of goods not specific, and before they are set aside for the vendee, if he notifies the executory vendor that he elects to and does cancel the contract and will not receive the goods, he cannot be made liable for the purchase price, as on a sale of goods, but only for damages for his breach of contract. That being upon the theory, often declared, that, ordinarily, any person has a right to breach his mere executory agreement and submit to damages therefor. Ward v. American Health Food Co. 119 Wis. 12, 96 N. W. 388; Malueg v. Hatten Lumber Co. supra. Unexcelled Fire-Works Co. v. Polites, 130 Pa. 536, 17 Am. St. Rep. 788, 18 Atl. 1058, is a good illustrative case.

The facts in the last case cited are on all fours with those in this case. The court remarked that "whilst the manifest tendency of the cases in the American courts, now, is to the doctrine that when the vendor stands in the position of a complete performance on his part, he is entitled to recover the contract price as his measure of damages, in the case of an executory contract for the sale of goods not specific, the rule undoubtedly is that the measure of damages for a refusal to receive the goods is the difference between the price agreed upon and the market value on the day appointed for delivery." And the court might well have added, to accurately round out the rule, at the place of delivery.

In this case, as before indicated, the agreements were with reference to goods from the ordinary output of a manufactory, to be selected from stock to be accumulated or on hand. That is plain. The second agreement was repudiated about a month and a half before expiration of the time for delivery, and some three weeks before delivery could have been requested. It is very evident that no goods had been set aside for appellant, even at the necessary starting point of the contemplated transit, prior to the notification that the second agreement would not be carried out by appellant. It may well be that if they existed at all it was as a part of the general stock. So respondents, in any view, never had a cause of action against appellant for the contract price of the twenty-five cases of goods.

As to the ten cases, it seems the finding that appellant refused to receive them is contrary to the evidence. As we read the record, appellant ordered the ten cases forward, urgently, but respondents refused to send the same without prepayment not only for the ten cases, but for the thirty-five cases. In face of the letters found in record ordering forward the ten cases, and the reply, in effect, refusing to ship except upon condition of payment for the thirty-five cases, it is not perceived how the finding that shipments were not made because no shipping directions had been given, and because appellant had refused to receive any of the goods, has any support whatever. The declination to ship the ten cases was upon the sole ground that the sale price for the whole thirty-five had not been paid. The court must have assumed that circumstances existed when the goods were ordered forward, authorizing the executory vendors to eliminate the element of credit, and demand prepayment before parting with possession of the goods, under the familiar rule applied in Pratt v. S. Freeman & Sons Mfg. Co. supra, though there is no finding of insolvency or of any fact justifying even the elimination from the contract of the element of credit.

True, in case of an executory agreement for sale of property on credit, if, before the time for delivery, the executory vendee becomes insolvent, or shows evidence of insolvency by defaulting in payment of existing indebtedness, the seller may insist upon completion of the sale contract, eliminating the element of credit, but not eliminating any other element of the contract, as that in this case to deliver the subject of the sale f. o. b. cars at a point distant from the location of the goods at the time of the sale or that of the contemplated commencement of the transit to the purchaser. Much less can the vendor, as was done here, not only eliminate the element of credit, but a material part of the contract in addition, by imposing the condition of payment for goods under other contracts, especially goods not recoverable for in any event, because of the agreement to purchase the same having been seasonably repudiated, leaving the vendor only his action for damages. So the record not only does not support the finding, but negatives any right to recover on the first contract either the purchase price of the goods or damages for breach of contract. That contract was breached by respondents, not by appellant.

As to the twenty-five cases, it seems the finding that appellant repudiated the contract is well supported, and also the evidence seems conclusive that appellant never after first taking that attitude changed it by agreeing to take the goods as promised, or withdrew the request for respondents to liquidate their damages by selling the goods in their discretion for its account. It is quite likely that had appellant, after breaching the contract, seasonably changed its attitude, respondents would have refused to start the goods for delivery at the agreed termination of the transit, only eliminating the element of credit so as not to lose control of the property before receiving payment therefor, or stood ready to do so, but would have insisted upon payment before starting the goods on the journey, in which case they could not have recovered damages, but, on the contrary, might have been liable for damages for their breach of contract. However, that course was not taken, so the right of respondents to reimbursement for damages for the breach, which became fixed by the refusal to receive the goods before and at the agreed time for forwarding, remained to the end.

The measure of damages, by the ordinary rule, is the difference between the amount the appellant agreed to pay for the goods and the reasonable market value thereof at the agreed delivery point in Wisconsin at the time of the breach, less the freight, which respondents agreed to, but did not, under the circumstances, have to pay. That is subject to the exception that where there is no fair market value at the delivery point, such value may be determined at some other point, just to both parties, which in this case not only seems, as above, to have been the place where the goods were sold, but the one consented to by appellant by the request for a sale thereof on its account.

It must be remembered that this is not a case of manufacture of an article to order, which was not a stock article having a general marketable quality, in which case sometimes the full price is the measure of damages for breach of the contract to accept after the article has been completed, or substantially so; nor a case where the article, though of a general marketable quality, was completed and ready for delivery before the breach. It is a case where, so far as the record shows, while the material for the proposed sale was still the property of the executory vendors and in their hands, or the subject formed part of the general stock of manufactured goods at the factory, the vendee refused to perform. In such a case the profit on the contract is the true measure of recovery.

Now, while this was not a case for liquidation of damages by a sale of goods substantially as property of the vendees, as in Pratt v. S. Freeman & Sons Mfg. Co. and Van Brocklen v. Smeallie, supra, and Moore v. Potter, 155 N. Y. 481, 63 Am. St. Rep. 692, 50 N. E. 271, appellant has no reason to complain, (1) because it consented, in advance, to such liquidation; (2) because, in any event, such a sale is, in effect, only a manner of making evidence of damages, which in this case were the same whether the action be regarded as one on contract for balance of the purchase price, or for mere damages for breach of contract; and (3) because the evidence shows that the sale price was the fair market value at the place of sale and in excess of what could have been obtained at the agreed delivery point, or at the nearest point thereto where the goods were fairly marketable.

Again, while the time the market value was determined as a basis for recoverable damages was several months after the date of the breach, which fixed the rights of the parties, that is rather to appellant's advantage than otherwise, since the evidence is to the effect that property of the sort increased in value in the meantime, rather than decreased.

Further, while the action was for the balance of the purchase price for goods instead of a mere action for damages for breach of contract, as it should have been, that is not to appellant's prejudice, since the recoverable amount, under the circumstances, would be no different in one case than in the other.

It follows that the judgment must be considered as one for damages for breach of contract to buy goods, and erroneous as to the ten cases. It must, therefore, be reduced as of the time of its rendition to the extent of two sevenths, to wit, to the sum of $1,060.40, and further reduced by the amount of the damages awarded on the excess of goods in the twenty-five cases over 2,000 yards per case, which seem to be 4,096½ yards, on which damages were incorporated in the judgment, including interest, of substantially $79.49, making the amount for which judgment should have been rendered $980.91, to which sum it is reduced as of its date. As so reduced, it should be affirmed.

So ordered.

J. E. DOLVIN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

AMERICAN HARROW COMPANY.

(125 Ga. 699, 54 S. E. 706.)

Res judicata — striking plea.

1. If, upon demurrer to a plea, the court has decided as to the merits of the defense thus sought to be set up, and stricken the plea, the judgment is conclusive, if the same or substantially the same plea is again offered. But if, in rendering his judgment upon a demurrer to the plea, the court does not decide as to its merits, but strikes it on a ground of special demurrer, that there is a mere general allegation of fraud, without setting out any facts which constitute such fraud, this does not become res judicata so as to prevent a complete plea of fraud, with proper allegations, from being offered by way of amendment to the answer.

Appeal — question not considered.

2. The trial court not having passed upon the merits of the plea of fraud offered by way of amendment, but having rejected it on the ground that it was res judicata, this court expresses no opinion as to its merits.

Pleading — plea — demurrer.

The plea of mutual mistake, offered in this case, as to the effect of the instrument given by the agent of the payee of a note to the maker thereof, at the time when it was made, by which the payee agreed "to receipt J. note which stated that "this is given in settlement of old note No. 3,975." The third paragraph of the petition alleged, that the note was past due, that the defendant refused to pay it, and that judgment was prayed for the amount due. The third paragraph of the answer was as follows: "In answer to paragraph 3 of said petition, defendant says that there was a fraud in the procurement of said note, and there was never any consideration to support the same. Defendant gives this as his reason for refusing to pay the said note." The sixth paragraph of the answer alleged that the note grew out of an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant by which the latter was to sell certain harrows for the former; that he sold some of them and paid certain freight, which amounts he pleaded as a set-off. A demurrer to the answer contained the following, among other grounds: "Paragraph 3. The fraud alleged is not set forth as required by law, and said paragraph sets forth no facts as to the consideration." The other paragraph stated above was also demurred to as lacking in specification. An amendment was made to the answer, which alleged that the defendant was to sell harrows for the plaintiff, taking notes and sending them to the plaintiff, and accounting at the end of the season, returning unsold harrows, and receiving commission; that the agent making the contract stated that the plaintiff kept no books, but took as security from its agents to sell, notes which stood for the machines shipped,

I. Scope.

This note is confined by its subject to mistakes of law as to effect of instrument. This, of course, excludes questions of mistake of fact. But mixed questions of law and fact are included. And in the large and growing class of cases which go upon the theory that a mistake is correctable or reformable in equity where it results in a failure to carry out the intentions of the parties concerned, without reference to whether the mistake was one of law or fact, questions of mistake and relief therefrom have frequently been passed upon without taking pains to consider whether the mistake was one of law or fact. With reference to cases of this class, it has to be the aim of the writer to giving a receipt against said notes to protect the agent; that this was done in the present case, and the note was not in consideration of the purchase of any machines, but only as security for defendant's accounting; that he did account for the machines shipped, and sent the notes received for all which were sold, and offered to deliver to them all the machines remaining unsold; that the note sued on was given for the purpose of standing as security for a settlement agreed on as thus understood by defendant, which was adopted and agreed upon in the settlement; that a receipt was given by the plaintiff's agent solely on the understanding and for the consideration that the note stood as a security for the settlement, and not as a compromise and settlement of a money indebtedness; that he has always offered to perform all of his part of the settlement, and is entitled to a surrender of the note and the payment of his claim for freight and commissions. No other demurrer appears in the record: but on that stated above, the court passed the following order: "The demurrer to the original answer and to this amendment is overruled, except as to so much of the plea as attempts to set up fraud, which is stricken." After a trial, the case was brought to this court, and a reversal had. 119 Ga. 186, 45 S. E. 983.

When the case again came on for trial, the defendant tendered an amendment striking the former amendment to his plea, and in lieu thereof alleged, in brief, as follows:

take and use such cases, and only such cases, as have some matter of law involved in the mistake. Likewise, the note is confined to questions of mistake as to the effect of an instrument. This, of course, excludes mistakes as to, and ignorance of, general public law, and as to rights based upon it. But if written instruments and their effect are in any way involved in the mistake, the case is a proper part of this note.

II. General rules.

a. Statement of and application generally.

The general rule, subject to various and varying restrictions, is that equity will reform instruments for the correction of mistake. Rowley v. Flannelly, 30 N. J. Eq. 612; Read v. Cramer, 2 N. J. Eq. 277, 34 Am. Dec. 204; Whitehead v. Brown, 18 Ala. 682; Phelan v. Tomlin (Ala.) 51 So. 382; Ligon v. Rogers, 12 Ga. 281; McCloskey v. McCormick, 44 Ill. 336; Way v. Roth, 159 Ill. 162, 42 N. E. 321; Quimby v. Shearer, 56 Minn. 534, 58 N. W. 155; Mosby v. Wall, 23 Miss. 81, 55 Am. Dec. 71; Martin v. Nixon, 92 Mo. 26, 4 S. W. 503; Young v. Coleman, 43 Mo. 179; Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385; Rosevelt v. Dale, 2 Cow. 129; Jenkins v. Lefaiver, 29 N. Y. S. R. 886, 9 N. Y. Supp. 19; Foster v. Schmeer, 15 Or. 363, 15 Pac. 626; Desell v. Casey, 3 Desauss. Eq. 85; Murray Co. v. Putman (Tex. Civ. App.) 130 S. W. 631; Bedell v. Wilder, 65 Vt. 406, 36 Am. St. Rep. 871, 26 Atl. 589; Johnson v. Parker, 34 Wis. 596; Zohrlaut v. Mengelberg (Wis.) 124 N. W. 247; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 15 Pet. 233, 10 L. ed. 721; Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sr. 126; Taylor v. Rudd, cited in 3 Bro. Ch. 454.

The reformation of written instruments when by mistake they express more or less than the parties intended is a well-established branch of equity jurisdiction. Franklin v. Jones, 22 Fla. 526; Jackson v. Magbee, 21 Fla. 622; Clopton v. Martin, 11 Ala. 187; Trout v. Goodman, 7 Ga. 383; Mendenhall v. Steckel, 47 Md. 453, 28 Am. Rep. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

481; Somerville v. Trueman, 4 Harr. & Mc. H. 43, 1 Am. Dec. 389; Sawyer v. Hovey, 3 Allen, 331, 81 Am. Dec. 659; Loss v. Obry, 22 N. J. Eq. 52; Braddy v. Parker, 39 N. C. (4 Iréd. Eq.) 430; Gee v. Spencer, 1 Vern. 32.

And an innocent omission or insertion of a material stipulation, contrary to the mutual intention of the parties to a written instrument, will be corrected by a court of equity, and the instrument reformed in that particular on a timely application after the discovery of the mistake. Turner v. Kelly, 70 Ala. 85.

Reformation of a contract is authorized where it appears that, through the mistake of both parties to it, the intentions of neither have been expressed in it. Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652.

So, courts of equity have power to reform written instruments, to make them conform to the true intention of the parties. Forester v. VanAuken, 12 N. D. 175, 96 N. W. 301; Clark v. Hart, 57 Ala. 390; Pickett v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 32 Ark. 346; Chamberlain v. Thompson, 10 Conn. 243, 26 Am. Dec. 390; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cox, 133 Ga. 763, 66 S. E. 1088; Hunter v. Bilyeu, 30 Ill. 228; Hileman v. Wright, 9 Ind. 126; Braddy v. Parker, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Wentworth, 28 Kan. 183; McElderry v. Shipley, 2 Md. 25, 56 Am. Dec. 703; Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479; Aldridge v. Weems, 2 Gill. & J. 36, 19 Am. Dec. 250; Delaware State F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Gillett, 54 Md. 219; Smith v. Jordan, 13 Minn. 264, Gil. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 232; Nebraska Loan & T. Co. v. Ignowski, 54 Neb. 398, 74 N. W. 852; Story v. Gammell, 68 Neb. 709, 94 N. W. 982; Uihlein v. Matthews, 93 App. Div. 57, 86 N. Y. Supp. 924; Pennell v. Wilson, 2 Robt. 505; Southern Finishing & Warehouse Co. v. Ozment, 132 N. C. 839, 44 S. E. 681; Thompson v. Thompson, 18 Ohio St. 73; North & West Branch R. Co. v. Swank, 105 Pa. 555; Desell v. Casey, supra; Bailey v. Bailey, 8 Humph. 230.

And equity, in a proper case, will reform a contract so as to make it speak the actual agreement between the parties. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cox, supra; Alexander v.

He admits the execution and ownership of the note sued on, and assumes the burden of proof. About a year before the signing of this note, a salesman for the plaintiff entered into an agreement with defendant, whereby, as defendant understood, he was to sell certain harrows manufactured by the plaintiff, on commission. Under this arrangement, the defendant authorized the plaintiff to ship out fifty harrows, on which he paid freight amounting to $158. He sold thirty of them, and became entitled to a commission of $450. The remaining twenty were never unpacked. The harrows were not reasonably suited for the purpose intended, were totally unfit for such uses, and were worthless. The purchasers refused to pay for them, and returned them to defendant for the plaintiff. The notes taken for them were defeasible. The original note given by the defendant, while absolute on its face, did not truly represent the transaction, but was signed at the time on the representation of the agent that the plaintiff kept no book accounts, and took such notes as collateral security for goods shipped out on consignment for sale. If the note and papers have a different legal purport, it was the result of a mistake of the parties as to their legal effect; or if not a mistake on the part of the agent, it was a wilful and fraudulent scheme to entrap the defendant into giving a legal evidence of a sale when no sale was intended. If the first transaction amounted to a sale to the defendant, he had a complete de-

Caldwell, 55 Ala. 517; Conner v. Baxter, 124 Iowa, 219, 99 N. W. 726; First Nat. Bank v. Wentworth, 28 Kan. 183; Minot v. Tilton, 64 N. H. 371, 10 Atl. 682; Firmstone v. DeCamp, 17 N. J. Eq. 317; Loss v. Obry, 22 N. J. Eq. 52; Pennell v. Wilson, supra; Hunt v. Freeman, 1 Ohio, 490; M'Louth v. Rathbone, 19 Ohio, 21.

When the minds of two persons come together and agree on the terms of a contract, and a mistake is made not in the terms agreed upon, but in their expression, or in the memorial made and kept to furnish evidence of them, chancery will, as a rule, reform the memorial or evidence, so as to make it express their real agreement. Houston v. Faul, 86 Ala. 232, 5 So. 433.

And if an agreement be entered into between two parties in mutual mistake as to their relative and respective rights, either of them is entitled to have it set aside. Bottorff v. Lewis, 121 Iowa, 27, 95 N. W. 262.

And a plaintiff may be entitled to relief from a contract or conveyance on the ground of ignorance and mistake, although the defendant with whom he dealt, and against whom relief is sought, was also in ignorance and under mistake, the contract or conveyance not having been made upon the principle of compromising doubtful rights. Reynell v. Sprye, 8 Hare, 222.

And an order made in an action by consent, and based upon and intended to carry out the agreement between the parties, can be set aside on any ground on which an agreement in the terms of the order could be set aside, including the ground of mistake. Wilding v. Sanderson [1897] 2 Ch. 534.

So, in case of mistake or of fraud, or where there is a mistake by one party and fraud by the other, a court of equity is authorized to, and, upon proper proof, should, reform a written contract between the parties. Devereux v. Sun Fire Office, 51 Hun, 147, 4 N. Y. Supp. 655; Uihlein v. Matthews, supra; Berry v. Sowell, 72 Ala. 14; Gewin v. Shields (Ala.) 52 So. 887; Trout v. Goodman, supra; Price v. Cutts, 29 Ga. 142, 74 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Am. Dec. 52; Webb v. Hammond, 31 Ind. App. 613, 68 N. E. 916; Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 168; Farrell v. Bean, 10 Md. 217; Bush v. Merriman, 87 Mich. 260, 49 N. W. 567; Bailey v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 4 McCrary, 221, 13 Fed. 250.

Equity has jurisdiction to reform written instruments where there is a mutual mistake on one side, and fraud or inequitable conduct on the other. Simmons Creek Coal Co. v. Doran, 142 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 1063, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 239; Campbell v. Hatchett, 55 Ala. 548; Webb v. Hammond, supra.

And where a mistake in a contract is shown which, if not corrected, would operate to the prejudice of a party, and which did not occur through such party's carelessness or negligence, a court of equity will correct it. Foster v. Schmeer, 15 Or. 363, 15 Pac. 626; Blair v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 89 Mo. 383, 1 S. W. 350.

Equity relieves against a mistake as well as against fraud in a deed or contract in writing, whether it concerns land or anything else. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Rogers v. Atkinson, 1 Ga. 12; Wagenblast v. Washburn, 12 Cal. 208; Gray v. Woods, 4 Blackf. 432; Trusdell v. Lehman, 47 N. J. Eq. 218, 20 Atl. 391; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 596, 7 Am. Dec. 559; Ashcom v. Smith, 2 Penr. & W. 211, 21 Am. Dec. 437; Nutter v. Brown, 51 W. Va. 598, 42 S. E. 661; Williams v. United States, 138 U. S. 517, 34 L. ed. 1028, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459.

And this is so either where the plaintiff seeks relief affirmatively, on the ground of mistake, or where the defendants set it up as a defense to rebut an equity. Rogers v. Atkinson, 1 Ga. 12; Chamberlain v. Thompson, 10 Conn. 243, 26 Am. Dec. 390.

So, equity will relieve where an instrument has been delivered up and canceled through fraud or mistake. Banta v. Vreeland, 15 N. J. Eq. 103, 82 Am. Dec. 269.

No written contract is beyond the reach of a court of equity for the purpose of reforming it, if the prayer for relief is presented in due season. Palmer v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 54 Conn. 488, 9 Atl. 248.

But a resolution of a common council of a city, directing the mayor to purchase cer-fense of failure of consideration, which was known to the plaintiff's agent, and that note would have been entirely uncollectable. The agent agreed with defendant upon a settlement of the transaction represented by the first note. The defendant had already paid the freight, and remitted such collections as had been made upon sales, and these were entered on the first note. The notes taken from customers were in the hands of the plaintiff, or were placed in bank, by its instructions, for collection, and were not in defendant's possession. The agent represented that he could not then receive back the harrows, because he did not know where to have them shipped, and stated that he had traveling salesmen in south Georgia, that he would later notify defendant where to ship such harrows. For this reason the settlement was not then closed, but the agent, desiring a note as a security for an accounting by defendant, under this settlement, until it should be consummated, and representing that the old note was too much written upon to be intelligible, proposed to deduct the money payments from the value of the harrows shipped, and take a new note for the amount thus unaccounted for, until the settlement should be carried out. The defendant agreed to sign this, but required of the agent a written showing, for his own protection against the papers which he signed. The agent thereupon wrote, signed, and delivered an instrument as follows: "I agree to receipt J. G. Dolvin for note given me to-day, April 11, 1901, for $934.18, note tain real estate upon terms stated, does not have the qualities of a contract, and it cannot be reformed by the court, so as to give it the quality and force of a contract. Car-skaddon v. South Bend, 141 Ind. 596, 39 N. E. 667.

Nor does the fact that the complainant in an action to reform a written instrument is a purchaser with warranty bar his right to relief. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88.

And equity will grant relief to prevent the unconscientious use of an instrument which does not express the real contract between the parties. Reade v. Armstrong, 7 Ir. Ch. Rep. 375, affirming 7 Ir. Ch. Rep. 266.

Before a court of equity will interfere to reform a written contract, however, it must be substantially alleged in the pleadings, and appear, that there was in fact a valid agreement sufficiently expressing in terms the real intention of the parties; that there was in fact a written contract which failed to express such true intention; and that this failure was due to mutual mistake, or to mistake on one side and fraud or inequitable conduct on the other. Fritz v. Fritz, 94 Minn. 264, 102 N. W. 705; Calverly v. Harper, 40 Ill. App. 96; Slobodisky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 52 Neb. 395, 72 N. W. 483; Garnar v. Bird, 57 Barb. 277; Hyland v. Hyland, 19 Or. 51, 23 Pac. 811; Mitchell v. Holmar, 20 Or. 280, 47 Pac. 616.

The complaint in a suit to reform a deed or mortgage on the ground of mistake must allege distinctly what the original agreement was, and point out with clearness wherein there was a mistake, and show that it did not arise from gross negligence of the plaintiff. Meier v. Kelly, 20 Or. 86, 25 Pac. 73.

And where the only mistake in an instrument is as to its legal effect as executed, and as to the right of the parties to show by parol what they really intended, equity will not reform it by importing into it expressions which the parties thereto did not intend to use, unless this be necessary for the correction or prevention of fraud. Freed v. Brown, 41 Ark. 495.

To set up a contract where no execution of anything had been had would be to make a contract for the parties, and not to reform one, and cannot be done. Price v. Cutts, 29 Ga. 142, 74 Am. Dec. 52.

And where a writing embodies the contract actually made, the fact that the parties acted under a mistake of law, equity, or fact will not authorize a reformation. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 283.

So, though relief will be granted against a mistake of law, a contract made under such mistake with full knowledge of the facts will not be set aside in cases where neither party has acquired a right or suffered a loss by the contract. Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bail. L. 623, 23 Am. Dec. 155.

The maxim, Ignorance of the law is no excuse, is not universally applicable, but only when damages have been inflicted or crimes committed. Brock v. Weiss, 44 N. J. L. 241.

And where a party asks for the reformation of a deed, he must stand upon some superior equity to that of the party against whom he asks it. Conaway v. Gore, 21 Kan. 725.

Nor have courts of equity any power, and they are under no duty, to reform a written instrument on account of a mistake of the draftsman, where the party seeking to reform the writing is a mere volunteer, and the other party is dead. White v. Campbell, 80 Va. 180.

And where the intention of the parties to a contract is sufficiently apparent to be recognized in any court, the fact that a word is omitted is not sufficient reason for bringing a party into a court of equity for a reformation of the contract. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Speer, 32 Ga. 550, 79 Am. Dec. 305.

And to entitle a party to a judgment reforming a written contract, he must prove that it was the intention of both parties to have a contract, not as it appears, but as he claims it should have been, and that this intent was frustrated by fraud or mutual mistake. Jackson v. Andrews, 59 N. Y. 244; Leavitt v. Palmer, 3 N. Y. 19, 51 Am. Dec. 333; American Min. Co. v. Basin & Bay State Min. Co. 39 Mont. 476, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 305, 104 Pac. 525.

due January 1st, 1902. American Harrow Company, by F. P. Webster." This instrument was intended by the parties thereto to signify an agreement on the part of the plaintiff, through its agent, to receipt for and cancel the obligation represented by the new note upon compliance by the defendant with his agreement to deliver up the unsold harrows and account for those sold as above stated. It was drawn by the plaintiff's agent. This defendant was unlearned in law, and the omission of apt words more fully to express said meaning was the result of accident and due to a mistake of both parties. The instrument, as it stands, by mistake of law on the part of the draftsman and of the parties, does not fulfil, but violates, in its operation, the real contract of the parties, it being supposed to be efficient to secure the defendant his rights under the settlement, as against the other papers signed by him. The plaintiff's agent had theretofore acted with apparent fairness, had conceded all that the defendant claimed as his rights in the settlement, and had won his confidence. If he did not share in the alleged mistake, then his conduct throughout was in pursuance of a scheme of fraud by which he saw that the original note could not be enforced against a plea of total failure of consideration, and led the defendant to make a new note, with the purpose to cause him to waive this defense, and to become absolutely bound by the terms of the writings to pay a debt which he never owed, and by pretenses of fairness and con-

Nor can a court of equity give a deed a more extended operation than the natural and legal import of the words in it authorizes. Mayo v. Feaster, 2 M'Cord, Eq. 137.

And the fact that an agreement when executed failed to accomplish the result which the parties to it had in mind does not entitle one of them to have another agreement substituted for it, nor to have the desired result accomplished by some other means. Smith v. Hitchcock, 130 Mass. 570.

And equity has no power to reform a written contract by substituting a person not named therein for one of the parties named, and who executed the contract as such party. Mabb v. Merriam, 129 Cal. 663, 62 Pac. 212.

Nor does the fact that a person making a bond employed a lawyer who gave him bad advice, and thereby deceived him as to his rights, and induced him to execute the bond, furnish any authority to the court to alter the contract of the parties. Garnar v. Bird, 57 Barb. 277.

So, applying the rule that ignorance of or mistake of law will not excuse mistake, it has been held that equity will not, in an independent action, relieve from mistakes of law, unless accompanied with special circumstances, such as misrepresentation, undue influence, or misplaced confidence. Boggs v. Fowler, 16 Cal. 559, 76 Am. Dec. 561.

Under this rule a court of equity will not interpose to grant relief for mistake in a contract unless there was either a mixed question of law and fact, or there were circumstances indicating fraud, misrepresentation, undue influence, or deceit. Ottenheimer v. Cook, 10 Heisk. 309.

A mistake which will be relieved against in equity must arise from ignorance, surprise, imposition, or misplaced confidence, and be unmixed with negligence. Iverson v. Wilburn, 65 Ga. 103.

And where there is neither averment nor proof of fraud, accident, or mistake, a court of equity cannot be asked to reform a deed. Grubb's Appeal, 90 Pa. 228.

And a bill brought for the reformation of a deed must, to accomplish that object, contain an averment of fraud, accident, or mistake in making it, or of facts from which the fraud, accident, or mistake would necessarily be implied. Hollenback's Appeal, 121 Pa. 322, 15 Atl. 616.

b. Principles on which relief is granted.

Courts of equity go on the broad principle that where a mistake is manifest, they will, in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, correct it, and hold a party according to his original intention. Hendrickson v. Ivins, 1 N. J. Eq. 562.

A court of chancery considers that as done which is agreed to be done, and in accordance with this principle will correct mistakes in conveyances and other instruments when clearly and unequivocally proved, and make the instrument such, both in its form and effect, as will fulfil the intention of the parties. Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185, 33 Am. Dec. 193; Kennard v. George, 44 N. H. 440.

The principle upon which courts of equity relieve by reforming contracts is that, through ignorance or misapprehension of the legal effect of the terms agreed upon, the parties have made a contract variant in legal construction from the one intended. Hemphill v. Moody, 64 Ala. 468.

A written instrument is made the evidence of the contract between the parties, and if it fails to present their agreement, the contract it expresses is not their agreement, and the true contract remains unexecuted, and in such case equity will reform the writing, causing it to express the intention of the parties. Stafford v. Fetters, 55 Iowa, 484, 8 N. W. 322; Hausbrandt v. Hoßler, 117 Iowa, 103, 94 Am. St. Rep. 289, 90 N. W. 494.

So, upon equitable principles, no contract to which the parties did not understandingly assent should be enforced. Reed v. Root, 59 Iowa, 359, 13 N. W. 323.

And whether or not a court of equity will correct a mistake in a written instrument depends upon whether the case falls within the fundamental principle of equity that, in legal transactions, no one shall be al-cessions, and by proffering to him a legally meaningless obligation, lured him into signing the paper sued on, intending to deprive him of his just defenses and to trap him into the assumption of an obligation to pay for worthless articles that he had never bought. The agent was authorized to make settlement with defendant; but if not so, he undertook to act for the plaintiff, received the note sued on and the other writing then signed by the defendant, and signed the instrument above set out, all as a part of one transaction,—namely, the settlement. Plaintiff cannot ratify the acts of such agent by suing on the note and claiming that the defenses to the old note are waived, without ratifying the whole transaction. It must either accept the entire transaction made in its behalf, or must repudiate the whole, and stand upon its original note, subject to such defenses as the defendant had thereto. To disarm the defendant of his defenses to the first note by a settlement thereof, and then to adopt the settlement only in so far as it is favorable to the plaintiff, would be to commit a fraud. He prayed that the note and the instrument of writing referred to be declared by mistake not to represent truly the contract of the parties, and that under the true contract the note is unenforceable, the defendant having, prior to the institution of the suit, tendered, and still tendering, all the money collected on the harrows, and all the notes taken therefor, and all the harrows remaining unsold. He also prayed lowed to enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another, through or by reason of an innocent mistake of law or fact, entertained without negligence by the loser, or by both parties. Park Bros. v. Blodgett & C. Co. 64 Conn. 28, 29 Atl. 133.

III. Mistake of law defined.

A mistake of law, to which this note is confined by its subject, has been defined to be an erroneous conclusion as to the legal effect of known facts. Deseret Nat. Bank v. Dinwoodey, 17 Utah, 43, 53 Pac. 215; Purvines v. Harrison, 151 Ill. 219, 37 N. E. 705.

A mistake of law occurs when a party knows the state of facts, but is ignorant of the legal consequences. Mowatt v. Wright, 1 Wend. 355, 19 Am. Dec. 508.

The construction of words is a matter of law. Purvines v. Harrison, supra.

IV. For what mistakes relief may be had.

a. Generally.

There are two well-defined classes of mistakes of law in contracts: First, a mistake in law as to the legal effect of the contract actually made; and, second, a mistake in law in reducing to writing the contract, whereby it does not carry out or effectuate the intention of the parties. In the former, the contract actually entered into will seldom, if ever, be relieved against unless there are other equitable legal features calling for the interposition of the court; but in the second class, the mistake is not in the contract, but terms are used or omitted which give the instrument a legal effect not intended by the parties, and different from the contract actually made; and here equity always grants relief unless barred on some other ground. Richmond v. Ogden Street R. Co. 44 Or. 48, 74 Pac. 333.

And errors in a contract, whether arising from mistake, surprise, or fraud, requiring a reformation are reducible to two general classes: First, cases where the contract by its terms includes subject-matter which was not intended by the parties to come within its operation; and, second, those contracts wherein, by means of the mistake, surprise, or fraud, some part of the subject-matter intended to be included within the contract has been omitted. Allen v. Kitchen, 16 Idaho, 133, — L.R.A. (N.S.)—, 100 Pac. 1052.

And a court of chancery may supply the defects of a conveyance or other instrument, not only such as arise from omissions and mistakes in the body of the instrument, but also those which arise from error in the execution. Somerville v. Trueman, 4 Harr. & McH. 43, 1 Am. Dec. 389; Smith v. Watson, 88 Iowa, 73, 55 N. W. 68.

And to warrant the correction of a written instrument for mistakes, it makes no difference whether the defect be in a statutory or a common-law requisite, or whether the parties failed to make the instrument in the form they intended, or misapprehended its legal effect. Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185, 33 Am. Dec. 193.

If, notwithstanding a mistake in an instrument, however, the intent remains clear, the mistake will be disregarded, even at law; and there is no occasion to seek a correction of the instrument by the aid of equitable principles. Criss v. English, 26 Md. 553.

And a mistake of law with reference to a contract for the purchase of real estate, against which relief will be granted by equity, must be gross and palpable, and such as would warrant the belief that undue advantage was taken of the party, owing either to his imbecility of mind, or the exercise of some improper influence over him by the party with whom he deals, or by some other person with his knowledge, consent, or procurement. Dill v. Shaban, 25 Ala. 694, 60 Am. Dec. 540.

So, where the execution of a deed is complete, a court of equity will not grant relief unless on consideration of a fair, just, and valid agreement, in pursuance whereof the deed was intended to be executed. Somerville v. Trueman, supra.

And the mistake which equity will relieve against must be something induced that the note be declared to have been procured by fraud, and to be null and void, and that he recover of the plaintiff $158, freight paid for its use, and the commission earned by him, and lost without fault on his part.

Objection was made to this amendment, and the presiding judge passed an order declaring that the plea alleging fraud was res judicata, having been passed upon at a former term of the court, on a demurrer to the pleas in the case; and that the allegations in reference to accident and mistakes were not sufficient in law to constitute any valid defense against the note sued on. A verdict was directed for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted.

by ignorance, misapprehension or misunderstanding of the truth, but without negligence, and resulting in injury to him who sets it up. Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665.

Nor will a court of equity interfere by way of reformation of a contract, where the instrument is such as the parties themselves designed it to be. Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479; McElderry v. Shipley, 2 Md. 25, 56 Am. Dec. 703; Robertson v. Walker, 51 Ala. 484; Kelly v. Turner, 74 Ala. 513; Dunham v. New Britain, 55 Conn. 378, 11 Atl. 354; *Hackemack v. Or where it appears to conform to the agreement upon which it is based. Rowe v. Horton, 65 Tex. 89.

There being no charge of fraud. Fehlberg v. Cosine, supra.

In such case the mistake is a mistake of law as to the legal effect of the terms of the instrument, and for such a mistake, except in peculiar cases, no relief can be granted. Nelson v. Davis, supra.

If the parties voluntarily chose to express themselves in the language of the contract, they must be bound by it. Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479; William Cramp & Sons Ship & Engine Bldg. Co. v. Sloan, 21 Fed. 561.

And the intention of the parties to make the instrument conform to the original agreement must have continued in the minds of the parties concurrently, down to the time of the execution of the instrument. Keedy v. Nally, 63 Md. 311; Nebraska Loan & T. Co. v. Ignowski, 54 Neb. 398, 74 N. W. 852; Bradford v. Bradford, 54 N. H. 463.

A mistake in the execution of a writing will not be corrected in equity unless it appears that the writing did not contain the intention of the parties thereto at the time 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. G. A. Meritt and Samuel H. Sibley for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Joseph B. Park and Noel P. Park for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1, 2. "If, upon demurrer, the court has decided upon the merits of the cause, the judgment may be pleaded in bar of another suit for the same cause." Civil Code 1895, § 3744. "If, in rendering its judgment upon a demurrer to a petition, the court does not decide upon the merits of the case, a judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action is not a bar to another proceeding for the same cause." Papworth v. Fitzgerald, 111 Ga. 54, 36 S. E.

it was made. Jarrell v. Jarrell, 27 W. Va. 743; Turner v. Kelly, 70 Ala. 85.

And when a writing embodies the contract actually made between the parties, the fact that they acted under a mistake of law, equity, or fact does not authorize a reformation of the contract. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 283; Douglas v. Grant, 12 Ill. App. 273.

And a note signed by a guardian binds him personally, and where its terms are such as the parties intended to use, parol evidence showing an understanding that it was to bind his ward only is inadmissible. Andrus v. Blazzard, 23 Utah, 233, 54 L.R.A. 354, 63 Pac. 888.

So, where the parties to a contract contemplated certain things during the first negotiation, the written contract, made later on, cannot be reformed to express such negotiations, where it never got beyond negotiation, and never ripened into a mutual agreement. Marshall v. Westrope, 98 Iowa, 324, 67 N. W. 257.

Nor will chancery add to a contract a term or stipulation unless it is shown that the parties intended it should be inserted. Guilmartin v. Urquahart, 82 Ala. 570, 1 So. 897; Clark v. Hart, 57 Ala. 390.

And there can be no reformation of an agreement where the only agreement was the one signed by the parties, since, if that fails to express the intention of the parties, there never was a contract entered into, and hence nothing to reform or to reform to. Marshall v. Westrope, 98 Iowa, 324, 67 N. W. 257; St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. v. Merriman, 35 Minn. 42, 27 N. W. 199.

And when parties instruct a draftsman to prepare a quitclaim deed for their execution, and he draws a deed containing language which amounts in law to a covenant of title in fee, and they sign the deed, knowing that such language is in it, they will be held to have been mistaken in the legal effect of the language used, and of the legal consequences of retaining such language in the deed. Purvines v. Harrison, 151 Ill. 219, 37 N. E. 705.

So, the fact that the parties to a contract

311. This ruling was made in regard to the plaintiff's petition, but the same principle would govern in regard to a judgment upon a demurrer to a plea. If the judgment determines that the defense set up by the plea is not good in law, this is an adjudication on the merits; and if substantially the same plea is offered again, it is res judicata. But if a plea is dismissed, not for lack of merit in the defense, but merely because the allegations are too general and wanting in specification, this is not an adjudication on the merits; and if a plea fully and distinctly alleging a good defense is offered, the matter is not res judicata. The difference between the result of a ruling on a declaration and a ruling on a plea is that, if a declaration is once dismissed for any cause, the case is out of court, and there is nothing to amend by; but the striking of one of several pleas does not take the case out of court, and there is still an opportunity for amendment, subject to the restrictions prescribed by law in that regard, and the power of the court to impose terms, in proper cases. Civil Code 1895, §§ 5097, 5057, 5068, 5101. An examination of the statement of facts preceding this opinion will show that the original allegation of fraud was stricken because it was not set forth "as required by law" (which we understand to mean, without sufficient specification), and that the amendment offered was very different. Whether this amendment amounted to a good plea of fraud, or not, we express no opinion. The omitted certain provisions from it on the supposition that it was not necessary to put them in negatives any idea of accidental omission, and presents a case against which chancery will not relieve. Clark v. Hart, supra; Rector v. Collins, 46 Ark. 167, 55 Am. Rep. 571; Shafer v. Davis, 13 Ill. 395; Meade v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 89 Va. 296, 15 S. E. 497.

And chancery will not reform a written contract by the insertion of a stipulation which was designedly omitted from the writing, performance thereof being trusted to the honor or promise of the other party to the contract. (Betts v. Gunn, 31 Ala. 219; Ligon v. Rogers, 12 Ga. 281; Brintnall v. Briggs, 87 Iowa, 538, 54 N. W. 531; Andrew v. Spurr, 8 Allen, 412; Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 3 Am. Rep. 418; Henderson v. Stokes, 42 N. J. Eq. 586, 8 Atl. 718; Roberts v. Elmore, 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 208; Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 246, 10 S. E. 239; Braun v. Wisconsin Rendering Co. 92 Wis. 245, 66 N. W. 196.

And when a petition in equity seeks by parol evidence to reform a written contract by supplying a verbal stipulation omitted by agreement, without fraud, at the time of executing such contract, such verbal stipulation being contradictory to the written contract, the insufficiency of the petition may be alleged by demurrer without answer. Roberts v. Elmore, supra.

Nor does the law require that the parties to a contract shall stand upon the same footing as to knowledge or information; when one has full and equal opportunity with the other to ascertain the facts, and no fraud appears, he must abide by the contract, although he ignorantly or negligently makes a bad bargain; each is entitled to the benefit of his own sagacity. Stettheimer v. Killip, 75 N. Y. 282; McShane v. Hazlehurst, 50 Md. 107.

And a written instrument cannot be set aside for mistake if it was read over to the party attacking it, before execution, and no provision was omitted which he supposed to be inserted, though he failed to think of some contingency concerning which, had he thought of it, some provision would have been made which is not contained in such deed. Taylor v. Buttrick, 165 Mass. 547, 52 Am. St. Rep. 530, 43 N. E. 507; Powe v. Culver, 81 Conn. 49, 69 Atl. 1050; Wise v. Brooks, 69 Miss. 891, 13 So. 836; Whittemore v. Farrington, 76 N. Y. 452.

The real question is, What did the parties intend at the time, uninformed as they were? Wise v. Brooks, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Gough, 61 Ind. 147.

And where one who, under a verbal agreement for the conveyance of lands, is entitled to insist upon a good title and a deed with covenants, pays the consideration, and is tendered a deed without covenants, which he, after demand and refusal of a deed conforming to the agreement, accepts, believing the title to be clear, and goes into possession, and continues to occupy and improve the premises, and an encumbrance unknown at the time to either party is thereafter discovered, in the absence of fraud, no legal liability rests upon the grantor, and the grantee is entitled to no equitable relief, and the acceptance of the deed cannot be set aside on the ground of mistake. Whittemore v. Farrington, 76 N. Y. 452.

And a party contracting in writing to sell a lot of land, and to convey and release the same to the vendee upon a good and sufficient deed, binds himself to give a good title to such land; and when he has given such a deed in pursuance of the agreement, he cannot complain that its covenants protect the vendee from certain liens which it was verbally understood he should be liable for, and the contract will not be reformed, where no fraud or mutual mistake is shown. Story v. Conger, 36 N. Y. 673, 93 Am. Dec. 546.

Nor will a deed in which the grantee assumes to pay a specific mortgage be reformed on the ground of mutual mistake, so as to provide for the assumption of a second mortgage, the existence of which was unknown to the grantee, and forgotten by the grantor at the time the deed was made. Moore v. Graves, 97 Iowa, 4, 65 N. W. 1008.

And a written instrument executed by parties between whom there is no special relation of trust or confidence will not be judge, in passing on its merits, might hold it to be a good plea, or he might hold that it made one of those not infrequent cases where the parties say one thing orally and another in the written contract, and fail to show any sufficient reason why they signed it as written. A man cannot talk one way as to a contract, deliberately and knowingly sign it in writing another way, and expect the courts to relieve him of the results of his folly. As to this plea we say nothing, as the trial judge has not passed on the point. What we hold is that the matter was not res judicata by reason of the decision on the demurrer.

3. The presiding judge held that the allegation in reference to accident and mistake constituted no valid defense. In this reformed so as to omit a particular clause, on the ground that the same was inserted through the mutual mistake of the parties, when the party against whom the reformation is sought knew of the insertion of the clause at the time of the execution, and the party seeking the reformation might have known such fact, had he read the instrument. Metropolitan Loan Assn. v. Esche, 75 Cal. 513, 17 Pac. 675.

So, to reform an instrument for mistake, it must appear by clear and satisfactory evidence that the mistake related to a matter essential and material. Mills v. Kampfe, 135 App. Div. 748, 119 N. Y. Supp. 903; Burns v. Caskey, 100 Mich. 94, 58 N. W. 642; Daggett v. Ayer, 65 N. H. 82, 18 Atl. 169; Deare v. Carr, 3 N. J. Eq. 513.

And it must be shown that the party seeking the reformation would be prejudiced by a failure to reform. Conaway v. Gore, 24 Kan. 389.

A party who seeks the annulment of his contract on the ground of error must establish error as to the nature of the contract, or as to the substance of the object of the contract, or as to the substantial qualities of such contract. Prescott v. Cooper, 37 La. Ann. 553.

Nor will a contract be reformed which must be construed and carried into effect before reformation exactly as it would be after it had been reformed. Rue v. Meirs, 43 N. J. Eq. 377, 2 Atl. 369; Grael v. Soeller, 52 Hun, 375, 5 N. Y. Supp. 254; British & American Mortg. Co. v. Long, 113 N. C. 123, 18 S. E. 165.

And if omitting to name the grantor in the premises of a deed be a mere clerical error, not affecting the title, the aid of the chancellor is not needed to correct it. Carr v. Williams, 10 Ohio, 305, 36 Am. Dec. 87.

Nor will equity relieve against a mistake in a written instrument unless the mistake is perfectly distinct from the sense of the instrument. Jarrell v. Jarrell, 27 W. Va. 743.

So, to justify the reformation of a writ-we are unable to agree with him. "Mere ignorance of the law on the part of the party himself, where the facts are all known, and there is no misplaced confidence, and no artifice or deception or fraudulent practice is used by the other party, either to induce the mistake of law or to prevent its correction, will not authorize the intervention of equity." Civil Code 1895, § 3978. But "an honest mistake of the law as to the effect of an instrument, on the part of both contracting parties, when such mistake operates as a gross injustice to one, and gives an unconscientious advantage to the other, may be relieved in equity." Civil Code 1895, § 3979. The distinction between ignorance of what the law is, and mutual mistake as to the effect of an inten instrument, the complainant is bound to establish the mutual agreement of all parties to the instrument to the precise contract alleged to have been in fact the original agreement, and that the written instrument failed to express the common agreement because of accident or of mutual mistake of all the parties, or by mistake on one side, induced by fraud on the other. Simpkins v. Taylor, 81 Hun, 467, 31 N. Y. Supp. 169; Whittemore v. Farrington, 76 N. Y. 452; Gaffney Mercantile Co. v. Hopkins, 21 Mont. 13, 52 Pac. 561; Gunter v. Thomas, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 199.

And this is so, although the court may believe that the complainant has been hardly dealt with. Gunter v. Thomas, supra.

To entitle a party to a decree of a court of equity, reforming a written instrument, he must show a plain mistake, clearly made out by satisfactory proofs. Berringer v. Schaefer, 52 How. Pr. 69; Mead v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 453; Stettheimer v. Killip, 75 N. Y. 282; Turner v. Kelly, 70 Ala. 85; Smith v. Watson, 88 Iowa, 73, 55 N. W. 68; Young v. Coleman, 43 Mo. 179; Zentmyer v. Mittower, 5 Pa. 403; Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827.

It must be made clearly to appear that something has been inserted contrary to the intention and agreement of the parties, or that something has been omitted which it was intended should be inserted. Barnes v. Bartlett, 47 Ind. 98; Heavenridge v. Mondy, 49 Ind. 434; Breja v. Pryne, 94 Iowa, 755, 64 N. W. 669.

And it must be shown that the intention and agreement of both parties to the contract were, by mistake, misrepresented by the terms thereof. Nelson v. Davis, 40 Ind. 366; Mead v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 453; Seward v. Spurgeon, 9 Wash. 74, 37 Pac. 303.

And where no fraud or inequitable conduct is proved, and no mistake, mutual or otherwise, appears, no case is made out for the reformation or rescission of a contract. Husted v. Van Ness, 1 App. Div. 120, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1043; Miller v. Carpenter, 68 strument, may not always appear to be very clearly defined; but it is well settled that there is a distinction. Culbreath v. Culbreath, 7 Ga. 64, 50 Am. Dec. 375; Adair v. McDonald, 42 Ga. 506; Ham v. Parkerson, 68 Ga. 830. It was alleged in the proposed amendment that facts existed which would have authorized the defendant to plead failure of consideration to the original note; that, under the statement of the agent of the plaintiffs, a new note was given, the result of which would be to destroy that plea (Lunsford v. Malsby, 101 Ga. 39, 28 S. E. 496); that this was only intended for a security until the settlement agreed on should be consummated; that the agent, for the purpose of giving him "a showing" for his protection, wrote, signed in the name of the plaintiff, by himself as agent, and delivered to defendant, a paper which read: "I agree to receipt J. G. Dolvin for note given me to-day, April 11, 1901, for $934.18, note due January 1st, 1902;" that this was intended by both parties to signify an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to receipt for and cancel the obligation represented by the new note, upon compliance with the agreement to deliver up the unsold harrows and account for those sold; that it was drawn by the agent and accepted by the defendant, who was unlearned in the law; and that the use of inapt words to accomplish that result, and the fact that the paper may not have had that effect, was due to a mutual mistake. It was alleged that there was a mutual mistake as to

App. Div. 346, 74 N. Y. Supp. 231; Comer v. Himes, 49 Ind. 482; White v. Port Huron & M. R. Co. 13 Mich. 356.

• And a bill filed to correct a mistake in a written instrument and to reform the contract should aver expressly that the instrument, as it is, differs from the intention of the parties, and state particularly wherein it differs. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 526; Electric Goods Mfg. Co. v. Koltonski, 171 Fed. 550.

Nor will the court revoke a conveyance and divest an estate if there was no mistake, but only an instrument not so carefully drawn as it might have been. Lee v. Frick, 2 W. N. C. 11.

And a bond will not be reformed merely because it has become less effectual than it was expected to prove, where it was drawn precisely as the parties wanted it, and for many years had completely answered its purpose. Middletown v. Newport Hospital, 16 R. I. 319, 1 L.R.A. 191, 15 Atl. 800.

And the death of one of the parties to an agreement, and the consequent insufficiency of a security selected by them, intended to be valid and complete, but which was not so, will not give the right to equity to interfere. Hunt v. Rhodes, 1 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 27.

Nor will relief be granted in equity with reference to a contract where no word was inserted in it nor omitted from it not intentionally inserted or omitted, but there had been a miscarriage in an attempt to limit personal liability, and it cannot be ascertained exactly what the precise intentions of the parties were. Dennis v. Dennis, 4 Rich. Eq. 307.

And where no fraud or mistake is charged, and an error of judgment occurred, by which the chances that certain things would happen were overrated, this does not constitute a ground for the interference of a court of equity. Bispham v. Price, 15 How. 162, 14 L. ed. 644.

But there is no absolute requirement as to what an instrument must contain to be susceptible of reformation. It is not required to be certain and complete in any respect; it is only necessary that there be an honest attempt to reduce the contract to writing. House v. McMullen, 9 Cal. App. 664, 100 Pac. 344.

Under the Massachusetts statute of 1856, chap. 38, a court of equity has jurisdiction to reform a deed made before its passage. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373.

b. Rule that ignorance or mistake of law does not excuse.

1. General statement of.

The rule has been strongly asserted that equity will not relieve from an act done under mistake of law, unmixed with matters of fact, unless there is some additional ground for equitable relief. McDaniels v. Bank of Rutland, 29 Vt. 230, 70 Am. Dec. 406; Mellish v. Robertson, 25 Vt. 603; Iladen v. Ware, 15 Ala. 149; Clark v. Hart, 57 Ala. 390; *Steinfeld v. the effect of this instrument, or, if not, that then there was a deliberate trick of the agent, to destroy the defendant's legal defense to the first note, and give him a meaningless paper under the guise of a protection against the last note. It has been held that this paper was not ambiguous, and could not be explained by parol. American Harrow Co. v. Dolvin, 119 Ga. 186, 45 S. E. 983. But we can well understand how there might have been a mutual mistake in regard to its effect. To receive a note, and at the same time give not an actual receipt for it, but an agreement to receipt for it, is unusual. What the parties may have meant, we do not say; but the plea of mutual mistake as to its effect was sufficient to withstand the objection urged against it in its entirety, in the nature of a general demurrer. In so far as the plea sought to allege that the original contract and note were not what they plainly purported to be, it was insufficient. Nor was it a sufficient plea as to other instruments beside the particular one pleaded, and as to which a mutual mistake of law was alleged. A mere general reference to "other blank forms" required to be signed is no proper plea of mutual mistake as to such instruments as may have thus been signed. No objection, however, appears to have been raised, or ruling made, as to any special part of the plea, but only to the whole. Let it be borne in mind also that for a plea of mutual mistake of law to prove a successful defense, the mistake must have been mutual as to the effect of the in-

Under this rule, courts of equity do not correct mistakes in law unless other equitable elements occur, such as surprise, undue influence, bad faith, fraud, imposition, and the like. *Sandlin v. Parties to contracts are assumed to know the liabilities imposed on them by the law. Gist v. Drakely, supra.

And ignorance of the law will not excuse, in a civil case, a wrong done or a right withheld. Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bail. L. 623, 23 Am. Dec. 155; Rochester & K. F. Land Co. v. Davis, 79 Hun, 69, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1148.

And it does not affect contracts, or excuse a party from the legal consequences of particular acts. Rankin v. Mortimere, 7 Watts, 372; Goltra v. Sanasack, supra; Dailey v. Jessup, 72 Mo. 144.

And when a party with knowledge of all the material facts, and without any special circumstances giving rise to an equity in his behalf, enters into a transaction affecting his interests, rights, and liabilities, under ignorance or error with respect to the rules of law controlling the case, courts will not relieve him from the consequences of his mistake. Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892; Campbell v. Carter, 14 Ill. 286.

Nor is ignorance of the law, and a consequent mistake as to title, founded upon such ignorance, ground to rescind agreements, or to set aside the solemn acts of the parties. Farnsworth v. Dinsmore, supra; Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529, 42 Am. Dec. 447.

Unless there be imposition, misrepresentation, undue influence, misplaced confidence, or suspicion. Trigg v. Read, supra.

And the fact that, through some error or misconception on the part of a vendee, his written order was for a larger quantity of goods than he wished, will not, in the absence of fraud, justify a reformation of the order, or constitute a defense in an action for the purchase price of the goods. J. A. Coates & Sons v. Buck, 93 Wis. 128, 67 N. W. 23.

So, where a conveyance was such as the parties intended it should be, and the gran-strument. Mere general statements of omissions avail nothing. "An allegation of fraud, any more than an allegation of mistake, can not be used as a mere cover to bring in an oral agreement, contemporaneous with the note, and in variance with its terms." Mansfield v. Barber, 59 Ga. 854; Smith v. Brooks, 65 Ga. 356, 360.

4. It is a rule of law that ratification involves knowledge of the facts on the part of the person ratifying, at the time when the ratification is made. But it is also a rule that if an agent exceeds his authority, the principal cannot ratify in part and repudiate in part; he must adopt either the whole or none. Civil Code 1895, § 3021; Hodnett v. Tatum, 9 Ga. 70; Howard v. Cassels, 105 Ga. 412, 70 Am. St. Rep. 44,

31 S. E. 562; McLean v. Clark, 47 Ga. 28. It was alleged in the proposed amendment that the agent had authority to do what he did; but if not, that his acts were ratified; that the settlement, the giving of the new note, and the signing of the paper, were all parts of one transaction; and that the principal could not sue on the note so secured, claim that the defense to the old note had been thereby waived, and thus retain the note, continue to press the suit, and adopt the settlement by which it was obtained only so far as was favorable to him, and reject the balance. If the agent in fact did the acts alleged in the plea, and thus obtained the note, and this was in excess of his authority, upon discovery of the facts, the principal could ratify the whole trans-tee may, in good conscience, retain the property, a court of chancery will generally refuse its interference, although the grantor may have been mistaken as to the extent of his title. Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 139.

And the fact that a person is unlearned and ignorant of legal proceedings affords no ground of relief in equity, unless it also appears that he relied for information upon persons against whom relief is sought, and such persons misrepresented the state of facts. Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 20, 87 Am. Dec. 146.

And a party who has committed a tortious act in consequence of a mistake of law will not be relieved from the consequences of it by a court of equity, where the other party was not in fault. Pettes v. Bank of Whitehall, 17 Vt. 435.

Nor will contracts made on the faith of the law as enunciated in a decision of a court of last resort, in the absence of fraud, misrepresentation, or want of knowledge of all the facts, be set aside because of a subsequent decision by the same court, overruling the former one, since a mistake of law is no ground for relief. Pittsburgh & L. A. Iron Co. v. Lake Superior Iron Co. 118 Mich. 109, 76 N. W. 395; Kenyon v. Welty, 20 Cal. 637, 81 Am. Dec. 137.

And a court of equity will not reform a written instrument by supplying the expression of an intention of the parties, omitted through mistake of law, and not of fact. Allen v. Anderson, 44 Ind. 395.

And the word "mistake," used in a statute conferring jurisdiction in equity in cases of mistake, if not in terms limited to mistakes of fact, may be presumed to have been used as it is generally understood in equity. Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 556.

So, where accounting officers of the government have jurisdiction of a claim, their adjustment, in the absence of fraud or mistake of fact, cannot be attacked after payment, and the money recovered back because of their mistake of law. Mullett v. United States, 21 Ct. Cl. 485.

In applying the maxim that ignorance of law does not excuse, however, the courts have, in cases of particular hardship, distinguished between ignorance of the existence of a law, and of its legal effect; and held that parties who entered into a contract under mutual mistake as to the legal effect of a law will be relieved in a court of equity. State v. Paup, 13 Ark. 129, 56 Am. Dec. 303.

Mistake of law differs from ignorance of the law in that the former is capable of proof, and the latter not. The former acts after reasoning, and the latter without reasoning. Lawrence v. Beaubien, supra.

And refusal to charge that the omission of the word "heirs" from a deed was done in ignorance of law, and not from a mistake of law, is not improper, since the request calls for an expression of opinion as to the sufficiency of the testimony. Brock v. O'Dell, 44 S. C. 22, 21 S. E. 976.

And a contract for the sale of lands, made under the mistaken idea that the legislative power would pass laws which would greatly enhance the value of the land, which expectation was the only inducement to entering into the contract, will be relieved from, in equity, if such laws are not passed, and no fault is imputable to the parties to the contract. Miles v. Stevens, 3 Pa. St. 21, 45 Am. Dec. 627.

In Schlesinger v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 16, however, it was said by Casey, Ch. J., that the distinction attempted to be drawn between ignorance and mistake of law, and holding that money paid in ignorance is irrevocable, while that paid under mistake or misconstruction may be sued for and recovered back, is a refinement too subtle to be applied to the everyday business of life.

The rule of this subdivision would seem to be the common-law rule, and it is retained up to the present time in some of the states the courts of which are regarded as of high authority. But the weight of modern judicial opinion seems to lead to the general adoption of a somewhat conflicting rule, which will be hereinafter considered.

action or reject it. Even the suit on the note, if in ignorance of the facts, would perhaps not alone destroy the principal's right to act on discovery of them. But the principal cannot, after knowledge, ratify only so far as to retain the new note and continue to insist on its collection, with whatever advantages it might give, and yet repudiate as unauthorized all the rest of the agent's acts in the same transaction in which the note was obtained. Of course, we do not mean to intimate that there was any fraud or mistake on the part of the agent, but merely to hold that the company cannot, after knowledge of the facts, adopt his acts in part, if he exceeded his authority, and reject the balance. It would be in no worse position by ratification than if the agent had original authority to act for it, and the same contentions would be open to it; but if it ratifies, it is in no better position, and cannot say that he was without authority in part.

In Central R. Co. v. James, 117 Ga. 834, 45 S. E. 224 it was said: "Where the owner of goods does not attend to their shipment in person, but procures another to act in his behalf, who does so without disclosing the name of his principal, the latter is bound by the terms of the contract which his agent makes with the carrier, to the same extent as though the contract was made by the principal in person, irrespective of the question whether the agent did or did not go outside of the authority with which he was vested. This is true for the all-suffi-

2. Construction of instrument.

Mutual mistake as to the construction of a contract will not entitle either party to relief in equity. Midland G. W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 6 H. L. Cas. 798; Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106.

And equity will not take cognizance of an action brought nominally to reform an instrument, but really to obtain a judicial construction which shall make its meaning certain. Husted v. Van Ness, 1 App. Div. 120, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1043.

Nor can a written contract be set aside merely because one of the parties to it put an erroneous construction on the words in which it was expressed. Wilding v. Sanderson, [1897] 2 Ch. 534; Oswald v. Sproehnle, 16 Ill. App. 368.

The misconstruction of a contract as written is a mistake of law, and not of fact. Sibert v. McAvoy, supra.

And that a party to a contract thought the contract meant what the law says it does not mean is not the kind of a mistake that affords a basis for reformation of the instrument, or relief from its terms as the parties wrote them. Cochran v. Pew, 159 Pa. 185, 28 Atl. 219.

So, where an executor and a legatee honestly misconstrue a will, and have a settlement in full, based on such misconstruction, the settlement will not be opened merely because of such misconstruction. Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349.

And an agreement between two persons forming a partnership for the transaction of a general book and stationery business, one of them to be guaranteed $2,000 per annum, the same to come out of his half of the profits, but should one half the profits not amount to $2,000 in the year, he should not be held for any deficiency in the salary account, running a year from date, is a copartnership agreement, and the supposition of the second party that the tract guaranteed him a salary of $2,000 a year, and half the profits above that sum, but that he should not be liable as partner for any losses in business, was a mistake of law, for which he was not entitled to relief. Woolworth v. McPherson, 55 Fed. 558.

So, where a deed embraced three distinct parcels of land, but excepted therefrom a street theretofore deeded to the city and embraced in the lot, the words of the exception are descriptive only, and it makes no difference whether the street was ever deeded or not; and if the ground can be identified, title does not pass under the deed, and the grantee is not entitled to have the deed reformed. Rushton v. Hallett, 8 Utah, 277, 30 Pac. 1014.

3. Mistake or ignorance as to legal consequences.

(a) General rules.

The general rule, subject to some modifications as well as some conflict in cases in which the mistake will result in a failure to effectuate the intention of the parties, to effectuate which is regarded by many of the cases as the primary object of equitable jurisdiction,—appears to be that where an instrument speaks the true agreement between the parties, equity will not reform it because one or both of them may have mistaken its legal consequences. Moore v. Tate, 114 Ala. 582, 21 So. 820; Trapp v. Moore, 21 Ala. 693; Orr v. Echols, 119 Ala. 340, 24 So. 357; Larkins v. Bidde, 21 Ala. 252; Ohlander v. Dexter, 97 Ala. 476, 12 So. 51; *Rector v. cient reason that the principal cannot take advantage of the contract made in his behalf without fully ratifying the act of his agent and becoming bound thereby." In Southern R. Co. v. Parramore, 119 Ga. 692, 46 S. E. 822, this statement was quoted approvingly. In Supreme Conclave K. of D. v. O'Connell, 107 Ga. 101, 32 S. E. 948, it was said: "It is a well-recognized principle of law that a principal can take no benefit from a contract into which his agent has fraudulently induced a third party to enter; for the principal cannot in part ratify and in part repudiate the act of his agent in effecting the contract." See also Atlas Tack Co. v. Exchange Bank, 111 Ga. 703, 36 S. E. 939; Lamar v. Pearre, 90 Ga. 378, 17 S. E. 92 (5); Lewis v. Equitable Mortg.

In the absence of fraud or mistake of fact. Parsons v. Fairbanks and Gordere v. Downing, supra.

And this is especially true when the rights of creditors intervene. Holmes v. Hall, supra.

Under this rule, ignorance of a party's legal right at the time he makes a contract is no ground for avoiding it. Hutton v. Edgerton, 6 S. C. 485; Broadwell v. Broadwell, 6 Ill. 599.

And a mistake on the part of a person executing an instrument, as to its legal effect, or that it has an effect different from that intended, cannot avail to avoid that construction of the instrument which the language used, and the rules of law, as applied thereto, require. Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138.

Nor will a mistake in the legal meaning of words used in a deed or other contract, or in the proper construction of the words 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Co. 94 Ga. 573, 21 S. E. 224 (2). In De Vaughn v. McLeroy, 82 Ga. 700, 10 S. E. 214, it is said that "to bind a person by a ratification of an illegal or void act, it must be shown that such person had full knowledge, at the time of the alleged ratification, of the facts which make such act illegal or void." But on page 701 of 82 Ga., it is said: "It is true, if the award involves the interest of T. E. B. McLeroy in the land which his heirs are now suing for, that his suit for the money awarded to him in the adjustment of his money demand against his guardian, and the transfer of the judgment which he obtained, would also be a ratification of the award upon his interest in the land; because it is a plain, elementary principle of law, sustained by all au-employed, or as to the legal effect of those words, where no fraud, undue influence, or imposition has been used, afford any equitable ground for a reformation of the instrument, such mistake being one of law. Fowler v. Black, 136 Ill. 363, 11 L.R.A. 670, 26 N. E. 596.

And a company entering into a contract cannot claim a reformation of the contract on the ground that there was a mutual mistake in a reservation clause therein, where it appears that the original reservation clause was drawn by the counsel for the company, or was entirely satisfactory to him, and that the only mistake therein was one of law as to the effect of the reservation. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shepard, 49 App. Div. 345, 63 N. Y. Supp. 435.

Nor will relief from a contract be given by equity on application of a party who knew just what his bargain was, and just how much of it was set out in the contract, and that part of it was omitted, and knew exactly what he was doing, though it is possible he did not fully understand the legal effect of his acts. Roemer v. Conlon, 45 N. J. Eq. 234, 19 Atl. 664.

And if an agreement or written instrument expresses the thought and intention which the parties had at the time and in the act concluding it, no relief, affirmative or defensive, will be granted with respect to it, upon the assumption that their intention and thought would have been different if they had not been mistaken as to the legal meaning and effect of the terms and provisions by which such intention is embodied and expressed. Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892.

And where the facts are known to both parties to a contract, and each acts on his own judgment, the court will not rescind it because it may or does turn out that they or either of them were mistaken as to the legal effect of the facts or the rights or obligations of the parties thereunder, and particularly when such mistake can in no way injuriously affect the rights of the party complaining under the contract, or prevent him from obtaining and thority, that he could not ratify what was advantageous to him, and repudiate what was against his interests." See also Harrell v. Terrell, 125 Ga. 379, 54 S. E. 116. In Smith v. Hodson, 4 T. R. 211, it was held, that "if a bankrupt, on the eve of his bankruptcy . . . fraudulently deliver goods to one of his creditors, the assignees may disaffirm the contract, and recover the value of the goods in trover; but if they bring assumpsit, they affirm the contract, and then the creditor may set off his debt." In Peters v. Ballistier, 3 Pick. 495, 505, it was held that where assumpsit was brought for the proceeds of a sale, if insisted on, it ratified the sale; but if the plaintiff discovered his error, dismissed the action of assumpsit, and brought an action of trover receiving all the benefit contemplated by it, and to which he is entitled under it. Seeley v. Reed, 25 Fed. 361.

So, an erroneous opinion as to the legal effect and operation of a conveyance is a mistake of law, which furnishes no ground for a reformation of the deed. Kelly v. Turner, 74 Ala. 513.

And where the parties to a contract adopt a security which is to be used to effectuate their intention, if the security should fail, from ignorance of the law, or from any other cause, to operate as the parties intended, the courts cannot substitute any other security for the one adopted. Lanning v. Carpenter, 48 N. Y. 408.

And where the evidence in a case discloses simply a mistake of law in a grantor in supposing his deed could be delivered after his death, and not a mistake of fact, in having a clause inserted therein, that it was not to be delivered until his death, a court of equity will not reform the deed by striking out the clause. Griffin v. Miller, 188 Mo. 327, 87 S. W. 455.

(b) Application to particular cases.

(1) Deeds, mortgages, leases, etc.

Within the rule that ignorance or mistake of law does not excuse, a mistake of the parties as to the effect and validity of a deed is a mistake of law, which will not authorize a reformation of the instrument. Morton v. Morris, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 262, 66 S. W. 94; Kopp v. Gunther, 95 Cal. 63, 30 Pac. 301; Lawrence v. Lawrence, 181 Ill. 248, 54 N. E. 918; Toops v. Snyder, 70 Ind. 554; Wetmore v. Holsman, 14 Abb. Pr. 311, 23 How. Pr. 202.

And a mistake upon the part of the parties in supposing that the making of certain deeds would not impair or destroy a life estate of one of the parties is a mistake as to the legal effect and force of the deeds, and one which cannot be corrected in equity. Allen v. Anderson, 44 Ind. 395.

And the placing of words limiting an estate conveyed in a deed in the habendum infor the property, this did not amount to a ratification. In the case before us, apparently the principal must have known of the taking of the original note, and that the agent had it for settlement. It received the new note which the agent obtained, and brought suit on it. For other cases on the subject of ratification by suit, see also Ingraham v. Barber, 72 Ga. 158; Singleton v. Bank of Monticello, 113 Ga. 527, 38 S. E. 947; Thomas v. Bagley, 119 Ga. 780, 47 S. E. 177; Franklin v. Ezell, 1 Sneed, 497; Beidman v. Goodell, 56 Iowa, 592, 9 N. W. 900; Partridge v. White, 59 Me. 564; Reinhard, Agency, § 123, and note; D. M. Osborn Co. v. Jordan, 52 Neb. 465, 72 N. W. 479; Eadie v. Ashbaugh, 44 Iowa, 519; Plano Mfg. Co. v. Millage, 14 S. D. 331, stead of in the premises thereof is a mistake in law of the draftsman and the parties, and not a mistake of fact of the draftsman. Condor v. Secrest, 149 N. C. 201, 62 S. E. 921.

Nor can a person who takes a deed, relying upon a recital in it of the number of acres conveyed as a guaranty of the quantity, thereby mistaking the legal effect of the instrument, obtain relief in equity upon that ground. Martin v. Hamlin, 18 Mich. 355, 100 Am. Dec. 181.

And parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a grantor, in describing the boundaries of land sold in a deed, supposed that the words used would have an effect different from that which the law affixes to them. Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 474.

So, where a purchaser of certain real property caused the conveyance thereof to be made to his wife, under the impression that, in the event of her death, it would descend to him, such mistake does not entitle him, on the death of his wife, to a reformation of the deed, as against the children of himself and wife. Dever v. Dever, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1988, 44 S. W. 986.

And the use of the words "their bodily heirs" in a deed to the grantor's daughter and her husband, under the impression that all of the children of the daughter, though by other husbands, would take, is a mistake of law, and cannot be corrected in equity, where the grantor knew that the word "their" was used before he signed the deed, but insisted that he knew the legal effect thereof, and that it expressed his meaning. Atherton v. Roche, 192 Ill. 252, 55 L.R.A. 591, 61 N. E. 357.

In the above case, Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892, infra, IV. c, 2, and Kyner v. Boll, 182 Ill. 171, 54 N. E. 925, infra, IV. c, 1, were distinguished on the ground that in both those cases words were inserted in the deeds sought to be reformed without the procurement, knowledge, or consent of the grantees, which limited the title to a life estate in the grantees.

So, a mistake as to the law of descents, where the intention in making a deed was

85 N. W. 594; Joslin v. Miller, 14 Neb. 91, 15 N. W. 214; Sycamore Marsh Harvester Mfg. Co. v. Sturm, 13 Neb. 210, 13 N. W. 202; McKeighan v. Hopkins, 19 Neb. 33, 26 N. W. 614; 1 Clark & S. Agency, § 142 (a). In Johnston v. Milwaukee & W. Invest. Co. 49 Neb. 68, 68 N. W. 383 (8), it was held as follows: "In the case at bar, plaintiff commenced an action of replevin to recover of the defendants certain cattle, the possession of which had been acquired by defendants through an alleged unauthorized sale of the cattle to them by an agent of plaintiff. The defendants' answer was a general denial. After the commencement of the action, but before trial, the plaintiff gained knowledge that it had received the benefit of a portion of the proceeds of the unauthorized sale. Held, that it should then have returned to the defendants so much of the proceeds of the sale as had been applied to its benefit, or tendered such return, and its failure to do so would be a ratification of the sale, which related back to its inception, and which could be proved on the trial by defendants under the general denial, and without the filing on their part of a supplemental answer setting up such ratification." Farmers' & M. Bank v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 379, 68 N. W. 488. The present case differs from that of Graham v. Williams, 114 Ga. 716, 40 S. E. 790, in which it was held that a plaintiff must have a cause of action when he brings suit, and that if the defendant has a complete defense at the time suit is brought, he cannot be deprived thereof by a third party ratifying a deed which, at

to vest the estate descending in the grantee, affords no ground for relief in equity. Thompson v. Thompson, 18 Ohio St. 73.

And where lands were conveyed by a father to his daughter and her husband, and afterwards the husband died and the widow joined with the children in disposing of the property, supposing that she owned a half interest therein, equity will afford her no relief upon her discovery that, as survivor of her husband, she was entitled to the whole land, since her mistake as to her rights was a mistake of law. Zollman v. Moore, 21 Gratt. 313.

So, where the consent of the owner of land to the laying out or altering of a highway across his lands is given under a mistake of law, no relief in equity can be given him. Marble v. Whitney, 28 N. Y. 297.

And where a loan was made and an absolute deed was agreed upon as security, and it did not appear that either party understood the legal distinction between a deed and a mortgage, or knew that a contemporaneous agreement for a defeasance might make an apparently absolute deed a mortgage, and a deed and defeasance agreement were executed, the lender is not entitled to have the instrument reformed so as to make it an absolute deed. Ackerman v. Begrish (N. J. Eq.) 50 Atl. 673.

So, although, in the absence of direct proof of intention, equity will intend a merger or the contrary, from the interests of a party taking a deed being in one direction or the other, it cannot prevent a merger contrary to his interest, where he clearly intended to do the acts which legally effect a merger, although he may have done them under an erroneous view of their legal consequences. Loomer v. Wheelwright, 3 Sandf. Ch. 135.

And where a complainant alleged that he was induced to execute certain deeds by the false representations of the defendants and through his own ignorance of the fact that the lands had been owned by his mother, and devised by her to him, and the evidence failed to substantiate the bill, he could not be allowed to change his position, and claim relief on the ground that, although he voluntarily executed the deeds to the defendants, he did so under a mistake as to the extent of his interest in the lands conveyed. Pasman v. Montague, 30 N. J. Eq. 385.

And where grantors had contracted to sell a building to grantees, with the land on which it stood, and the deed was drawn without including a right of way across a piece of ground in front of the buildings, long used in connection therewith by the grantors before the conveyance, and by the grantees afterwards, with their acquiescence, and which was of little value for any other purpose, the deed will not be reformed in equity at the grantees' instance, so as to include such grant, although they supposed at the time of delivery that it was included in the grant by legal effect. Mullin v. Eaton (N. H.) 19 Atl. 371.

A deed absolute in form, however, if given to secure the payment of a debt, will be treated in equity as a mortgage; and the facts and circumstances attending its execution may be shown by parol evidence. Ahern v. McCarthy, 107 Cal. 382, 40 Pac. 482.

But to convert a deed absolute on its face into a mortgage, it must be alleged and proved that the clause of redemption was omitted by reason of ignorance, mistake, fraud, or undue advantage taken of the bargainor. Briant v. Corpening, 62 N. C. (Phill. Eq.) 325.

So, a stranger who voluntarily pays money due on a mortgage, and fails to take an assignment thereof, but allows it to be canceled and discharged, cannot afterwards come into equity, and, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake of fact, have the mortgage reinstated, and himself substituted in the place of the mortgagee. Guy v. DuUprey, 16 Cal. 196, 76 Am. Dec. 518; Bentley v. Whittemore, 18 N. J. Eq. 366.

And where a person purchases land sub-the commencement of the suit, was without binding force for want of such ratification. It also differs from Baldwin Fertilizer Co. v. Thompson, 106 Ga. 480, 32 S. E. 591, where the principal only received notes to the possession of which it was legally entitled regardless of the agreement of the agent.

If anything said in this opinion apparently is not in accord with what was said when the case was here before, it will readily be explained by noticing the difference in the questions then and now involved, and the points then and now decided. It was then sought to introduce parol evidence, on the ground that the paper given by the agent was ambiguous. This evidence was admitted, and the judge charged on the basis of it, including a charge on the subject of ratification. The rulings were that the evidence was erroneously admitted, and that the charge based on it was therefore also error. There was some discussion as to the evidence of ratification, and other evidence, but this is to be construed in reference to the questions involved. Here a plea was rejected, on objection in the nature of a demurrer, which plea alleged original authority, or, if none, ratification. We rule nothing as to the facts as they may appear from the evidence. This decision is based on the pleadings. As the error in the rulings in regard to the pleas was fundamental, it is needless to discuss further points in the trial.

ject to two mortgages, and, after paying them, cancels them on the record, and in consequence the land is sold under the lien of a judgment subsequent to the mortgages, but prior to the deed, of which he was ignorant, he will not be relieved in equity on the ground that he was ignorant of the legal effect of the cancelation. Garwood v. Eldridge, 2 N. J. Eq. 145, 34 Am. Dec. 195.

And if a mortgage on lands is paid off by the purchaser of the equity of redemption, and canceled in effect and on the record by the purchaser while under the misapprehension that his title is good, he cannot, upon the discovery that his title is not good, have the canceling set aside and the mortgage declared in force, on the ground that had he then known of the defect in his title, he would have taken an assignment of the mortgage to protect his title; the mistake must be a mistake as to matter of fact, and not as to a question of law. Bentley v. Whittemore, supra.

And a complaint alleging that a conveyance to mortgagees in satisfaction of the mortgage debt was made upon the mistaken belief that the mortgages and notes secured thereby were valid, shows merely a mistake of law, against which equity will not relieve. Kyes v. Merrill Furniture Co. 92 Wis. 32, 65 N. W. 735.

And where a mortgagee bid in property for a much larger sum than the amount due by the decree of sale, under the advice of counsel that he would not be required to pay over any surplus to the mortgagor, and being advised that he is entitled to retain such surplus, because he is already the owner of the property so sold, he is not entitled to be relieved from his bid on the alleged ground that he acted under a mistake. Shear v. Robinson, 18 Fla. 379.

So, where a mortgage bore interest at 8 per cent during its currency, and this was regularly paid, and the mortgage was not paid when it was due, and in ignorance upon the part of both parties that only 6 per cent interest accrued after it became due, the mortgagor continued to pay 8 per cent, the excess cannot be recovered back, as money paid under mistake, nor can it be applied in reduction of the principal in a redemption action. Stewart v. Ferguson, 31 Ont. Rep. 112.

Nor is the intention of a mortgagee, or his understanding of the effect of an assignment of a mortgage, material in an action involving such assignment, in the absence of any allegation that any fraud was practised upon him to induce him to make it. Dixon v. Clayville, 44 Md. 573.

And where an instrument in writing accurately expressed the intent and meaning of the parties to the agreement, the fact that they thought it was a mortgage, when it was in fact a conditional sale, does not change its character or effect, or furnish ground for a reformation. Hershey v. Luce, 56 Ark. 320, 19 S. W. 963, 20 S. W. 6.

And where two mortgages were foreclosed by advertisement, and the holders of the mortgages purchased at the sale, and included in their bid attorneys' fees, which they believed to be authorized by the terms of the mortgages, but which were not, and no redemption was made, and the owner brought action to recover the amount of such attorneys' fees, as a part of the surplus, and the lots had depreciated in value one half between the time of the sale and the beginning of the action, the purchasers were not entitled to have the foreclosure sale set aside and a resale ordered, or to defeat the action by tendering a deed of the lots upon being paid the amount due on the mortgages. Truesdale v. Sidle, 65 Minn. 315, 67 N. W. 1004.

Nor does a mistake of law by one of the parties to a contract, in believing that a prior mortgage deed gave an indefeasible legal title, when in other respects the deed was fairly executed, entitle the person making the mistake to relief in a court of equity. Rankin v. Mortimere, 7 Watts, 372.

And where a person paid a mortgage under a mistaken supposition that he was the owner of the property, or that, as executor of his deceased wife, he was bound to pay it, she having executed the mortgage in her lifetime, his mistake is nothing but a misapprehension of the law, against which equity does not relieve. Peters v. Florence, 38 Pa. 194.

Attention is here called to the fact that apparently a majority of the cases have taken the position that equity will reinstate a mortgage released in ignorance of an intervening lien, as being the result of combined mistake of law and of fact, and as a circumvention of the intentions of the parties. These cases will be found in infra, IV. c, 3, (c), (2).

So, executors who execute a mortgage containing their personal covenant, supposing that they are binding only their testator's estate, make a mistake as to the proper construction of a written instrument, against which mistake a court of equity will not give relief. Porter v. Jefferies, 40 S. C. 92, 18 S. E. 229.

And executors having represented all the land embraced in a mortgage given by them to be the land of their testator, whereas a portion of it was not, cannot, when sued for the breach of their personal warranty, claim that the mortgagee is estopped by the representations of his attorney at the time of the execution of the mortgage, to the effect that their covenant did not bind them personally, especially where such attorney was the attorney for all the parties to the instrument. Ibid.

And a person who has been made defendant in a foreclosure suit as a subsequent purchaser, and believing that he had title to the premises, has agreed, in consideration of an extension of time, personally to pay the decree, cannot avoid liability on his undertaking by showing that his title to the premises has proved defective, and that he made the agreement upon the belief that his title was good. Tenney v. Hand, 32 Mich. 63.

So, a mutual mistake of law as to the validity of a consolidated lease under which money was voluntarily paid, in and of itself affords no ground for recovering back the money. Scott v. Slaughter, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 524, 80 S. W. 643.

And where a society desiring a lodge room agreed to construct the same as a second story of an existing building, under an agreement with the owner of the building that the society should be the owner of the second story in fee during the life of the building, and, to carry out this intention, one of the members of the lodge informed it that he had been advised that the proper instrument to be executed for the purpose was a lease for ninety-nine years, which was accordingly executed, both parties fully understanding the language used in the instrument, the mistake being as to its effect, there can be no reformation, the mistake being one purely of law. Tilton v. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Fairmount Lodge. No. 590, A. F. & A. M. 244 Ill. 617, 91 N. E. 644.

And where a lease of a dwelling house, with the furniture therein, was executed, a schedule whereof was to be made and attached to the lease upon the lessee taking possession, and in the negotiations prior to its execution the lessor agreed to supply certain deficiencies in the furniture, and have the house completely furnished by the beginning of the term, but the lease contained no covenants as to additions to the furniture, and the lessor then again promised to complete the furniture, and persuaded the lessee to sign the lease without the provision in it, after which the lessor refused to perform the promise, the facts do not bring the case within the jurisdiction of a court of equity to reform or cancel the instrument. Wilson v. Deen, 74 N. Y. 531.

So, where an owner, under threat of payment of principal, agreed to reduce a ground rent from 6 to 5 per cent, and both of the parties were ignorant at the time of the decision of the supreme court that such a ground rent as was in question was an irredeemable one, a bill will not lie by the owner of the ground rent to cancel the agreement for mistake. Norris v. Crowe, 206 Pa. 438, 98 Am. St. Rep. 783, 55 Atl. 1125.

And inadequacy of consideration and weakness of mind of the plaintiff are immaterial averments in a complaint to reform a lease on the ground of mistake of the lessor, known or suspected by the lessee, and no findings need be made thereon. Wilson v. Moriarty, 88 Cal. 207, 26 Pac. 85.

Nor will a bill in equity lie to cancel an agreement to reduce a ground rent, as made in mistake of law, where the plaintiff has a complete remedy at law by an action to recover the ground rent, as provided for in the original agreement. Norris v. Crowe, supra.

But where a lessee, after accepting a lease of land and water rights, discovers that another person lays claim to the water rights, and the lessor thereupon insists that he is entitled to the rent, but promises to do whatever his contract calls upon him to do, and, if the contract requires it, to stand between the lessee and the other claimant, the rent which the lessee is afterwards forced to pay to such claimant when the proprietorship of the water rights has been established may be recovered from the lessor. Bedell v. Wilder, 65 Vt. 406, 36 Am. St. Rep. 871, 26 Atl. 589.

(2) Bonds, common contracts, and other miscellaneous matters.

If the obligees of a joint bond given by two or more agree with one obligor to release him, and do so, and all the obligors are thereby discharged at law, equity will not afford relief against the legal consequences, although the release was under a manifest misapprehension of the legal effect of it in relation to the other obligors. Hunt v. Rhodes, 1 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 27.

And a release of one obligor will discharge a co-obligor, although executed upon the trial of an action against the latter, to render the obligor competent as a witness, and under a mistake as to the legal effect of the release; and the co-obligor may at once take advantage of the fact by plea, and equity will not intervene to relieve the plaintiff from the consequences of his act. Bell v. Steel, 2 Humph. 148.

So, a bond given to an officer for the release of attached property, which was intended as a delivery bond, but which bound the obligor to pay the judgment rendered against the attachment defendant, is binding upon the obligor for the payment of the judgment. Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138.

And where, when a person signed a bond to stay execution, he inquired of the justice of the peace who took it, what was its legal import and effect, and to what extent he would be liable upon it, and was informed in reply that it was only to secure costs, he cannot have the bond reformed so as to impose liability for costs only, since his mistake as to the legal effect of his act cannot deprive the plaintiff, for whose benefit the bond was given, of his right. McMinn v. Patton, 92 N. C. 371.

So, where a bond is given to dissolve a garnishment, the surety cannot set up by plea in defense that he supposed when he signed the bond that he would be liable for only so much money as the garnishee had in his hands, or as he might become possessed of, belonging to the defendants, such ignorance or mistake of law being neither induced nor participated in by the other party, and there being no fraud, deception, artifice, or misplaced confidence influencing his action. Nevin v. Fouche, 77 Ga. 47.

And where, pending an action commenced by attachment, the defendant directed a scrivener to prepare a delivery bond, and the bond as drawn was conditioned to pay whatever judgments might be rendered against the defendant, and was signed by him in ignorance of its legal effect, such ignorance does not afford ground for equitable relief. Glenn v. Statler, 42 Iowa, 107.

Nor will a serious depreciation in the value of land after the time of its purchase, the vendor and vendee having bargained on equal terms, in the absence of proof of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of any material fact on the part of the vendor, by which the purchaser was betrayed into an unfortunate speculation, discharge the surety of the purchaser. Pascault v. Cochran, 34 Fed. 358.

And ignorance of the legal effect of accepting the bond of one partner for a simple contract debt due by the firm is not a ground for relief in equity. Williams v. Hodgson, 2 Harr. & J. 474, 3 Am. Dec. 563.

Nor is it a defense to a suit on a note that the defendant signed it jointly with a corporation of which he was a director, in 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the mistaken belief that it was necessary for him to sign, in order to bind the company, and that he did not intend to bind himself personally. Maledon v. Leflore, 62 Ark. 387, 35 S. W. 1102.

And where officers of a corporation sign a note with their individual names, adding thereto "president" and "secretary," respectively, there being nothing on the face of the note indicating a principal behind them, they are personally bound, and cannot maintain a proceeding for the reformation of the note, where their only interest in reforming the contract is to relieve themselves from liability thereon, and to show it was not their contract, but that of the corporation. San Bernardino Nat. Bank v. Andreson (Cal.) 32 Pac. 168.

So, a person who indorses his name on a note or bill, supposing he is binding himself as an indorser, and not as a security, commits an error of law from which he cannot have relief, when he was not led into it by the other party. Smith v. Gorton, 10 La. 374.

And where a person had indorsed a promissory note for accommodation of the maker, and the indorsee had signed the agreement to accept from the maker a specific sum in full of his demand on having a collateral security for that sum, and it appeared that the agent of the maker had represented to the indorsee before he signed the agreement that the maker would continue liable for the residue of the debt secured by the note, the agreement having the effect of discharging the security, the representation, being as to the legal effect of the agreement, is immaterial, and does not have the effect of avoiding it. Lewis v. Jones, 4 Barn. & C. 512.

So, the surrender of an old promissory note is a sufficient consideration for a new one executed by a surety, although the surety had been released from payment of the old note by the action of the insolvent principal, where both parties knew the substantial facts, but, being ignorant of the law, in good faith supposed the surety was liable for the old note. Churchill v. Bradley, 58 Vt. 403, 56 Am. Rep. 563, 5 Atl. 189.

And a promissory note payable a specified term after date, with interest from date at a rate higher than the legal rate, will not be reformed in chancery by adding the words, "until paid," after the words, "from date," although the parties intended it to bear interest at the higher rate after as well as before maturity, if the note was written as the parties intended to write it, and the words, "until paid," were omitted by a mistake as to the legal effect of the omission. Hicks v. Coody, 49 Ark. 425, 5 S. W. 714.

So, when relief is sought in one action from a purchase made by a mistake of law as to the effect of a decree rendered in another action, the ordinary rules as to mistakes of law apply, and from such mistakes courts of equity will seldom relieve. Goode-now v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461, 76 Am. Dec. 540.

And a purchaser at a foreclosure sale cannot be reimbursed in the amount bid, though he acted under a mistake as to the effect of the decree and sale thereunder, that mistake being one of law, against which a court of equity will not relieve unless the mistake be accompanied with special circumstances, such as misrepresentation, undue influence, or misplaced confidence. Ibid.

So, a purchaser mistakenly believing that a judgment under which he purchased at sheriff's sale was older than a mortgage lien cannot thereafter be relieved of his bid upon the ground of mistake of fact, the mortgage being of record. Norman v. Norman, 26 S. C. 41, 11 S. E. 1096.

But where the sheriff at an execution sale led the purchaser to believe that the surplus of his bid, after satisfying the execution, would be applied to the extinguishment of a certain mortgage which was a prior lien upon the premises, and the purchaser bid enough to satisfy both liens, expecting to receive an unencumbered title to the property, and the other lien was not satisfied, the mistake is one of fact, and equity will grant relief by setting aside the sale. Bay v. Harnett, 58 Iowa, 344, 12 N. W. 336.

And whether a court of equity has or has not the power to vacate the satisfaction of a judgment, and open it for further process, because the purchaser, under a mistake, bid off property to which the debtor had no title, it will not permit such a sale to prejudice a party in a case over which it has unquestioned jurisdiction. Hollister v. Dillon, 4 Ohio St. 198.

And equity will relieve against a mistake in the quantity of land sold at a judicial sale where the mistake is such that relief would have been granted had the sale been a private one. Miller v. Craig, 83 Ky. 623, 4 Am. St. Rep. 179.

And where, at a judicial sale of land for the payment of the debts of a decedent, a tract of land supposed to contain 40 acres, when in fact it contained 120 acres, is sold, the heir of the decedent, all of the debts having been paid, may recover from the purchaser the excess of 88 acres, he being allowed to elect on which side he will have 40 acres laid off to him, or to take the whole tract, paying for the excess at the rate of his bid. Ibid.

So, where distribution had been made of the estate of an intestate among those who were supposed to be his collateral heirs at law, and all of them joined in a release to the payer, one of them cannot afterwards recover a greater amount, on the ground of their mutual mistake of the law as to who were the heirs at law of the intestate. Good v. Herr, 7 Watts & S. 253, 42 Am. Dec. 236.

And where a woman who was aunt of the half blood and cousin of the whole blood to a decedent, in accordance with a legal opinion misinterpreting a Delaware statute, accepted as her portion of the intestate's real estate such portion only as she was entitled to as cousin, with the heirs of the half blood excluded, while she was also entitled by law to a portion as aunt of the half blood, and having, under erroneous advice, conveyed away her inheritance, she made a mistake of law, and not a mistake of mixed law and fact, and will not be relieved in equity by a decree for a reconveyance, especially where the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. Hamblin v. Bishop, 41 Fed. 74.

But where a half interest in common in a lot descended to a man, and under a mistake as to the law of descent, he thought that his brother owned the lot in severalty, and they owned adjoining lots, and executed a joint mineral lease of the several tracts owned by them in severalty, including the lot in question, the lease did not convey the interest of the party who supposed he owned nothing in the lot, since it was executed under a material mistake as to the ownership; but where the lessee has transferred the lease to a third person, who knows nothing of the facts, the latter is entitled to rely on the execution of the lease by such party as passing his interest in the lot, and equity will not reform the lease in a suit against the transferee. Harlan v. Central Phosphate Co. (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 614.

So, where a man willed a lot of land to his wife, and subsequently, before his death, traded the lot for other lands, the wife joining in the conveyance, both being assured by the person who drew the deed, and believing, that the exchange of farms would not alter the will or affect the devise to the wife except to give her the land received in exchange, in lieu of the lot devised to her, and the testator afterwards died without having altered his will, leaving no real estate except the lands received by him in exchange, a court of equity has no power to correct their mistake as to the effect of the exchange of lots, it being a mistake of law. Gilbert v. Gilbert, 9 Barb. 532.

And where, under action for the settlement of a testator's estate, all the children of the testator being parties thereto, a tract of land was purchased at its full value by one of the children, who was advised by counsel and believed that he was purchasing a fee-simple title, and he took a deed and gave a mortgage for a portion of the purchase price, and went into possession, he cannot resist foreclosure of the mortgage on the ground that he was mistaken in supposing that he had purchased a fee-simple title, for whether he erred in construing the testator's will to give the testator's children an absolute estate, or in supposing that contingent remaindermen provided for in it were not necessary parties to the action under which the sale was made, it was a mistake of law, and not such as would be relieved against in the action for foreclosure. If entitled to any relief at all, it must have been in the original case still pending in which the order of sale was made. Munro v. Long, 35 S. C. 354, 28 Am. St. Rep. 851, 14 S. E. 824.

Nor is a mistake made either in the construction of a will, or in supposing that the rights of contingent remaindermen would be barred by an order of sale made in a cause to which they were not parties, sufficient to warrant equitable relief. Ibid.

And an executor who buys lands of the estate for which he is executor of his co-executors, under the belief that the will gave authority to them to sell, cannot be relieved in equity from the consequences of his mistake, where he was not ignorant of any fact connected with the title to the premises, or connected with the authority of the vendors to sell and convey them, but relied solely upon his ignorance of the law with reference to the authority to sell. Dill v. Shahan, 25 Ala. 694, 60 Am. Dec. 540.

So, an estate of a deceased person is not liable to pay for mourning apparel purchased after his death by his family, and one who furnishes such apparel, believing the estate to be liable for it, expressly stipulating that the would resort only to the estate for his pay, cannot maintain an action therefor against any of the family upon an implied promise. Jenks v. Mathews, 31 Me. 318.

And where a man deposited a sum of money in a bank, and received a certificate of deposit, setting forth the deposit of the money by him, and stating that the same was payable to the order of himself or his wife on the return of the certificate, and the man died before the money was withdrawn, and after his death his wife presented the certificate, and drew the money, the paying teller of the bank, knowing of the death of the depositor at the time, if, in making the payment, he mistook the law, supposing he had a right to pay the wife after the death of the husband, the bank, whose agent he was, must suffer the consequences. Second Nat. Bank v. Wrightson, 63 Md. 81.

But where the heir at law of a shareholder in a company, the shares in which were personal estate, being ignorant of that circumstance, and supposing himself to be liable in respect to his ancestor's shares, executed a deed of indemnity to trustees of the company, he is entitled in equity to have his deed canceled, as having been obtained under a mistake of fact and law. Broughton v. Hutt, 3 De G. & J. 501.

And a clear mistake in making a partition and settlement of an estate, as to its liability for a supposed debt, is a ground for opening mutual releases executed by the parties, where it appears that the settlement was not a compromise or speculation; and it makes no difference that it is uncertain whether the mistake was one of law or of fact. Gist v. Cattell, 1 Bail. Eq. 343.

So, the payment of money into court through the ignorance and inadvertence of the parties in not knowing that, upon their doing so, the other parties to the action could take it out, does not amount to that kind of mistake against the consequences of which equity will interfere. Great Western R. Co. v. Cripps, 5 Hare, 91.

face, because made to one who does not own the property, and the true owner, with a knowledge of the fact, but under misapprehension of, or in ignorance of, the law, pays the tax under protest, to avoid a threatened sale of the property by the tax collector, it is to be deemed a voluntary payment, and he cannot recover back the money paid in a suit against the tax collector. Bucknell v. Story, 46 Cal. 589, 13 Am. Rep. 220.

And where a sheriff who held an execution discovered a defect in it which he supposed rendered it void, and he therefore neglected to execute it, and judgment was rendered against him for such neglect in a court of law, a court of equity cannot relieve him from the consequences of his neglect of duty. Pettes v. Bank of Whitehall, 17 Vt. 435.

Nor can a subscription to the capital stock of a corporation be canceled because the subscriber, through ignorance of law, acted upon the mistaken idea that she was purchasing the stock of an existing corporation, instead of participating in the organization of a new corporation. Williams v. Thwing Electric Co. 160 Ill. 526, 43 N. E. 595.

And where a railroad company which had issued two kinds of stock, a first preference stock and second preference stock, afterwards issued more stock, which it represented to be preference stock, and which it sold as such, and it was declared by law to rank below either the first or second preference stock, the directors and secretary of the company are not liable to make good the misrepresentation to the purchaser of the stock, or repay him the purchase money, since the purchaser knew he was purchasing a new stock, and not the preferred stock, but thought it ranked with the preferred stock, so that he was not deceived by any misrepresentation of fact; there had merely been a common misconception of the law. Eaglesfield v. Londonderry, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 693.

So, where, in the preparation of a contract, there was no agreement that a condition as to certain dividends should be inserted in it, such condition cannot be said to have been omitted by mistake, and a reformation cannot be had, because the mistake, if any, is one of law, in supposing that the condition could be enforced without its insertion in the contract. Trotter v. Brevoort, 60 App. Div. 562, 69 N. Y. Supp. 1028.

And a finding by a referee, on conflicting evidence, as a fact, that a parol agreement for a special rate of interest upon advances to be made by a party on account of a land purchase was omitted from a written contract concerning such advances through a mistake of law, sustains in the appellate court on an appeal from a judgment of the court below the legal conclusion that the unsuccessful party was not entitled to have the contract reformed, in the absence of a finding that the other party to the contract was guilty of inequitable conduct.

Greene v. Smith, 160 N. Y. 533, 55 N. E. 210.

But where an insurance company purchased the business, received the assets, and undertook the liabilities of another insurance company, and a creditor of the selling company canceled his security, and accepted a substituted security of the purchasing company, and the purchase was held void as ultra vires, the court has jurisdiction to relieve the creditor, though his mistake was a mistake of law; and he may be remitted to his original rights against the selling company, and is entitled to prove in winding-up proceedings. Re Sax-on Life Assur. Soc. 2 Johns. & H. 408.

So, where a debtor called a meeting of his creditors, and proposed a composition of 10s. to the pound, payable by instalments, and a deed was prepared in supposed compliance with the bankruptcy act, and certain creditors declined to assent, but subsequently, on being informed by the debtor that the deed had been executed by the required number of creditors, and had been registered, and the amount of the instalments having been remitted to them, they took the money and said nothing, and the deed was afterwards decided to be void for want of a strict compliance with the provisions of the statute, the creditors are precluded from suing the debtor for the balance of their debt, as the mistake, if any, under which they received the instalments, was one of law, and not of fact. Kitchin v. Hawkins, L. R. 2 C. P. 22.

But where a creditor levied execution on his debtor's goods for a debt exceeding £50, and the sheriff seized and sold them, and the debtor filed a petition for liquidation, and served notice on the sheriff before the sale, but before the expiration of fourteen days from the sale the first meeting of the creditors was held, but no resolution was passed, and the sheriff then, after the expiration of the fourteen days, paid the proceeds of the sale to the execution creditor, and afterwards a bankruptcy petition was filed by another creditor, which stated the filing of the petition for liquidation and the failure of the proceedings, and the debtor was adjudged a bankrupt under this petition, and the trustees demanded the proceeds of the sale from the execution creditor, who paid them to them believing they were legally entitled to them, it was held that the liquidation proceedings entirely came to an end on the failure of the meeting to pass a resolution, and that the debtor was not adjudged a bankrupt on the liquidation petition, and therefore the sheriff was justified in paying the proceeds of the sale to the execution creditor, and the court had jurisdiction to relieve against the mistake of law, and to order the money to be repaid by the trustees to the execution creditor. Ex parte James, L. R. 9 Ch. 609.

c. Rule that mistake of law may be cause for reformation.

1. Generally.

In equity, the line between mistakes of law and mistakes in fact has not been so clearly and sharply drawn as at law. Daniell v. Sinclair, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 181, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 144; Williamson v. Brown, 195 Mo. 313, 93 S. W. 791.

The doctrine that a mistake or ignorance of law is no excuse for the breach or non-performance of an agreement is confined to cases of pure, unmixed mistake of law, in which there is no mistake of fact, and no trust or element of fraud entering in and conducing to the making of the contract. King v. Doolittle, 1 Head, 77; Coger v. M'Gee, 2 Bibb, 321, 5 Am. Dec. 610; Sparks v. Pittman, 51 Miss. 511.

Though relief will not be granted merely on account of a mistake of law, there are cases in which there are other elements, not in themselves sufficient to authorize the court to interpose, but which, combined with such a mistake, will entitle the party to relief. Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 556.

Thus, equity will relieve against a mistake of fact superinduced by mistake of law. Gross v. Leber, 47 Pa. 520.

And when one party induces another, without any consideration, to convey land to him, under their mistake of fact, arising from their ignorance of the law, and the property cannot in good conscience be retained, a reconveyance will be decreed upon a bill in equity therefor. Freeman v. Curtis, 51 Me. 140, 81 Am. Dec. 564.

So, where there is a mistake of fact, or a mistake of law and fact combined, equitable relief can be granted, especially if such relief does not result in injury to the opposite party. Lane v. Holmes, 55 Minn. 379, 43 Am. St. Rep. 508, 57 N. W. 132.

And where, in an agreement, there was a mutual mistake, in a sense a mistake in law, but in which there was no misconception of legal rights, but a mistake as to the effect of the instrument by including in it as a contracting party a person who was never intended to be included, equity will grant relief. Wake v. Harrop, 1 Hurlst. & C. 202.

And it has been held that the maxim of law, "Ignorance of the law is no excuse," has regard to the requirements of public policy that ignorance cannot be pleaded to excuse crime, but does not hold in civil cases. Lansdown v. Lansdown, Moseley, 364.

And the rule in general terms has been quite extensively adopted, that a mistake of law in a proper case may be corrected in equity, as well as a mistake of fact. Evants v. Strode, 11 Ohio, 480, 38 Am. Dec. 744; Clopton v. Martin, 11 Ala. 187; Remington v. Higgins, 54 Cal. 620; Park Bros. v. Blodgett & C. Co. 64 Conn. 28, 29 Atl. 133; Way v. Roth, 159 Ill. 162, 42 N. E. 321; Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816, 33 N. W. 38; Corrigan v. Tierney, 100 Mo. 276, 13 S. W. 401; Leitensdorfer v. Delphy, 15 Mo. 160, 55 Am. Dec. 137; Webster v. Webster, 33 N. H. 18, 66 Am. Dec. 705; Barlow v. Scott, 24 N. Y. 40; Hall v. Reed, 2 Barb. Ch. 500; Marsh

v. McNair, 48 Hun, 117; Wheadon v. Olds, 20 Wend. 174; Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 M'Cord, Eq. 455, 16 Am. Dec. 667; Lord v. Horr, 30 Wash. 477, 71 Pac. 23; Biggs v. Bailey, 49 W. Va. 188, 38 S. E. 409; Johnson v. Parker, 34 Wis. 596; Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. ed. 589; Stone v. Godfrey, 5 De G. M. & G. 76; Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co. 1 Ves. Sr. 317; Ware v. Horwood, 14 Ves. Jr. 20.

Where it can be done without impairing the rights of those who were ignorant of the existence of any such mistake when their rights accrued. Hall v. Reed; Way v. Roth; Biggs v. Bailey; and Johnson v. Parker,—supra.

And that a plain and acknowledged mistake of law is not beyond the reach of equity. Benson v. Bunting, 127 Cal. 532, 78 Am. St. Rep. 81, 59 Pac. 992.

A mistake which is relievable in equity is some unintentional act, omission, or error, arising from ignorance, surprise, imposition, or misplaced confidence, and such a mistake may be either of law or of fact. Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63.

And the word "mistake" in a bill alleging a contract different from that reduced to writing, and that it was so written by mutual mistake, is a statement of a fact, and not a conclusion of law. Smelser v. Pugh, 29 Ind. App. 614, 64 N. E. 943.

It is a principle of equity that when an instrument is drawn and executed which professes or is intended to carry into execution an agreement, whether in writing or by parol, previously entered into, but which, by mistake of the draftsman, either in fact or in law, does not fulfil, or which violates, the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement, equity will correct the mistake so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement. Hunt v. Rhodes, 1 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 27; Rogers v. Atkinson, 1 Ga. 12; Collier v. Lanier, 1 Ga. 238; Kyner v. Boll, 182 Ill. 171, 54 N. E. 925; Stafford v. Fetters, 55 Iowa, 484, 8 N. W. 322; Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 168; Knuckles v. J. D. Hughes Lumber Co. (Ky.) 116 S. W. 1193; Dulany v. Rogers, 50 Md. 524; Newland v. First Baptist Church Soc. 137 Mich. 335, 100 N. W. 612; Leitensdorfer v. Delphy, 15 Mo. 160, 55 Am. Dec. 137; Webster v. Webster, 33 N. H. 18, 66 Am. Dec. 705; Trusdell v. Lehman, 47 N. J. Eq. 218, 20 Atl. 391; McMillan v. Fish, 29 N. J. Eq. 610; Wintermute v. Snyder, 2 N. J. Eq. 489; Bacot v. Fessenden, 124 N. Y. Supp. 370; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9; Talley v. Courtney, 1 Heisk. 715; Kelley v. Ward, 94 Tex. 289, 60 S. W. 311; Dietrich v. Hutchinson, 73 Vt. 134, 87 Am. St. Rep. 698, 50 Atl. 810; White v. Campbell, 80 Va. 180; Alexander v. Newton, 2 Gratt. 966.

In Kyner v. Boll, supra, Fowler v. Black, 136 Ill. 363, 11 L.R.A. 670, 26 N. E. 596, supra, IV. b, 2, was distinguished, and it was said that the principle announced by that and similar cases should not be carried to the extent of refusing relief where the scrivener, from ignorant presumption, and against the intention of the parties, has inserted in the deed words limiting the estate which the parties intended the grantee should take

So, a mistake which will justify the reformation of a written instrument may be one made by a scrivener who was acting as mutual agent of both parties in drafting the instrument. Meek v. Hurst, 223 Mo. 688, 122 S. W. 1022.

If parties to a contract were misled by misplaced confidence in the skill of the scrivener, it is a mistake of fact on their part, from which equity will grant relief, and not a mistake of law. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373.

So, the rule is general and well supported that a writing may be reformed to express the real agreement, where, by reason of mutual mistake of law, fact, or both, or such mistake on the part of one and fraud on the part of the other, the actual agreement arrived at is so written as not to express that agreement. Marshall v. Westrope, 98 Iowa, 324, 67 N. W. 257; Turpin v. Gresham, 106 Iowa, 187, 76 N. W. 680; Campbell v. Hatchett, 55 Ala. 548; Pickett v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 32 Ark. 346; Park Bros. v. Blodgett & C. Co. 64 Conn. 28, 29 Atl. 133; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cox, 133 Ga. 763, 66 S. E. 1088; Webb v. Hammond, 31 Ind. App. 613, 68 N. E. 916; Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 168; McElderry v. Shipley, 2 Md. 25, 56 Am. Dec. 703; Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479; Smith v. Jordan, 13 Minn. 264, Gil. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 232; Williamson v. Brown, 195 Mo. 313, 93 S. W. 791; Gotthelf v. Shapiro, 136 App. Div. 1, 120 N. Y. Supp. 210; Kornegay v. Everett, 99 N. C. 30, 5 S. E. 418; Forester v. Van Aiken, 12 N. D. 175, 96 N. W. 301; Bailey v. Bailey, 8 Humph. 230; Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019; New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 30 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 63, reversing 78 Fed. 33.

Within these rules, where there is a mistake, whether of law or of fact, in reducing an agreement to form, or in carrying it into effect, equity will grant relief. Lanning v. Carpenter, 48 N. Y. 408; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461, 76 Am. Dec. 540; Parish v. Camplin, 139 Ind. 1, 37 N. E. 607; Gump's Appeal, 65 Pa. 476; Wisconsin M. & F. Ins. Co. Bank v. Mann, 100 Wis. 596, 76 N. W. 777; Rowell v. Smith, 123 Wis. 510, 102 N. W. 1, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 773; Elliott v. Sackett, 108 U. S. 132, 27 L. ed. 678, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375.

In the absence of a waiver of the right in that regard, or estoppel to the assertion of it. Rowell v. Smith and Wisconsin M. & F. Ins. Co. Bank v. Mann, supra.

And a court of equity has jurisdiction to correct mistakes both as to law and fact, by ordering a proper instrument to be executed, according to the true intent of the parties. Wyche v. Greene, 16 Ga. 57; Alexander v. Caldwell, 55 Ala. 517; Campbell v. Hatchett, 55 Ala. 548; Allis v. Hall, 76

Conn. 322, 56 Atl. 637; Cross v. Bean, 81 Me. 525, 17 Atl. 710; Nebraska Loan & T. Co. v. Ignowski, 54 Neb. 398, 74 N. W. 852; Beall v. Martin, 48 Neb. 479, 67 N. W. 433; Story v. Gammell, 68 Neb. 709, 94 N. W. 982; Kornegay v. Everett, 99 N. C. 30, 5 S. E. 418; McKay v. Simpson, 6 Ired. Eq. 452; Minot v. Tilton, 64 N. H. 371, 10 Atl. 682; Firmstone v. DeCamp, 17 N. J. Eq. 317; Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652; Uihlein v. Matthews, 93 App. Div. 57, 86 N. Y. Supp. 924; Pennell v. Wilson, 2 Robt. 505; Hunt v. Freeman, 1 Ohio, 490; Webster v. Harris, 16 Ohio, 490; Harvey v. United States, 13 Ct. Cl. 322; Carrell v. McMurray, 136 Fed. 661.

And this is the rule though there is no mistake as to the terms of the agreement, but, through a mistake of the scrivener, or by any other inadvertence in reducing it to writing, the instrument does not express the agreement actually made. Born v. Schrenkeisen, 110 N. Y. 55, 17 N. E. 339; Hebler v. Brown, 18 Misc. 395, 41 N. Y. Supp. 441; Baker v. Paine, 1 Ves. Sr. 456.

So, the right to a remedy in equity in case of a mistake in the making of a contract, or the reduction of the contract to writing, is the same, whether the writing was drafted by the parties or by a third person. Wisconsin M. & F. Ins. Co. Bank v. Mann, supra; Baldwin v. National Hedge & Wire Fence Co. 19 C. C. A. 575, 39 U. S. App. 162, 73 Fed. 574.

And it is immaterial, on the question of a reformation of a contract by a court of equity, to make it speak the actual agreement of the parties, how the mistake happened, whether by a misunderstanding of the meaning of the words, or otherwise. Cassidy v. Metcalf, 60 Mo. 519; Larkins v. Biddle, 21 Ala. 252; Stafford v. Fetters, 55 Iowa, 484, 8 N. W. 322.

And the right to have a mistake of this kind corrected is not affected by the absence of fraud or mistake of fact. Rider v. Powell, 28 N. Y. 310; Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co. 1 Ves. Sr. 317.

Nor is the right and power of a court of equity to reform a contract, to make it speak the actual agreement of the parties, affected by the fact that the contract was drawn by the plaintiff himself. Cassidy v. Metcalf, supra.

And a contract entered into under a mutual misconception of legal rights, amounting to a mistake of law in the contracting parties, by which the object of it cannot be accomplished, is as liable to be set aside or rescinded as a contract founded in mistake of matter of fact. Champlin v. Laytin, 1 Edw. Ch. 467.

And when it is perfectly evident that the only consideration of a contract was a mistake as to the legal rights or obligations of the parties, and there has been no fair compromise of bona fide and doubtful claims, the contract may be avoided on the ground of a clear mistake of law, and a total want, therefore, of consideration or mutuality. Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 309, 29 Am. Dec. 407.

So, while everyone is usually bound as if he had a knowledge of the law, whether he has it or not, there is no rule which conclusively presumes such knowledge as a fact, where that fact is important. Black v. Ward, 27 Mich. 191, 15 Am. Rep. 162.

And when parties have acted under a mutual mistake of law, and the party jeopardized thereby cannot be relieved without substantial injustice to the other side, equity will afford redress, especially if the party to be benefited by the mistake invokes the aid of equity to put him in a position where the mistake will become advantageous to him. Freiknecht v. Meyer, 38 N. I. Eq. 315.

So, where both parties understood the law alike, both making the same mistake, and the mistake operates to deprive one of the parties of a valuable right, and to give to the other party a material advantage not contemplated by either, a court of equity will adjust their rights as though the law relating thereto was in fact as the parties supposed it to be, if necessary to do justice between them. Benson v. Bunting, 127 Cal. 532, 78 Am. St. Rep. 81, 59 Pac. 992.

And if a man, by the misapprehension of his counsel as to his legal liability, has bound himself further than he was legally liable, and there is no reason to believe that he intended his obligation to extend beyond his legal liability, he is relievable in equity. Fitzgerald v. Peck, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 125.

It has been held, however, that whatever exceptions there may be to the rule that equity will not relieve from mere mistakes of law are few in number, and have something peculiar in their character, and involve other elements of decision. Bank of United States v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 32, 9 L. ed. 989.

And that where mistakes of law are corrected, there has generally been also a marked disparity in the position and intelligence of the parties, so that they have not been on equal terms, and that the party obtaining the property or other advantage, persuaded or induced the other to part with it, so that there has been undue influence on the one side and undue confidence on the other. Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 556.

And that to authorize a court of equity to interfere and grant relief for a mistake of law, the mistake must be so gross and palpable as to create the belief that some undue advantage was taken of the party, from imbecility of mind or the exercise of improper influence. Haden v. Ware, 15 Ala. 149.

The attending circumstances must be such as to excite the suspicion of fraud, imposition, misrepresentation, or undue influence on one side, and imbecility, credulity, or blind confidence on the other. Dailey v. Jessup, 72 Mo. 144.

And while a court of equity will sometimes grant relief where parties have contracted under a mutual mistake of the law, yet, where the means of knowledge were equal, and no undue advantage was taken, such court will not interpose its powers when the effect of a decree would be to give to one litigant and take from another something of value, not in contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract, without any consideration being paid therefor. Jeakins v. Frazier, 64 Kan. 267, 67 Pac. 854, reversing 9 Kan. App. 850, 62 Pac. 354.

So, where relief is sought against the consequences of mistakes in law, the court must be satisfied that the complainant's conduct has been determined by those mistakes. Stone v. Godfrey, 5 De G. M. & G. 76.

Nor will the mistake of a person be permitted in equity to benefit him at the expense of those who were injured by the mistake. Brown v. Bonner, 8 Leigh, 1, 31 Am. Dec. 637.

And an admitted and clearly established misapprehension of the law creates a basis for the interference of courts of equity resting on discretion, to be exercised only in the most unquestionable and flagrant cases. Marshall v. Lane, 27 App. D. C. 276.

And ignorance of the law with a full knowledge of the facts cannot be set up as a defense, where the circumstances would otherwise create an equitable bar to a legal title. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166, 10 Am. Dec. 316.

So, while a mistake of law might give jurisdiction to a court of equity in a given case, and be a ground for relief, a court of equity will not listen to the allegation that a member of the bar has made such a mistake. Magniac v. Thomson, 2 Wall. Jr. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 8,957.

And a mistake of the law by the attorney of one only of the parties to an agreement, or a misapprehension of the agreement by the party whose attorney he was, is not sufficient to justify a reformation of the contract. Pennell v. Wilson, 2 Robt. 505.

2. Mistake resulting in failure to carry out intention.

Many of the late and well-considered cases have shown a tendency to adopt the theory that the main object of equitable jurisdiction should be to effectuate the intentions of the parties to the contract in question, and that any mistake of such parties which would defeat such intentions should be corrected in equity, so as to carry them into effect, whether it be a mistake of law or a mistake of fact, and without reference to the principle that mistake or ignorance of law does not excuse. Within this theory, contracts will be reformed not only where mistakes of fact are clearly established, but also where, by mistake as to the legal effect of the language employed, the real intent of the parties is not expressed. Conner v. Baxter, 124 Iowa, 219, 99 N. W. 726; Marshall v. Westrope, 98 Iowa, 324, 67 N. W. 257; Larkins v. Biddle, 21 Ala. 252; Parker v. Carter, 91 Ark. 162, 120 S. W. 836; Cake v. Peet, 49 Conn. 501; Patterson v. Bloomer, 35 Conn. 57, 95 Am. Dec. 218; Ward v. Allen, 28 Ga. 74; 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 159; Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892; Maher v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 283; Ryder v. Ryder, 19 R. I. 188, 32 Atl. 919; Ramey v. Allison, 64 Tex. 697; Harrell v. De Normandie, 26 Tex. 121; Goodell v. Field, 15 Vt. 448; Pulaski Iron Co. v. Palmer, 89 Va. 384, 16 S. E. 275; Walden v. Skinner, 101 U. S. 577, 25 L. ed. 963.

And this is so although the parties knew what words were employed, and their ordinary meaning. Maher v. Hibernia Ins. Co. supra.

To enforce such an agreement without reformation would be to create a new contract which was never assented to understandingly, and to impose duties and liabilities which the parties never contemplated assuming. Ramey v. Allison, supra.

Equity will reform a contract where the parties never intended to enter into the contract set forth in the writing, the mistake being one of fact in failing to use apt words to express their intention. Reed v. Root, 59 Iowa, 359, 13 N. W. 323.

And when the legal effect of the terms agreed upon by the parties to be employed in a written instrument, through a misapprehension or ignorance of their import, results in a contract different from that really entered into by them, a court of equity, in the exercise of its moral jurisdiction, will reform it. Orr v. Echols, 119 Ala. 340, 24 So. 357; Moore v. Tate, 114 Ala. 582, 21 So. 820; Conlin v. Masecar, 80 Mich. 139, 45 N. W. 67; Everett v. Jones, 38 N. Y. S. R. 644, 14 N. Y. Supp. 395.

The rule of equity that relief will not be granted to correct mistakes of law has no application to mistakes in the language of a contract, or the choice of the form of an instrument, whereby it has an effect different from the intention of the parties. Stafford v. Fetters, 55 Iowa, 484, 8 N. W. 322.

And if a writing contains less or more or something different from the intention of the parties, by mistake, and this is made to appear by clear and satisfactory proof, a court of equity will reform the writing so as to make it conform to what the parties intended. Cromwell v. Winchester, 2 Head, 389; Jacobs v. Parodi, 50 Fla. 541, 39 So. 833; Trapp v. Moore, 21 Ala. 603; Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106; Adams v. Wheeler, 122 Ind. 251, 23 N. E. 760; Bonbright v. Bonbright, 123 Iowa, 305, 98 N. W. 784; Nowlin v. Pyne, 47 Iowa, 293; Taylor v. Deverell, 43 Kan. 469, 23 Pac. 628; Coger v. M'Gee, 2 Bibb, 321, 5 Am. Dec. 610; Dulany v. Rogers, 50 Md. 524; Cooke v. Husbands, 11 Md. 492; Sparks v. Pittman, 51 Miss. 511; Cassidy v. Metcalf, 66 Mo. 519; Michigan Buggy Co. v. Woodson, 59 Mo. App. 550; Lansing v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 4 Neb. (Unof.) 140, 93 N. W. 756; Mitchell v. Griffith (Neb.) 126 N. W. 998; Botsford v. McLean, 45 Barb. 478; Savage v. McCorkle, 17 Or. 42, 21 Pac. 444; Pennypacker v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 624, 11 S. E. 39; Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins.

Co. 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300; Cockrell v. Cholmeley, 1 Russ. & M. 418; Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co. 1 Ves. Sr. 317.

And this is so even though the failure was the result of a mistake of law. Michigan Buggy Co. v. Woodson; Dinwiddie v. Self; and Bonbright v. Bonbright,—supra.

And although the failure may have resulted from a mistake as to the legal meaning and effect of the terms or language employed in the writing. Williamson v. Brown, 195 Mo. 313, 93 S. W. 791; Lansing v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. supra; Farley v. Deslonde, 69 Tex. 458, 6 S. W. 786.

And equity may reform and correct contracts, though unambiguous on their face, on clear proof that through fraud or error the written instrument has been made to express a different purpose from that which the parties had agreed on and intended to embody therein. Ker v. Evershed, 41 La. Ann. 15, 6 So. 566; Sanford v. Washburn, 2 Root, 499; Elmore v. Austin, 2 Root, 415; Peasley v. McFadden, 68 Cal. 611, 10 Pac. 179.

Courts of equity will not refuse redress if it is certain that a written contract conveys a different right or effectuates a different purpose from that intended by the parties, and will treat the mistake as one of fact. Tabor v. Cilley, 53 Vt. 487.

And equity will rectify a mistake in a written instrument upon parol testimony when the words employed do not express the intention of the parties. Helm v. Wright, 2 Humph. 72; Tesson v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 40 Mo. 33, 93 Am. Dec. 293.

The statement that equity will not relieve against a mutual mistake of the law is true only in a limited sense; that is, when the mistake is as to the legal effect of what has been agreed upon; where the error of law is in the legal meaning or effect of certain words employed in writing out the contract, equity will grant relief, for the writing then does not express what the parties meant. Richmond v. Ogden Street R. Co. 44 Or. 48, 74 Pac. 333; Ryder v. Ryder, 19 R. I. 188, 33 Atl. 919.

It applies only where the mistake is purely one of law, and the party had full knowledge of all the material facts and circumstances. Lumber Exch. Bank v. Miller, 18 Misc. 127, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1073.

On the question of the correction of a mistake in a written instrument by a court of equity, the inquiry is, Does the instrument contain what the parties intended it should, and understood that it did? Is it their agreement? If not, it may be reformed so as to make it the evidence of what the true bargain between the parties was, and it is wholly immaterial from what cause the defective execution of the intent of the parties originated. Wyche v. Greene, 16 Ga. 57, on former appeal, 11 Ga. 159.

To establish a mistake in an instrument which a court of equity will correct, it is sufficient to show that the parties had agreed to accomplish a particular object by the instrument to be executed, and that the instrument as executed is insufficient to effect the object. Leitensdorfer v. Delphy, 15 Mo. 160, 55 Am. Dec. 137.

And where parties, in reducing an agreement to writing, fail, by mistake, to embody their intention in the instrument, either because they do not understand the meaning of the words used, or their legal effect, equity will grant relief by reforming the instrument; and it matters not whether such mistake be called one of law or one of fact. Wall v. Meilke, 89 Minn. 232, 94 N. W. 688; Sampson v. Mudge, 13 Fed. 260.

And if a written instrument fails to express the intention of the parties, equity will grant relief either affirmatively, by reforming or canceling the contract, or by way of defense to its enforcement. Zieschang v. Helmke (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 436.

So, under this rule, relief will be granted by equity from a mutual mistake as to the legal effect of an instrument, as well as from a mistake of fact. Lucas v. Lucas, 30 Ga. 191, 76 Am. Dec. 642; Adair v. McDonald, 42 Ga. 506; Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63; Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469; Welch v. Welch, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 639; Kenard v. George, 44 N. H. 440; Evants v. Strode, 11 Ohio, 480, 38 Am. Dec. 744; Globe Ins. Co. v. Boyle, 21 Ohio St. 127.

Especially when it operates as a gross injustice to one, and gives an unconscientious advantage to the other. Allen v. Elder, supra.

A mistake in a contract in not knowing the meaning which the law attaches to the words employed cannot be said to be a mistake of law, which equity will not correct, because the parties failed to use the words intended. Reed v. Root, 59 Iowa, 359, 13 N. W. 323.

And where parties to a parol agreement intend to reduce it to writing, and because they are ignorant of the force of language, and misunderstand the meaning of the terms used, make a contract different from that designed, equity will grant relief by reforming the instrument, and compel the parties to execute and perform their agreement as they made it. Pitcher v. Hennessey, 48 N. Y. 415.

It has been held, however, that equity will not interfere to offer relief in an action to reform a deed on the ground of mistake, where the parties to such deed did not mistake its contents, but only the effect thereof. Toops v. Snyder, 70 Ind. 554; Morton v. Morris, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 262, 66 S. W. 94.

So, a deed of gift drawn by the grantor himself, which, by reason of his ignorance of the law, does not express his intention, may be reformed in equity. Larkins v. Biddle, 21 Ala. 252.

And equity will interpose for the relief of one who has taken a defective conveyance, and will compel the vendor and those claiming under him by act of law, although without notice, and even purchasers for a valuable consideration, with notice, to make good the conveyance. Mastin v. Halley, 61 Mo. 196.

And equity will grant relief where an attempt to perform an existing contract, as by the execution of a deed, fails through misunderstanding on the part of the grantor as to the effect of the instrument by which performance is attempted, although the mistake be not mutual. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525.

So, a mistake as to the ownership of land is a mistake of fact in regard to which equity will grant relief, although the mistake arose from an erroneous view of the legal effect of a deed. Livingstone v. Murphy, 187 Mass. 315, 105 Am. St. Rep. 400, 72 N. E. 1012; Busiere v. Reilly, 189 Mass. 518, 75 N. E. 958.

And an erroneous view of the legal effect of a deed in a chain of title is a mistake of fact, against which equity will grant relief. Livingstone v. Murphy, supra.

So, mistakes as to the condition of one's title, or the correctness or regularity of antecedent proceedings, are frequently relieved from where the equity is clear, being properly classed with mistakes of fact. Ger-dine v. Menage, 41 Minn. 417, 43 N. W. 91; Whelen's Appeal, 70 Pa. 410.

And even though the parties to a deed knew that it read "three fifths" instead of "four fifths," in describing the estate conveyed, it constitutes a mistake of fact, which may be corrected in equity, and not a mistake of law, where the parties really thought the deed sufficient to convey the four fifths, and the plaintiff is entitled to a reformation in that respect. Parish v. Camplin, 139 Ind. 1, 37 N. E. 607.

And a statement that the lien of a deed of trust on land is prior to the lien of a judgment, when it is not accompanied by mention of the circumstances upon which the priority of the one lien over the other depends, is a statement of fact, and a mistake in regard to such priority is one of fact when it is due to a misapprehension of these circumstances, within the rule that equity will correct mistakes of fact. Smith v. Patterson, 53 Mo. App. 66.

Nor does the principle that a written contract cannot be set aside merely because one of the parties put an erroneous construction on the words in which it was expressed apply to a case where a mistake by one of the parties as to the meaning of the words used has been induced, however innocently, by the other party. Wilding v. Sanderson [1897] 2 Ch. 534.

And whether a tract of land claimed by pre-emption is within a district of country reserved from the operation of the pre-emption laws is a matter of fact, which a purchaser would not be presumed to know, under the rule which presumes a knowledge of the law. Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 303.

To reform a contract in equity, however, it must be shown that the true intention of the parties was different from the contract as reduced to writing, and that by some fraud or mistake the real contract between the parties was not truly reduced to writing; and proof of the parties' interpretation of the contract is not sufficient to show fraud or mistake in drawing it up. Coffing v. Taylor, 16 Ill. 457; Fritzler v. Robinson, 70 Iowa, 500, 31 N. W. 61; Knuckles v. J. D. Hughes Lumber Co. (Ky.) 116 S. W. 1193; Brioso v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Daly, 246.

And it is only when, through fraud or mistake, a party has executed an instrument that he believes to be in accordance with the real agreement, but which is in fact different, that equity will relieve, and even then the mistake as well as the agreement must be made out by clear proof. Wilson v. Deen, 74 N. Y. 531; Zieschang v. Helmke (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 436.

So, it has been held that where an agreement between two parties was reduced to writing, and read over and signed by one of them, it is not sufficient, in a suit in equity by him for the reformation of such agreement, for him to allege that he supposed the terms of the written agreement were in legal effect the same as the true terms of the agreement previously entered into by the parties; such a mistake is one of law, and not of fact, and will not warrant the interference of a court of equity. Hoover v. Reilly, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 471, Fed. Cas. No. 6,677.

And to warrant granting relief in an action to reform a contract alleged to express a different purpose from that which the parties had agreed on, there must be clear proof of the antecedent contract, and of the error in committing it to writing. Ker v. Evershed, 41 La. Ann. 15, 6 So. 566; St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. v. Merri-man, 35 Minn. 42, 27 N. W. 199.

3. Application to particular cases.

(a) Deeds.

(1) Generally.

Equity has jurisdiction to and will reform a deed or other instrument by the correction of a mistake in it, where it appears that, by mutual mistake of all the parties to it, the instrument does not conform to or express their intention or agreement. Easter v. Severin, 78 Ind. 540; Taylor v. Deverell, 43 Kan. 469, 23 Pac. 628; Nutall v. Nutall, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 671, 82 S. W. 377; M'Louth v. Rathbone, 19 Ohio, 21; Pulaski Iron Co. v. Palmer, 89 Va. 384, 16 S. E. 275; Elliott v. Sackett, 108 U. S. 132, 27 L. ed. 678, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375.

A misapprehension of rights under a deed, not arising from the misconstruction of the deed, is a mistake in fact, and consequently relievable in equity. Denys v. Shuckburgh, 4 Younge & C. Exch. 42.

And mistakes and misapprehensions in the drawer of deeds, contrary to the design of the parties, are as much a ground of equitable relief as fraud and imposition. Chapman v. Allen, Kirby, 399, 1 Am. Dec. 24.

While a general warranty deed without limitation, reservation, or exceptions conveys all the grantor's rights, title, and interest, both legal and equitable, in and to the property embraced therein, and while parol testimony is not admissible to vary, contradict, or explain such deed, unambiguous on its face, yet, if such deed is executed through mutual mistake as to the legal effect thereof, contrary to the plainly established intention of the parties thereto, a court of equity will grant relief against such mistake, especially where the same is attributable to the party or his agent who is seeking to take an unconscionable advantage thereof. Biggs v. Bailey, 49 W. Va. 188, 38 S. E. 499.

And where a deed was drawn professedly to carry out the agreement of the parties, previously entered into, and is executed under the misapprehension that it embodies the agreement, whereas, by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or law, it fails to fulfil that purpose, equity will correct the mistake by reforming the instrument in accordance with the contract. Trusdell v. Lehman, 47 N. J. Eq. 218, 20 Atl. 391; Nutall v. Nutall, supra; Cox v. Ellsworth, 18 Neb. 664, 53 Am. Rep. 827, 26 N. W. 460.

A deed of land, defective in some formal requisite, is treated practically in a court of chancery as an executory contract for the sale of land, the court looking in such case through the deed, at the contract of the parties lying behind it, and of which the deed is the evidence; and the relief which it furnishes is not so properly a reformation of the defective instrument as the compelling the specific performance of the contract. Dickinson v. Glenney, 27 Conn. 104.

And equity will interpose and grant relief to prevent a deed being used contrary to the intention expressed in it. Reade v. Armstrong, 7 Ir. Ch. Rep. 375, affirming 7 Ir. Ch. Rep. 266.

So, under the Massachusetts statute of 1856, chap. 38, a court of equity has jurisdiction to reform a deed of real estate upon clear, oral evidence that it was not written according to the intention of the parties, although the scrivener used the words which he intended. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373.

Precise conformity to instructions in the preparation of a deed, however, is not necessary to prevent equitable relief; substantial conformity is all that is necessary. Hewitt's Appeal, 55 Md. 509.

And a deed executed by persons covenanting therein that their heirs, executors, and administrators will warrant and defend the title to the premises furnishes no ground for the interposition of a court of equity to reform it because of the inadvertent omission of the word, "they," which would have made the covenant of warranty a personal one. Ruffner v. McConnel, 17 Ill. 212, 63 Am. Dec. 362.

Nor will equity set aside a deed because of a mistake therein, where the evidence of the mistake is not clear, unequivocal, and convincing. Hoover v. Gray, 91 Ark. 246, 120 S. W. 981. See also on this subject, infra, VII. k, 3.

And a person who, as heir of a deceased owner of a tax sale certificate, took out a tax deed thereon, wherein the name of the deceased person was inserted as grantee, may apply to the county clerk and obtain a deed made to herself as grantee, notwithstanding the issuance of the former instrument, but she cannot maintain an equitable action to have the deed reformed by a decree substituting her own name as grantee therein. Baker v. Lane, 82 Kan. 715, ante, 405, 109 Pac. 182.

Nor will a court of equity interfere to cancel a deed alleged to be fraudulent, on the prayer of one having no interest in the land conveyed. Norris v. Laberee, 58 Me. 260.

And where a deed was made as the parties intended, without any wrongful insertions or negligent omissions, a court of equity will not, after twenty years have expired, interfere to reform it, so that it will have the legal effect expected. Ibid.

(2) Omissions.

A party to a deed or other written contract is entitled to have the same reformed on the ground that a material part of the agreement had been omitted by mistake. Gooding v. McAlister, 9 How. Pr. 123; Murphy v. Rooney, 45 Cal. 78; Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106; Purvines v. Harrison, 151 Ill. 219, 37 N. E. 705; Knuckles v. J. D. Hughes Lumber Co. (Ky.) 116 S. W. 1193; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Ryland, 69 Md. 437, 1 L.R.A. 548, 16 Atl. 109; Gower v. Sterner, 2 Whart. 75; Lough v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 679, 17 S. E. 181, 470.

And he is entitled to have it enforced as reformed. Murphy v. Rooney, supra.

And a mistake in a deed with reference to the accidental omission from it of words which were intended to be inserted therein is a mistake of fact, and not one of law. Purvines v. Harrison, supra; Ruffner v. McConnel, 17 Ill. 212, 63 Am. Dec. 362.

And the omission from a deed by mutual mistake of a reversionary clause materially altering the effect of the instrument warrants a reformation of the instrument. Hamilton County v. Owens, 138 Ind. 183, 37 N. E. 602.

And the omission to insert in a deed a material reservation or easement to the grantor, agreed upon by the parties, will be corrected in chancery upon parol proof thereof, and of mistake in not inserting it in the conveyance. Athey v. McHenry, 6 B. Mon. 50.

So, where words of inheritance are omitted from a deed by the ignorance or mistake of the draftsman, a court of equity will supply them. Springs v. Harven, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 96.

Or a trust in fee may be considered as created which a court of equity will execute according to the conscience and intention of the parties. Trusdell v. Lehman, 47 N. J. Eq. 218, 20 Atl. 391.

And equity will order the annulment of a trust and the reconveyance of the trust property where the grantor, who was cestui que trust for life, and the trustee, were advised by counsel, and all believed, that the deed of trust was revocable at pleasure of the grantor, who, in that belief, executed the papers, although the deed in fact contained no power of revocation. Kilduffe v. Maitland, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 362.

So, where an attorney, in drawing a deed by which a father conveys a life estate to his daughter, neglects to insert in it the clause, "for her sole and separate benefit," it constitutes such a mistake as a court of equity will relieve against. Stone v. Hale, 17 Ala. 557, 52 Am. Dec. 185.

And where a woman employed a scrivener to draw a deed for her to convey to her son a tract of land with a reservation of a life estate in her, the conveyance being a gift, and the mother reposing great confidence in the son, and by inadvertence or mistake the words reserving the life estate were omitted, so as to convey the land absolutely in fee, and the son, in his lifetime, on discovery of the mistake, promised to correct the deed, a court of equity will reform it so as to reserve to the grantor the life estate. Purvines v. Harrison, supra.

And where a judgment under which a purchaser at a sheriff's sale purchased was entered in the minutes, but not recorded, and the execution was erroneously described in the deed, the sheriff's deed may be reformed in equity. Vanness v. Vanness, 1 N. J. Eq. 248.

So, where it was agreed that a vendor should have a lien on the land sold for unpaid purchase money, and the draftsman was so instructed to write the deed, and he and the parties thought it was so written, but, in matter of fact and law it was not, the deed may be reformed on the evidence of the draftsman, so as to reserve the lien, and then the lien may be enforced. Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 168.

And where a deed conveyed title to land, reserving to the grantor a right to cut pine trees off of such part of said lands required by the grantee for improvements, a court of equity has power, upon proper allegations and proof, to reform the deed so as to make it express the real agreement of the parties, and specify what particular lands are required for improvement. Jacobs v. Parodi, 50 Fla. 541, 39 So. 833.

And where a person agreed to sell and convey land to another, subject to the rights of a third person, to whom he had sold all the pine timber on said land, on condition that the third person should remove it within a specified time, which had not expired, and the insertion of a clause to that effect in the deed was omitted through mutual mistake and inadvertence, the deed should be so reformed as to show that the conveyance was subject to the rights of the purchaser of the timber; but it would be erroneous to reform it by inserting an absolute reservation to the grantor of all the pine timber on the land at the date of the deed, without fixing any time within which it should be cut and removed. Sawyer v. Hanson, 48 Wis. 611, 4 N. W. 765.

So, where it was agreed that a part of the consideration for a deed was the support of the grantors by the grantees while the grantors live, and that a stipulation to this effect should be inserted in the deed, but, by mutual mistake, it was omitted, the grantors in such deed are entitled to have the same corrected in a suit against the grantee for that purpose, or against his successor, who paid no value or took with notice. Savage v. McCorkle, 17 Or. 42, 21 Pac. 444.

And a deed by a man to his two children, naming them, in which it was provided that he had given and granted unto his said children a certain tract of land, describing it, and appointing a named person guardian of his children, with such powers as are conferred by law, and whenever his children shall arrive at the age of twenty-one, they will be entitled to take possession of said land, and at the same time it is to be considered that the deed of gift will not take place till the death of the grantor and the death of his wife, such deed contains conclusive extrinsic evidence of the vendor's intention to convey to his children a fee-simple estate after the death of himself and wife; and where the necessary technical words to create a fee-simple estate have been inadvertently or ignorantly omitted, a court of equity will correct it. Vickers v. Leigh, 104 N. C. 248, 10 S. E. 308.

And where a man conveyed lands to the receivers of a railroad company by deed containing a covenant that the company would build and maintain certain fences thereon, the receivers further agreeing verbally that they would give the grantor an annual free pass over the railroad, and renew the same annually during his life, and the deed was duly executed, but the receivers objected to the insertion of the fence covenant in the deed, and promised to observe it if it were struck out, which was done, and the deed delivered, and the receivers built the fences, as agreed, and issued the pass annually, but when the receivers had been relieved, and the reorganized company had taken possession of the road, they refused to keep up the fence covenant and to deliver the annual pass, the grantor was entitled to have the deed reformed in equity by inserting the covenant to build and maintain the fences, but he was entitled to no relief with relation to the annual pass, since the receivers had no power to bind their successors by such an agreement. Martin v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 36 N. J. Eq. 109.

So, where, in a partition deed between tenants in common, a tract of land assigned to one of the parties was omitted by mistake, and the parties took possession according to their deeds, the mistake should be rectified and a specific performance of the contract as to the tract omitted should be decreed. Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385.

And where a person owning several pieces of land agreed to sell them and take back a mortgage for a part of the purchase price, and by mistake of the scrivener one of the lots was omitted from the deed, and the mortgage and the papers were executed and delivered without either party having discovered its omission, equity will reform the deed and mortgage, and foreclose the mortgage as reformed. Crippen v. Baumes, 15 Hun, 136.

(3) Insertions wrongfully made.

A conveyance which passes too much may be rectified and the excess deducted. Beaumont v. Bromley, Turn. & R. 41; Sibert v. McAboy, 15 Ill. 106.

And if a man, by the misapprehension of his counsel as to his legal liability, has bound himself further than he was legally liable, and there is no reason to believe that he intended his obligation should extend beyond his legal liability, he is relievable in equity. Fitzgerald v. Peck, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 125.

So, where, by mistake in a deed, property has been included which the parties never intended should be conveyed, and which the grantor was under no legal or moral obligation to convey, and the grantee in good conscience had no right to retain, a court of equity will interfere and correct the mistake. Burrton Land & T. Co. v. Handy, 54 Kan. 13, 37 Pac. 108.

And where a party employed to draw a deed, by mistake, and contrary to instructions and the intent of the parties, inserted a statement that the land conveyed was the whole of a named lot, which was not the fact, and the mistake was not observed by either of the parties at the time of executing the deed, equity will reform the deed by making it correspond with the intention of the parties. Cook v. Preston, 2 Root, 78.

And where a deed is of 15 feet off the east side of a lot, and it appears that a portion of the grantor's warehouse stood upon the east 15 feet of the lot, and also that it was the intention of the vendor to sell and convey, and of the purchaser to buy, only so much of said lot as lay east of the warehouse, but that both parties believed that there were 15 feet between the warehouse and the east line of the lot, the deed will be reformed in equity so as to cover only such land as lies between the warehouse and the line of the lot. Fuchs v. Treat, 41 Wis. 404.

So, where a grantee purchases from a grantor a fractional 80-acre tract of land, subject to the right of way of a railway company, which, under the act of Congress, was 400 feet in width, but the parties did 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

not know the width of the right of way, and the conveyance, without conforming to the intent of the parties, included the right of way, with covenants of general warranty, the grantor was entitled to have the deed reformed so as to except therefrom the right of way to which he had no title. Burrton Land & T. Co. v. Handy, supra.

And where the holder of a warrant for 425 acres of land agreed to give another half the land in quantity and quality if he would make a settlement, and they afterwards ran the line of division, the latter receiving 72 acres more, on account of a difference in quality, and he claimed to the line, and both recognized it, parol evidence is admissible, against grantees of the heirs of the latter, who held under a deed conveying all their estate in the above-described 200 acres, of what took place at the execution of the deed, to show that the 72 acres were not sold, and that, by mistake or fraud in the scrivener, the deed was not so drawn as to exclude them. Chew v. Gillespie, 56 Pa. 308.

And where one person sold part of a tract of land to another, giving a title bond and subsequently a deed, and afterwards he conveyed the residue of the tract to a third person by deed, and the title bond to the first purchaser and the deed to the second purchaser recognized a common boundary between the tracts, but the first purchaser's deed contained a description different from that in his title bond, by which, on survey, it was found to convey part of the land embraced by the deed to the second purchaser, the first purchaser's deed being on record when the second purchaser purchased, but the grantor remaining in possession, the second purchaser, though a stranger to the deed, is entitled, if the facts otherwise warrant it, to a restraining order as to so much of the deed as went beyond the intention of the parties. Hileman v. Wright, 9 Ind. 126.

So, a court of equity will, upon full and satisfactory proof, reform a grant of a seaweed privilege in a deed of a farm, granting, through ignorance of the scrivener of the principles of conveyancing, a greater privilege than the parties to the original contract designed, against a purchaser of the privilege and farm from one of them, who bought under a like contract. Allen v. Brown, 6 R. I. 386.

And where a married woman purchased a tract of land, and the scrivener who prepared the deed of conveyance by mistake inserted her husband's name with hers in the deed, thus conveying the title to them jointly, after the husband's death equity will reform the deed at the suit of the widow, against the husband's heirs, by striking out the husband's name. Courtright v. Courtright, 63 Iowa, 356, 19 N. W. 255.

Nor is a purchaser of land subject to a mortgage, without an agreement to assume the same, liable therefor, though the scrivener, by mistake, and without the knowledge of either party, inserted in the deed a stipulation that the grantee agreed to pay it; and in such case equity will reform the instrument by striking out such stipulation. Adams v. Wheeler, 122 Ind. 251, 23 N. E. 760.

And where an agreement for the sale of real estate provides that the sale shall be subject to a mortgage on the real estate, but does not provide that the purchaser shall either assume or agree to pay the mortgage, and the deed contains a clause by which the purchaser assumes payment of the mortgage, the purchaser is entitled to equitable relief. Martini v. Christensen, 60 Minn. 491, 62 N. W. 1127.

(4) Reservations.

Where the proof of a mutual mistake of the parties in a deed in failing to insert a reservation is clear and satisfactory, a court of equity will reform the deed so as to make it conform to the intentions of the parties. Warrick v. Smith, 137 Ill. 504, 27 N. E. 709; Matteson v. Johnston, 124 N. Y. Supp. 185.

And an action in equity will lie by the grantor to reform a deed to real estate where, by agreement, the growing and un-matured crops were to be reserved, and such reservation was left out of the deed by mutual mistake. Marshall v. Homier, 13 Okla. 264, 74 Pac. 368.

So, where a bargain was made for the sale of land, excepting the coal in it, and by mistake of the scrivener no reservation was inserted in the deed, the deed will be so reformed in equity as to convey the land without the coal, expressly saving all intervening rights. Baab v. Houser, 203 Pa. 470, 53 Atl. 344.

And where a person orally purchased from another all the minerals in certain land except lead and zinc, and the vendor altered the deed after it had been sent him for execution by limiting the interest conveyed to the iron ore, without the purchaser's knowledge, and the purchaser remained ignorant thereof until after the deed had been recorded, and the vendor, in a letter to the purchaser, after the contract, and before the deed was executed, stated that he understood the agreement to cover all minerals in the land, reserving to himself all the lead and zinc, the purchaser is entitled to a reformation of the deed. Pulaski Iron Co. v. Palmer, 89 Va. 384, 16 S. E. 275.

And a deed of land containing an ore bed, having a clause reserving to the grantor the right of mining on the granted premises a certain quantity of ore annually at a certain duty per ton, licenses him to enter the mine, but saves to him no title in the land or in the ore before it is mined and separated from the land, and it does not restrict the grantee from mining at the same time, even to the exhaustion of the ore; and it may be reformed in equity for variance through mutual mistake from the previous oral contract of the parties, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) as a reservation, and not an exception from the grant, and therefore not within the statute of frauds. Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 107 Mass. 290.

So, where a contract for the sale of land agreed upon provided for the reservation by the grantor of a right of way, but, through a mistake in the grantor's agent in selecting the proper blank form of deed, a conveyance of the land was made free of such reservation, the deed may be corrected in equity, on the ground of mutual mistake. Dennis v. Northern P. R. Co. 20 Wash. 320, 55 Pac. 210.

And where three adjoining landowners agreed in writing with a fourth person to convey to him a strip of land for a road, with an exception or reservation to the vendors of a right to use the road, and, by mistake of the scrivener, who was chosen by one of the grantors, the deed did not state that the strip was conveyed for a road, and omitted the exception or reservation of the grantors' right to use it, and later the grantee denied such right, the deed may be reformed in equity so as to state that the land was conveyed for use as a road, and also the grantors' right to use it. Stines v. Hays, 36 N. J. Eq. 369.

And where a person conveyed a right of way to a railroad company for an express money consideration, inserting a clause in the deed that the company "hereby agrees to construct a cattle and wagon pass at place designated," and it appears from the evidence that the contract was to require a crossing under the tracks of sufficient width and height to permit the passage of cattle and loaded wagons, the deed will be reformed in equity to correspond with such intention. Owens v. Carthage & W. R. Co. 110 Mo. App. 320, 85 S. W. 987.

So, where the owner of several adjoining lots facing a street on the north, and one of them abutting another street on the east, conveyed one of the inner lots, excepting the south 12 feet of such lot, to be used as an alley to adjoining lots, and leading east to the latter street, and both parties to this deed intended that it should secure to the purchaser a perpetual right of way over the south 12 feet of all the lots as a private alley to the street, and thereafter such strip of land was improved and used as an alley, and afterwards the grantor conveyed to a third person the corner lot, without any reservation, the third person knowing at the time of the existence of the alley, and that the first purchaser had purchased and claimed the right to its perpetual use, the first purchaser is entitled to a reformation of his deed so as to give him a right of way over the south 12 feet of the lots to the street, and to a decree requiring the purchaser of the corner lot to remove obstructions placed by him in such alley, and that the last purchaser hold his title subject to the first purchaser's deed, as reformed, but he was not entitled to have the deed to the last purchaser reformed, that being a matter solely between the last purchaser and his grantor. Fischer v. Laack, 85 Wis. 280, 55 N. W. 398.

And where an owner of adjoining lots the rear of which had no connection with any street formed the plan, in selling them, of reserving an alleyway 3 feet wide across the rear of each lot, and opening on a public alley at one end, for the common use of the owners of the interior lots, and the deed given to a purchaser of one of the interior lot contained a reservation of such way, but contained no grant of a right of way over the lots intervening between such lot and the alley, which were then owned by the vendor, though such grant was intended, and the deed was duly recorded, and all the lots were sold, with the verbal understanding that the way was to be reserved, but the reservation was omitted from the deed in question through an oversight, but the purchaser, in building, left a covered way up to the second story, and it was used by the complainant and others at the time the lot was purchased by the defendant, the complainant is entitled to have the deed of her grantor reformed so as to convey the right to use the way over defendant's lot, the defendant being chargeable with notice of such right by the record of the deed as written and the use made of the way when he purchased, of which he had actual knowledge. Haslett v. Stephany, 55 N. J. Eq. 68, 36 Atl. 498.

And where a person granted to an adjoining owner for a limited period a right of way over her premises, and covenanted that she would not use or allow a building to be erected thereon to be used or occupied for the sale of intoxicating liquor, and subsequently the owner granting the right of way applied for a loan upon her premises, and it appeared that the adjoining owner might possibly make a claim thereto, and he thereupon executed a quitclaim deed of the premises adjoining his lot, and the deed excepted the portion of the right of way, but did not except the covenant restraining the owner from using her land for saloon purposes, the grantor in such quitclaim deed is entitled to have the deed reformed by inserting such condition. Uiklein v. Matthews, 93 App. Div. 57, 86 N. Y. Supp. 924.

So, where one person conveyed a lot of land on which there was a spring to another, from which spring the grantor, by means of an aqueduct, supplied his own and other premises with water, this aqueduct being of greater value to him than the price he received for the land, and by his mistake, he not intending to part with the right to use the water from the spring, the deed to the grantee contained no reservation of such right, the purchaser, at the time of purchase, having no knowledge of the existence of the spring, the grantor is entitled either to a conveyance from the grantee of the right to use the aqueduct, or to a reconveyance of the land, on repaying the price thereof; and the grantee is entitled to elect which of these modes of relief the grantor shall have. Brown v. Lamphear, 35 Vt. 252.

And where land fronting on a body of water was leased, and thereafter the county board of supervisors granted the lessee the right to cultivate oysters within the limits of the front of the property, and subsequently the lessor conveyed the land to the lessee, the deed reserving all littoral and aquatic rights appurtenant to the land, though this did not deprive the lessee of his right to his oysters, the lessor was entitled to have the provision in the deed reformed in accordance with the actual intention of the parties, that the lessor should have the exclusive right to the oysters, which intention was not shown by the language used. Barataria Canning Co. v. Ott, 88 Miss. 771, 41 So. 378.

So, proof that a mother, who intended to give to her daughter only the reversion after her death in her real estate, the daughter so understanding, executed and delivered a deed which, by the mistake of the scrivener, first gave the daughter a fee absolute, and then attempted to cut it down by provisions in favor of the mother during life, presents a proper case for reformation of the deed, to the end that it may correctly express the real agreement and intention of the parties. Schrieber v. Goldsmith, 39 Misc. 381, 79 N. Y. Supp. 846.

And where a father conveyed by deed a house and lot to his married daughter, reciting only love and affection as its consideration, and not using any words which would exclude the marital rights of her husband, and an attachment against the father was afterwards levied on the property, the deed was reformed against the husband and the father and the attaching creditor, on proof that the husband bought the property and paid a part of the price with moneys belonging to his wife, who conveyed it to her father, under a verbal agreement between the three that it should be conveyed to the wife as an equitable separate estate, and that it was not so conveyed, through mistake on the part of the draftsman. Berry v. Sowell, 72 Ala. 14.

And where the absolute owner of land conveyed it by a deed which, after granting all his estate in the land, declared in a subsequent clause that the interest and title intended to be conveyed was only that acquired by virtue of a certain sheriff's deed, which was in fact an undivided one-half interest, and all the parties to the conveyance intended that it should embrace such one-half only, and supposed that the deed was so drawn as to effectuate such intention, although the limitation of the grant was ineffectual because inserted after and not in the granting clause, it is nevertheless conclusive as to the intention of the parties, and whether the mistake was one of law or of fact, the deed might be reformed to accord with such intention. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Hewitt, 62 Wis. 316, 21 N. W. 216, 22 N. W. 588.

Nor does the fact that the parties to a deed did not understand the legal effect of a reservation in it afford a reason why equity should not carry out their intentions and enforce their substantial rights. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Manhattan R. Co. 27 Misc. 101, 57 N. Y. Supp. 357, affirmed in 49 App. Div. 345, 63 N. Y. Supp. 435.

(5) Assumption of mortgages or other encumbrances.

Where the grantee in a deed enters into an agreement with the grantor that he will assume and pay all of the mortgages and encumbrances on the land conveyed at the time of the execution of the deed, but, by the mutual mistake of the parties, the deed does not express this contract, equity has jurisdiction to reform it so as to conform to the intention, agreement, and understanding of the parties. Stephenson v. Elliott, 53 Kan. 550, 36 Pac. 980.

And where the parties to a sale of real property agreed that a mortgage thereon should be assumed by the purchaser, and the deed was drawn, making the conveyance subject to the mortgage, the word "subject" being used by the mutual mistake of the parties, a reformation thereof should be ordered by equity, substituting the word "assumed" therefor. Williams v. Everham, 90 Iowa, 420, 57 N. W. 901.

So, where land was conveyed by deed of general warranty, except that it was recited therein that the grantee would support the grantor and wife, and give them a home on the land during their lifetime, and that the deed was made subject to a certain mortgage, the amount of which was stated at $900, which the grantee assumed and agreed to pay, but the mortgage was in fact for a much less sum, and there was another mortgage upon the land, the aggregate amount of the two being only $900, and the evidence shows that it was the intention of the parties to make the deed subject to the two mortgages, but that the scrivener had, by mistake, failed to specify one of them, and the mortgage not so specified was afterwards foreclosed and the land sold and afterwards redeemed by the grantor, the grantee cannot claim that such redemption inures to his benefit, on the ground that the grantor was bound to protect his title against the mortgage not named in the deed, but, upon a cross petition, the court rightly corrected the deed so as to make it express the real contract between the parties. Zack v. Krall, 64 Iowa, 88, 19 N. W. 858.

(6) As to interest conveyed.

A deed drawn by mistake for a different interest from that intended to be conveyed may be corrected if the mistake be clearly proved. Andrews v. Andrews, 12 Ind. 348; Macon v. Dasher, 90 Ga. 195, 16 S. E. 75; Nutall v. Nutall, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 671, 82 S. W. 377; Pinkham v. Pinkham, 60 Neb. 600, 83 N. W. 837; Taylor v. Luther, 2 Sumn. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 13,796.

And where a draftsman was instructed to prepare a deed conveying a certain interest in property, and by mistake made it embrace a greater interest than the parties intended, a court of equity will, upon parol proof of such mistake, reform the deed. Cooke v. Husbands, 11 Md. 492.

And if a grantee in a deed gives a mortgage for the value of land granted upon other land, under a misapprehension that the grantor, as recited in the deed, owned the land in fee, when in fact he owned only a life estate therein, the grantee cannot be compelled to pay, in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, more than the value of the life estate. Wilson v. Ott, 173 Pa. 253, 51 Am. St. Rep. 767, 34 Atl. 23.

So, where, upon the face of a deed, it appears that the grantors intended to convey a fee, and by mistake they have failed to carry out their intention, the mistake may be corrected upon the evidence furnished by the deed itself. Sampson v. Mudge, 13 Fed. 260.

And where a contract was made for the sale of land in fee without conditions, and persons acting for the purchaser took a deed conveying to her and to her bodily heirs, and recorded the deed, such deed conveying only a life estate, she is entitled, on discovery of the fact, to have the deed reformed in equity so as to convey a fee. Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892.

And if parties, in drawing a deed intending to convey a life estate, place the words of limitation in the habendum instead of the premises, under the impression that it is immaterial in which part they appear, their error is a mistake of law which a court of equity will correct to effectuate the intention of the parties. Condor v. Secrest, 149 N. C. 201, 62 S. E. 921.

But a mistake as to the legal effect of the word "heirs" in a deed, instead of the word "children," thus conveying a fee instead of a life estate, does not justify a reformation of the deed in equity. Fowler v. Black, 136 Ill. 363, 11 L.R.A. 670, 26 N. E. 596.

So, where a person purchased land under an agreement that the deed should be made to himself and wife as grantees, intending to create an estate in himself and with survivorship, and the deed, by mistake, was made to his wife alone, a court of equity will reform it, making it express the real contract, notwithstanding the fact that he had heard the deed read, and supposed that it created the desired estate. Corrigan v. Tiernay, 100 Mo. 276, 13 S. W. 401.

And where a notary public, in drafting an instrument intended to operate as a conveyance of land, used words which gave to it the character of a testamentary instrument, passing no present estate, when the intention of the parties was to reserve to the grantor only a life estate in the premises conveyed, such conveyance may be corrected in a court of equity, to conform to the true intention of the parties to such instrument. Pinkham v. Pinkham, 60 Neb. 600, 83 N. W. 837.

And where a leasehold estate was assigned to a married woman, her personal representatives and assigns, to her sole and separate use, with power, with the assent and concurrence of her husband, to sell, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of it, and with power, if she should survive her husband, to devise or bequeath it to such of her children or descendants by him as she might think proper, and for the purpose of giving the children of the husband by a former wife an equal interest with her children in the property, she and her husband conveyed it to a trustee by a deed which neither of them read at the time of its execution, and which was afterwards discovered to be so drawn as to deprive her of the full power of disposal over the property and the proceeds of its sale which she had under the previous deed, the husband and wife, on bill filed by them, are entitled to have the mistake in the deed corrected. Tyson v. Tyson, 31 Md. 134.

So, where a city lot was conveyed to a trustee for a named person and her children forever, and parol evidence was introduced to show that it was the intention of the parties to create an estate in fee, it is a proper case for the interposition of a court of equity to reform the deed, so as to make it convey an estate of inheritance, and thereby carry out the intention of the parties. Cromwell v. Winchester, 2 Head, 389.

And where a deed was executed by a father to his son, and the testimony clearly shows that the word "heirs" was omitted through the mistake of the draftsman, the agreement and intention being to convey a fee, and not because of ignorance of law that such word is necessary to convey an estate of inheritance, the mistake may be corrected and a fee declared, in an action by the heirs of the grantor to recover from the heir of the grantee. Brock v. O'Dell, 44 S. C. 22, 21 S. E. 976.

And where one person received from another a deed of certain realty, described by reference to a former deed, and mortgaged the realty back to the vendor, describing it by metes and bounds, with full covenants of warranty, and both parties supposed they were dealing with the whole realty, and the purchaser made large expenditures on it, and it turned out that the vendor's deed to him conveyed only an undivided half of it, on a bill in equity, brought by the purchaser to compel a conveyance by the vendor of the other undivided half, it was held that there should be an abatement of the price, and the abatement of price should be applied to reduce the mortgage and notes secured by it. Fullen v. Providence County Sav. Bank, 14 R. I. 363.

In the above case, Manson v. Thacker, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 620, infra, IV. g, 3, (a) was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the transaction had been completed and the purchase money paid after an investigation by the purchaser, in which he ought to have discovered the defect.

So, where a trustee sold land, representing the title to be good, and undertaking to warrant the title, but, by mistake or fraud in him, and mistake in the purchaser, the warranty given was a void one, the purchaser is entitled to relief in equity; and where the land consisted of three tracts lying in a row, and the title to one of these tracts failed, that tract lying between the other two, of which it was as large as one and twice as large as the other, and the best improved of all, the purchaser is entitled to demand a rescission. Chastain v. Staley, 23 Ga. 26.

Nor is the right of a grantor to the reformation of a deed affected by the fact that the purchaser did not know, at the time the deed was delivered to him, that it contained a greater estate than that bargained for. Dulo v. Miller, 112 Ala. 687, 20 So. 981.

So, where by the fraud of a vendor and the mistake of a vendee the parties to an oral sale of land signed a written contract for a special warranty deed only, instead of a full warranty deed, as agreed upon, and such a deed was in fact executed, a court of equity will reform the contract and deed so as to make them conform to the oral agreement for a full warranty deed. Efta v. Swanson, 109 Minn. 94, 123 N. W. 56.

And where a person purchased mortgaged land supposing he was obtaining the fee, but in reality got only the equity of redemption, the court will set aside the sale on account of the mistake, ordering him to account for rents while in possession. Lowndes v. Chisholm, 2 M'Cord, Eq. 455, 16 Am. Dec. 667.

And where a grantor conveys a certain interest in real estate, and then, in the same conveyance, by mistake, reserves to himself precisely the same interest he first conveys, the deed must be reformed according to the original design of the parties. Perry v. Knight, 85 Me. 184, 27 Atl. 96.

Nor will equity permit a trust to fail for want of a trustee; and where it can be seen from the face of the instrument creating the trust, either by its express terms or from the nature of the transaction, or the context, that the purpose of the grantor was to convey an estate in fee, a court of equity will correct and reform the deed by supplying the technical words necessary to carry out the intention of the grantor. Moore v. Quince, 109 N. C. 85, 13 S. E. 872.

So, where, on the death of a wife without issue, her brothers and sisters agreed with her husband to convey him a life estate in land left by her, and the husband had a deed prepared which conveyed the fee, and the brothers and sisters executed the same without reading it, under the belief that it passed only a life estate, the mistake was a mutual one, and a court of equity would rectify the deed so as to make it conform to the intention of the parties. Deischer v. Price, 148 Ill. 383, 36 N. E. 105.

And where four sisters, being the joint owners of a tract of land, and their husbands, mutually agreed that it should be partitioned among them, and to carry this agreement into effect one of the husbands made deeds of it for several parts, and by mistake, misapprehension, and ignorance of the form in which they should be drawn, the name of each husband as grantee with his wife was inserted, and in this state they were executed, there being no intention to convey to the husbands a greater interest than they were entitled to as husbands of the owners in fee, but such deeds giving them an estate in fee, the heirs at law of a deceased sister are entitled to maintain a bill in chancery against her husband, who was in possession, claiming title under one of the deeds, to have the deed reformed and to establish title in them. Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 139.

And where a man conveyed certain lands to his wife for life, with remainder to his children in fee, and jointly with his wife he subsequently attempted, by the aid of a trustee, to reconvey the same to himself in fee, and he afterwards died, devising all his property, subject to a life estate, to his children and the descendants of his deceased children, and a descendant of a deceased child sold all his interest in the testator's estate by a deed which conveyed only his interest under the will, and not that under the testator's deed, the evidence tending to show that both the purchaser and the vendor imagined that the testator had acquired the fee of the lands in question by the trustee's deed, and that the vendor intended to sell to the purchaser his interest in the land under such deed, the deed should be reformed so as to pass the grantor's entire interest. Rousseau v. Lambert, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 23, 7 S. W. 923.

So, when a grantor, in a conveyance of her interest in certain land was erroneously advised by her attorney that she owned but an undivided fifth of the premises conveyed, and the bargain and estimate of value forming the basis of the price related only to one undivided fifth thereof, and proceeded upon a mutual mistake of the parties at the time as to the extent of the ownership, the grantor is entitled to a reformation of such conveyance to make it conform to the agreement and truly express the intention of the parties, notwithstanding the grantee was advised before the execution of the deed that the grantor owned three fifths of the premises. Clegborn v. Zumwalt, 83 Cal. 155, 23 Pac. 294.

And where two persons both supposed that one of them owned an undivided three-twentieth interest in a piece of land, and the owner of such interest deeded it to the other at a price fixed with reference to the extent of the interest, and it was afterwards found that she had owned an undivided one-fifth part instead of three-twentieth, she is entitled to a reformation of the deed, to partition, and to an accounting. Fly v. Brooks, 64 Ind. 50.

And a complaint in an action to reform a conveyance which, by mistake, conveyed the whole of a certain lot instead of an undivided half thereof, as intended, though averring a mutual mistake of the grantor and grantee, if it also averred that the defendant knew at the time of accepting the deed that the plaintiff also supposed that the deed described and conveyed only the undivided half of the property, the case is one justifying the reformation of the deed; and where the evidence showed and the court found that, at the time of the acceptance and record of the deed, the grantee knew that the deed conveyed the whole lot, and the grantor supposed the deed conveyed only the undivided one half of it, and that the deed conveyed the whole lot by mistake, there is no substantial or material variance between the complaint and the findings and proof which could mislead the defendant to his prejudice. Holt v. Holt, 120 Cal. 67, 52 Pac. 119.

(7) As to tract or parcel conveyed.

When, by mistake of the parties or of the draftsman of a deed, the grantor is made to convey a wrong tract of land, a court of equity will correct the mistake, and reform the deed so as to make it convey the tract intended. Felton v. Leigh, 48 Ark. 498, 3 S. W. 638; Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 139; Stille v. McDowell, 2 Kan. 374, 85 Am. Dec. 590; Burr v. Hutchinson, 61 Me. 514; Moore v. Crump, 84 Miss. 612, 37 So. 109; Johnson v. Taber, 10 N. Y. 319; Penfield v. New Rochelle, 18 App. Div. 83, 45 N. Y. Supp. 460.

And protect the interests of such persons as may legally claim to hold the correct premises through and under the purchaser. Burr v. Hutchinson, supra.

If the right to a correction is asserted within the statutory period. Moore v. Crump, supra.

This is so, whether the mistake arose from a misapprehension of the facts or of the legal operation of the deed. Stedwell v. Anderson, supra.

And where the court corrects a conveyance of a wrong tract of land by a substitution of the intended tract, it will at the same time declare and enforce the vendor's lien upon it for the unpaid purchase price. Felton v. Leigh, supra.

Equity has jurisdiction of a suit to set aside a settlement and reform a deed given in pursuance thereof because of mutual mistake or fraud on the part of the grantor in including therein land to which he had no title, though there may be a concurrent remedy at law on the covenant in the deed. Hancock v. Cossett, 45 Fed. 754.

(8) Description.

The correction of mistakes of description in written instruments, established by clear and satisfactory proof, so as to make them conform to the true intention of the contracting parties, is a common ground of equity jurisdiction. Berry v. Webb, 77 Ala. 507.

And where, through mistake or fraud, a written contract to convey does not contain the right description, the court may reform it so as to make it conform to the oral agreement. Olson v. Erickson, 42 Minn. 441, 44 N. W. 317; Houston v. Faul, 86 Ala. 232, 5 So. 423; Pence v. Armstrong, 95 Ind. 191; Barry v. Rownd, 119 Iowa, 105, 93 N. W. 67; James v. Cutler, 54 Wis. 172, 10 N. W. 147.

And a mistake in the legal effect of a description in a deed, or in the use of technical language, may be relieved against in equity. Clayton v. Freet, 10 Ohio St. 544; Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892; Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373.

Thus, where parties execute a deed intending and believing it to be an agreement for the sale of land, and an indefinite and uncertain description of the land is inserted in the deed through a mistake as to the ordinary meaning of the terms used, such mistake does not invalidate the contract, and as against the vendor and subsequent purchasers with notice, an estate in the land intended to be conveyed will pass to the vendee, with the right to demand that it be reformed so as to describe the land correctly. Knight v. Glasscock, 51 Ark. 390, 11 S. W. 580.

And where a mistake in the description of land occurs in a series of conveyances under such circumstances as would entitle any one of the vendees to a reformation as against his immediate vendor, the equity will work back through all, and entitle the last vendee to a reformation against the original vendor. Blackburn v. Randolph, 33 Ark. 119.

And where a deed particularly describes certain lands in a named town, adding, "also all such other lands as I own or have any interest in in that town," and it appears that he owned and intended to convey an interest in an ore bed in that town, but wholly disconnected from the lands described, the parties supposing the language used to be sufficient for that purpose, a court of equity will so reform the deed as to make it include the ore bed. Cake v. Peet, 49 Conn. 501.

So, a court of equity will so reform a conveyance founded on a consideration as to correct a mistake in the description therein, though the deed is but a quitclaim, and contains no covenants. Deford v. Mercer, 24 Iowa, 118, 92 Am. Dec. 460.

And a mistake in the calls of a partition deed will be corrected in equity where the proof on the subject is persuasive and convincing. Mage v. Lane, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 296, 12 S. W. 154.

Nor is the right to the reformation of a deed for a mistake in the description affected by the question whether it was a deed of bargain and sale or of gift. Jones v. McNealy, 139 Ala. 381, 101 Am. St. Rep. 38, 35 So. 1022.

And a suit by a grantee to reform a deed for mistake in the description will not be defeated by an oral agreement that the deed should operate as a mortgage. Tillis v. Smith, 108 Ala. 264, 19 So. 374.

A mistake in describing the boundaries of land in a deed of conveyance thereof cannot be corrected to the injury of the assignee of the grantee, however, unless such assignee purchased with notice or without value. Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 474; Long v. Gilbert, 133 Ga. 691, 66 S. E. 894; Pence v. Armstrong, supra.

And a bill in equity to correct an alleged misdescription of lands sold under execution, the mistake being continued in the deed to the purchaser, is in the nature of a bill for specific performance, and the relief sought will not be granted if any circumstances exist which would make it appear inequitable to grant it. Carnall v. Wilson, 14 Ark. 482.

And where, in a conveyance of land, a boundary is described in the language intended to be used, but under a misapprehension as to its construction and effect, a court of equity can make no correction. Farley v. Bryant, supra.

(b) Deeds of appointment or settlement.

The rules with reference to reformation applicable to deeds generally seem to apply to deeds of appointment of beneficiaries of some donation or benefit, and to deeds of settlement to heirs or other persons intended to be benefited.

Thus, where a woman had a power of appointment by deed or will, and she executed it by the execution of a deed which she retained in her own possession, and she afterwards annulled the deed by cutting off her name and seal from it, under the mistaken notion that she had provided an effectual appointment by her will, subsequently made, which did not in fact operate as an appointment, whether she mistook the contents of the will at the time she cut off her name and seal, which would be a mistake in fact, or whether she mistook the legal operation of her will, which would be a mistake in law, in either case the mistake annuls the cancellation. Perrott v. Perrott, 14 East. 423.

So, where parties through ignorance and mistake conveyed an estate to a named person and her heirs, when the intention was to make a provision for the children as well as herself, and to convey the land to her for life, remainder to her children, the mistake is one which equity can correct. Clayton v. Freet, 10 Ohio St. 544.

And where a father intended to convey land to his married daughter and the heirs of her body, and, through mistake, conveyed it to her husband and his heirs, the deed may be reformed after the death of both grantor and grantee, upon clear and satisfactory evidence. Mattingly v. Speak, 4 Bush, 316.

And where the owner of estates in a province, wishing to give his son a qualification as bailiff for that province, wrote to the registrar, and asked him to find a qualification, and the registrar thereupon, without further instructions, selected out of the father's lands the smallest lot which would qualify the son, and sent to the father a deed by which he purported to convey to the son, in consideration of love and affection, and the deed was at once executed by the father and registered, and the son died soon after, without having ever heard of the transaction, and it clearly appeared that neither the father nor the registrar intended or considered the transaction to have the effect of making the son the beneficial owner, or intended any fraud or illegality, the father is entitled to have the deed set aside and to re-establish his title to the land, the letter written to the registrar excluding any defense grounded on the statute of frauds, and this conclusion is not affected by the circumstance that the legal estate was outstanding under a mortgage in fee, not known to the registrar. Childers v. Childers, 1 De G. & J. 482.

So, where, in contemplation of marriage, and with the consent of the intended husband, a woman, acting under advice of counsel, made a deed of settlement of all her estate, with certain exceptions, the trustees to pay her the income to her separate use for life, and after her death to convey the estate to her children, and if she left no issue, then to convey to her sisters and brother of their issue, and there was no power of revocation in the settlement, and she did not understand that her power of appointment was restricted to her brother and sisters, but believed that if she survived her husband she could dispose of her estate as she pleased, and the wife survived the husband, who died leaving no issue of the marriage, the absence of the power or revocation being a mistake, and the provisions after death of the husband being without consideration, and the beneficiaries being volunteers, the wife is entitled to relief in equity, and to have the trustees reconvey the trust estate to her. Russell's Appeal, 75 Pa. 269.

And where a deed of separation and settlement was made between a husband and wife, and acted upon during the life of the husband, and his wife, after his death, filed her bill, claiming dower and her distributive share of the husband's estate, the instrument of separation and settlement may be rectified upon a showing that the conveyance was not only for the support and maintenance of the wife during coverture, but in full satisfaction of all claims whatever, by dower or distribution, on the estate of her husband, so far as it is material to the adjustment of the rights of the parties. Parham v. Parham, 6 Humph. 287.

So, where notes and a mortgage were executed to a wife for the purchase price of property which belonged to her husband individually, under an agreement with the maker of the notes and mortgage that they should be so drawn that if the husband died before the wife, she would be the sole owner of the property, but if she died first, he should be the sole owner, without any expense of probating the estate in either case, and the person who drew the papers was instructed to draw them in that way, but failed to do so, and the papers were signed in the presence of the husband and wife, but without being read, a reformation of the notes and mortgage to correspond with the agreement is justified. Kropp v. Kropp, 97 Wis. 137, 72 N. W. 381.

And where, in settlement of a claim of a married woman against an estate, a sale directed by the court is made to her of land belonging to the estate, but by mistake, and without her consent, the commissioner's deed is made out in the name of her husband, who has paid no part of the consideration, she being inexperienced in business, and until his death unaware of the mistake, the deed will be corrected in equity. Clemons v. Holtheide, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 166, 8 S. W. 697.

A voluntary settlement should contain a power of revocation, and if it does not, the parties who relied upon it must prove that the settlor was properly advised when he executed it, that he thoroughly understood the effect of omitting the power, and that he intended it to be excluded from the settlement; if that is not established, and the court sees from the surrounding circumstances that the settlor believed the instrument to be revocable, it will, even after the lapse of nearly twenty years and the death of the settlor, interfere to give relief against it. Hall v. Hall, L. R. 14 Eq. 365.

(c) Mortgages and deeds of trust.

(1) Generally.

Where a mortgage is drawn and executed which is intended to carry into execution a previous agreement, but which, by mistake of the parties or the draftsman, either as to law or fact, does not fulfil that intention, or violates it, equity will correct the mistake so as to conform to the intentions of the parties. McMillan v. Fish, 29 N. J. Eq. 610; Allis v. Hall, 76 Conn. 322, 56 Atl. 637; Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63; Easter v. Severin, 78 Ind. 540.

Equity will help a defectively executed mortgage, given upon a valuable consideration, and reform and enforce the same as against the mortgagor and subsequent assignees and lien holders having notice. Le- banon Sav. Bank v. Hollenbeck, 29 Minn. 322, 13 N. W. 145.

And a promise made upon an agreement not to sue for the reformation and foreclosure of a mortgage is founded on a sufficient consideration. McCasland v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 108 Ind. 130, 9 N. E. 119.

If a mortgage fails to express the intention of the parties with sufficient clearness to enable the court to carry the same into effect, equity will reform it, although the mistake consist in misapprehending or misjudging its legal effect. Horst v. Dague, 34 Ohio St. 371.

And a party to a mortgage deed in the condition of which a material omission was made through the mistake of the scrivener, and contrary to the intention of the parties, is entitled in a court of chancery to have that mistake corrected, irrespective of any claim by the adverse party of misapprehension of his part in the mortgage transaction. Wooden v. Haviland, 18 Conn. 101.

Thus, a mortgage may be properly reformed in respect to correctly describing the date of maturity of the notes described thereby. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Johnson, 16 Wash. 536, 48 Pac. 267.

And where by mistake the name of the mortgagee in a mortgage was omitted, a decree should be rendered reforming the instrument by inserting the name. Parlin v. Stone, 1 McCrary, 443, 48 Fed. 808.

And where a scrivener, in drawing a mortgage on land from a corporation, made it to the mortgagee and "his successors," equity will reform it by making it read to "his heirs." McMillan v. Fish, supra.

And if by mistake an assignment of a whole mortgage be made instead of a part thereof, the mistake may be corrected in chancery by a bill brought for that purpose against the proper parties. Langdon v. Keith, 9 Vt. 299.

So, where a mortgage was given to a husband and wife jointly, and the intent was to make the income therefrom payable to the wife during her lifetime if she survived her husband, but by mistake the mortgage did not conform to such intent, equity will decree a reformation of the mortgage. McLeod v. Free, 96 Mich. 57, 55 N. W. 685.

And a complaint to reform a mortgage given by a husband and wife, which shows that by mistake of the scrivener a term in the description of the land, and the year in the date, were written differently from the term and the date intended by the mortgagors, sufficiently sets forth a cause of action against the widow and heirs of the husband for a reformation of the mortgage to conform it to the intention of the parties. Jones v. Sweet, 77 Ind. 187.

And if a husband and wife, to secure their joint note, execute a mortgage which was intended to include all their title to certain lands, but, laboring under the mistaken belief that she owned such land, he joined in the mortgage only so far as to release his estate as tenant by the curtesy, whereas in fact he owned part of the land in fee simple, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

equity will, at the instance of the mortgagee, compel them to execute a new mortgage, conveying the entire title of both; and such mortgage, when executed, will be good against all persons who acquired any title or lien after the execution of the imperfect mortgage, and with notice of its infirmity. Livingstone v. Murphy, 187 Mass. 315, 105 Am. St. Rep. 400, 72 N. E. 1012.

And where a person purchased a tract of land, part of the purchase money to be paid in cash, and the balance to be secured by mortgage on the land, and at the request of the purchaser the deed was made to his wife, and in pursuance of the agreement, the wife, at the request of her husband, executed a paper intended to be a mortgage, for the unpaid portion of the purchase money, which in law was not a mortgage, a court of equity will carry out the intention and agreement of the parties by treating the transaction as an equitable mortgage to secure the unpaid portion of the purchase money, and interest. Remington v. Higgins, 54 Cal. 620.

So, an instrument agreed upon between the parties to be executed as a mortgage, but which, by mistake and accident, was executed as an absolute deed, will be treated by chancery as a mortgage. Washburn v. Merrills, 1 Day, 139, 2 Am. Dec. 59; Cripps v. Jee, 4 Bro. Ch. 472.

And this may be decreed on parol evidence making it clear, on the written evidence and the accounts of the parties, that the agreement was not what the deed purported it to be. Cripps v. Jee, supra.

And a mortgage executed by a life tenant who was also vested with a power to mortgage the fee, which did not refer to the power, and therefore covered only the life estate, may be reformed so as to cover the fee, where both parties thereto intended and agreed that the fee of the land, and not the mere life estate, should be mortgaged, and supposed that a mortgage in the usual form would be a valid mortgage of the fee under the power. Lardner v. Williams, 98 Wis. 514, 74 N. W. 346.

So, where a mortgage of realty in a state is executed in another state before a commissioner of deeds only, which is sufficient in that state, but not so in the state in which the realty is situated, a court of chancery has jurisdiction to reform and foreclose the mortgage. McCrary v. Austell, 46 Ga. 450.

And where a mortgage provided for interest less than the legal rate, but also contained a provision that the borrower should repay all money that might be paid by the lender for taxes and assessments, etc., and the holder, about to foreclose, to avoid a plea of usury, alleged that under the actual agreement it was not intended that the borrower should pay ordinary taxes, but solely to provide for the payment by the mortgagor of any tax or assessment on the mortgage that might be imposed by legislation; and as no such legislation had been adopted, the mortgagor had not been called upon to pay the ordinary taxes on such indebtedness, these allegations, unexcepted to, are sufficient to justify the admission of evidence of such mistake in the written contract, and authorize its reformation. Norris v. Belcher Land Mortg. Co. 98 Tex. 176, 82 S. W. 500, 83 S. W. 799.

So, where a note and trust deed were executed by the officers of a corporation as such, the evidence showing conclusively that the debt was due by the corporation, and the title to the property conveyed in the trust deed was in the corporation, and that the intention was to bind the corporation by execution of the note and deed, a court of equity may interpose, correct the mistake, reform the deed, foreclose the same, and enforce the lien. Denver Brick & Mfg. Co. v. McAllister, 6 Colo. 261.

And when a debtor executed a deed of trust to secure certain of his creditors and sureties, and included in it certain notes on which one of the beneficiaries was supposed to be bound as surety, describing them as notes on which said beneficiary was surety, under the belief that, if he was not bound, the misdescription would exclude the holder of them from any benefit under the deed, it is a case for reforming the deed in equity, upon proof of the mistake, and that the grantor intended to secure the said beneficiary, and not the notes. Trapp v. Moore, 21 Ala. 693.

The correction of a mistake in a mortgage after foreclosure, in such manner as to make it embrace property not described in the original mortgage, revives the right of the mortgagor to redeem. Provost v. Rebman, 21 Iowa, 419.

(2) Restoration of discharged mortgages.

Equity will restore a mortgage released through mistake, and give to it its original priority as a lien. Bruse v. Nelson, 35 Iowa, 157.

And if the holder of a mortgage takes a new mortgage as a substitute for a former one, and releases the latter in ignorance of an intervening lien upon the mortgaged premises, equity will, in the absence of such special disqualifying circumstance, restore the lien of the mortgage. Geib v. Reynolds, 35 Minn. 331, 28 N. W. 923; Bruse v. Nelson, supra; Hutchinson v. Swartsweller, 31 N. J. Eq. 205; McKenzie v. McKenzie, 52 Vt. 271.

And where the holder of two mortgages was paid the amount due on one of them, but, by mistake, he released the other instead, upon a bill filed by his administrator after his death, for foreclosure of the released mortgage, equity will intervene and grant relief against the mistake. Bond v. Dorsey, 65 Md. 314, 4 Atl. 279.

So, where a subsequent mortgagee of land, ignorant of a prior deed, made subject to a senior and bona fide mortgage, relying upon his mortgage, pays the sum due on the senior mortgage for his own benefit, and allows it to be discharged and its registration canceled, the cancelation and discharge may be annulled, and he may be subrogated to the rights of the senior mortgagee. Cobb v. Dyer, 69 Me. 494.

And equity may annul the cancelation of the record of a mortgage against a grantee whose deed is made subject to the mortgage, where the cancelation was made in ignorance of the existence of such deed. Ibid.

And this is so though the deed was duly recorded, if the junior mortgagee, who paid and caused the senior mortgage to be canceled, was not guilty of culpable neglect in the premises. Ibid.

The fact that the mortgage was released in ignorance of the existence of the intervening lien is deemed such a mistake of fact as to entitle the party to relief, although the intervening lien was of record at the time. Geib v. Reynolds, supra.

And where a person sold real estate to another, and executed a conveyance thereof, taking back a mortgage for the price, and, the request of the grantee, on the statement that title had not been transferred by the prior deed, he afterwards executed a quitclaim and release, without consideration, thereby in legal effect, but contrary to his intention, discharging his mortgage, he is entitled to relief limiting the operation of the latter deed to the conveyance of the premises, the defendant having acquired his title with knowledge of the plaintiff's equity. Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816, 33 N. W. 38.

So, a mortgagee, having purchased the mortgaged property at a sale, and satisfied his mortgage, after which the sale is set aside, is entitled to have the mortgage set up again and supported in equity. Zylstra v. Keith, 2 Desauss, Eq. 140.

And where a holder of a mortgage has foreclosed the same, and, under a mistake as to the correctness of the proceedings, and the consequent validity of the foreclosure, has paid prior encumbrances which he was equitably entitled to have kept alive for his protection, equity will relieve him from the mistake, except as against innocent grantees and purchasers without notice, and allow him to be subrogated to the rights of the holders of such prior encumbrances. Gerdine v. Menage, 41 Minn. 417, 43 N. W. 91.

And where, on the death of a mortgagor, the mortgagee secured a release of the widow's right of dower in the premises, and also a deed from the mortgagor's father, under the belief that the property descended to the latter, and canceled the mortgage, no consideration being paid for such cancelation, the mortgagee is entitled, as against the heirs of the mortgagor, to a decree for the re-establishment and foreclosure of his mortgage. Swedesboro Loan & Bldg. Asso. v. Gans, 65 N. J. Eq. 132, 55 Atl. 82.

So, where the owner of premises conveyed to him subject to a mortgage, in ignorance of the lien thereon of a judgment against a former owner, subsequent to the mortgage, takes up the mortgage and causes the same to be satisfied of record, he is entitled in equity to have the same reinstated as a lien prior and paramount to the lien of the judgment. Barnes v. Mott, 64 N. Y. 397, 21 Am. Rep. 625.

Nor does the fact that the holder of the mortgage, as executor of the mortgagee, was privy to a settlement between the mortgagor and the legatees of the deceased mortgagee, deprive him of the right to be relieved from such settlement, where, at the time of the settlement, he did not know his own title thereto. Turner v. Turner, 2 Rep. in Ch. 154.

And where, at the time of the execution of a mortgage, the mortgagor was in possession of the mortgaged premises under a contract with the mortgagee for the purchase thereof, and the mortgage was given as security for notes indorsed by the mortgagee for the accommodation of the mortgagor, which notes were taken up by the mortgagee, and paid and held by him, after which he delivered to the mortgagor a warranty deed of the premises, covenanting against all encumbrances, a court is justified, in the exercise of its equitable powers, to direct that the deed be modified so as to preserve the lien of the mortgage for the protection of the notes in the hands of the mortgagee. Judd v. Seekins, 62 N. Y. 271.

And where business men of intelligence met to settle transactions between a decedent and his creditor, and it was agreed that the creditor should take decedent's entire landed estate and certain other property in satisfaction of all his claims secured by mortgage, paying decedent's widow a sum in cash, and the transaction was consummated by the creditor having a deed of the land executed by the widow in favor of the creditor's wife, for debts due by him to her, and surrendering the mortgages, and all the parties to the transaction overlooked for the time the fact that decedent's children had an interest in the land, the mistake is one of law, and the grantee is entitled to have the mortgages reinstated and to be subrogated to the creditor's rights under the mortgages, and to foreclose the same as against the children's interests in the land. Hutchinson v. Fuller, 67 S. C. 280, 45 S. E. 164.

The question, considered from the standpoint of remedies, of keeping alive or reinstating an encumbrance, is treated infra, VII. c. 5.

(3) Mortgages and bills of sale of chattels.

If a chattel mortgage fails to express the intention of the parties, it should be reformed in some tribunal having jurisdiction to grant such relief, before attempting to foreclose it. Weisl v. James, 120 N. Y. Supp. 47.

And where there was an agreement for a loan to be secured by a mortgage of the entire personal property of a firm, including its printing presses and other machines, cameras, lenses, and type, but, in the description of the property in the mortgage, the 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

words used were "fixtures and furniture," which were not, as the parties supposed, broad enough to include those articles, the mistake, though in one sense a mistake of law, will be corrected in equity. Ryder v. Ryder, 19 R. I. 188, 32 Atl. 919.

The makers of a chattel mortgage are proper parties defendant in an action brought to reform the mortgage, and to enforce the same by a judgment against a third party for the proceeds of the sale of property included in the mortgage. John T. Stewart Estate v. Falkenberg, 82 Kan. 576, 109 Pac. 170.

(d) Leases.

A lease which, by reason of the ignorance and mistake of the scrivener, fails to conform to the oral agreement made by the parties, will be reformed if the evidence clearly shows what the agreement was. Silbar v. Ryder, 63 Wis. 106, 23 N. W. 106; Hoard v. Stone, 58 Mich. 578, 26 N. W. 141.

And equity will reform a lease where it is clearly and satisfactorily shown that the instrument fails to express the mutual understanding of the parties when given a legal construction, though in language selected by themselves. Brown v. Ward, 119 Iowa, 604, 93 N. W. 587; Powell v. Smith, L. R. 14 Eq. 85.

And where one person entered into an agreement for the lease of a fishery from another, and, at the time of entering into the agreement, both parties believed that the proposed lessor was the owner of the fishery, but it was afterwards discovered that the proposed lessee was the true owner thereof, and there was no fraud on either side, the proposed lessee is entitled to have the agreement set aside, subject to equitable terms. Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 Week. Rep. 1053.

So, if a lease is drawn of all of a building, but before it is signed by the lessor, the parties agree verbally that it shall only cover the building as it then is, and that the lessor may erect and use a second story, the lessee cannot recover in ejectment a second story afterwards erected, but a court of equity will prevent such fraudulent use of the lease, and reform it so as to make it correspond with the verbal agreement of the parties. Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 644.

And where in an action to enjoin the defendant from tearing down and removing certain buildings and improvements on premises leased to him by the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded that, during the negotiations for the lease, it was distinctly understood and agreed that the improvements mentioned were the property of the defendant, and that he was to have the right to remove them on the expiration of the lease, and that such right should be one of the conditions of the lease, and that, by accident or mistake, this condition was omitted, and that when the lease was presented to defendant to sign, he objected because of such omission, and the plaintiff then agreed with him that such omission should make no difference, and, relying on this agreement and the good faith and honesty of the plaintiff, the defendant executed the lease,—evidence to this effect is properly admitted on the trial. Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, 59 Cal. 630.

So, where a written contract for a lease which was intended to be for the term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, contained no statement of the term for which the lease was to be made, the mistake may be established by parol proof; and the lessee is entitled to have the contract reformed by the insertion of the words, "for the term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever," or words of like import, and when so reformed, to have the agreement specifically executed. Popplein v. Foley, 61 Md. 381.

And a person giving a lease of a house, signed by him only, may give evidence on a bill to carry the agreement into execution, that the understanding was that the tenant should pay the rent clear of taxes, and that the agreement therefor was omitted by mistake, for the purpose of giving the lessor the benefit thereof by way of objection to specific performance. Joynes v. Statham, 3 Atk. 388.

And where a person leased certain buildings to another with the mutual understanding that, in case the buildings were destroyed, the lessee should be released from further liability for rent, and they were advised that the language used in the lease properly expressed their agreement, which, as a matter of law, it did not, and the buildings were destroyed by a tornado, and the lessor's assignee sued for rent accruing after such destruction, no recovery can be had therefor. Reed v. Root, 59 Iowa, 359, 13 N. W. 323.

In the above case, Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138, infra, IV. c, 3, (f), was distinguished upon the ground that that was an action at law, and no equitable defense was pleaded; and Glenn v. Statler, 42 Iowa, 107, infra, IV. c, 3, (f), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case there was a conflict in the evidence as to the character of the bond that was prepared and executed; and Gerald v. Elley, 45 Iowa, 322, supra, IV. b, 3 (a), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case there was no contract that the encumbrances should be exempted from the operations of the deed.

Where a lease is made pursuant to an agreement between two persons, and the lease is executed according to the express terms of the agreement, however, parol evidence is not admissible to show that the lease, though in strict conformity with the terms of the written agreement, was contrary to its spirit, there being something outside the contract agreed upon between the parties, and omitted from the lease. Davies v. Fitton, 2 Drury & War. 225.

And where a written lease for a term of three years recited that the agreed rent was $1,500 for the term, payable in two equal instalments of $750 each at the end of the first and second years of the term, a bill to reform it so as to make it show that the agreed rent was $500 for each year, though payable as specified, thereby giving him a landlord's statutory lien and remedy against the crop for each year's rent, will not lie, the supposed legal effect of the change in the contract being conclusive against the existence of the alleged mistake, since the contract as thus reformed would be inharmonious and inconsistent, if not impossible of legal effect and operation. Campbell v. Hatchett, 55 Ala. 548.

Whether a lease should be reformed for mistake is exclusively a question for the court. Loukowski v. Pryor, 46 Colo. 584, 106 Pac. 7.

(e) Contracts with reference to lands.

Courts of equity have the power and jurisdiction so to reform an executory contract for the sale of real estate as to require and compel it to speak the truth in the matter of description and other things, where it is clearly established that the instrument on its face speaks falsely. Allen v. Kitchen, 16 Idaho, 133, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 100 Pac. 1052.

And a mutual mistake as to the subject-matter of the contract is sufficient to avoid it. Mochlenpali v. Mayhew, 138 Wis. 561, 119 N. W. 826.

And a complaint in an action to reform a contract for the sale of land, that a certain provision was omitted from the writing by mistake, and such provision was one of the terms of the contract between the parties, and that another provision was inserted by mistake, it being in fact a part of another contract, sufficiently alleges an agreement to the terms and provisions of the contract as sought to be reformed. House v. McMullen, 9 Cal. App. 664, 100 Pac. 344.

So, where it unmistakably appears that both parties to a contract for the sale of real estate understood that it expressed only a sale of the vendor's interest in the premises, the contract will be reformed to express the true object of the parties, though there is a reference in the contract to the life estate of the life tenant, coupled with language that the vendor was to deliver a deed of the undivided one-quarter interest in the premises, which might justify the conclusion that the vendor had contracted to sell an undivided one quarter of the premises, and not merely his interest. Bacot v. Fessenden, 64 Misc. 422; 119 N. Y. Supp. 464.

And the vendee in a contract for the sale of land, purporting to bind the vendor to a conveyance simply of his interest, is entitled to a reformation of the contract to meet the real intention of the parties to embrace the entire property, including the interest of a cotenant which he had no power to convey, he, at the time of the contract, expecting to obtain such power. Conner v. Baxter, 124 Iowa, 219, 99 N. W. 726.

And where a contract for the purchase of land was agreed to be drawn that the grantees should forfeit a specified sum only for default on their part, and that in case of default by the grantor, he should forfeit the land, but the contract as signed provided that if either party failed to perform, the grantees should pay to the grantor the specified sum, the grantees are entitled to have the contract so reformed as to provide for such forfeiture by them only in case of their own default. Smith v. Watson, 88 Iowa, 73, 55 N. W. 68.

And where one party sold real estate to another, the contract being that the buyer should pay the taxes after the year in which the sale was made, but, by mistake in writing the bond for a deed, the scrivener omitted that part referring to the taxes, and upon the purchaser failing to pay the taxes, the seller was compelled to do so, for the purpose of making his security for deferred payments, upon reformation of the contract, the seller was entitled to repayment of the taxes, with lawful interest. Hale v. Young, 24 Neb. 464, 39 N. W. 406.

So, where, at the time of executing a negotiable note, the maker also executed a title bond, agreeing to convey to the payee an undivided one-half interest in certain mining claims, and that the payee should have a lien on these claims for the payment of the note, inserting a special condition that "this bond shall be and remain a special lien upon and for the payment" of the note, but, by mistake, the words, "the said property above described" were omitted after the words, "lien upon," as between an indorsee of the note and the maker, and against subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers of the premises with full notice of the payee's and indorsee's right, the bond will be reformed so as to express the meaning of the parties thereto. Smith v. Brunk, 14 Colo. 75, 23 Pac. 325.

And where the owners of a tract of mineral land negotiated a sale thereof, but the transaction was suspended because third persons gave notice that they claimed an interest in the minerals, and to clear their title and consummate the sale, the vendors procured deeds from such persons, paying them a large sum of money therefor, and formerly the two claimants had held their interests in common, but, before execution of the deeds, had, by arrangement, partitioned the same, but the deeds described the entire tract, and conveyed an undivided one-half of the minerals therein, it was the evident intent of the parties to sell and purchase the entire interest of the claimants, and the deeds should be reformed to conform to such intent, on the ground of mutual mistake. Brown v. Cranberry Iron & Coal Co. 28 C. C. A. 567, 42 U. S. App. 675, 84 Fed. 930, affirming 82 Fed. 351.

So, where a mutual mistake is made in reducing a contract for the exchange of lands to writing, a court of equity will reform the contract, and enforce it as reformed. Hallam v. Corlett, 71 Iowa, 446, 32 N. W. 449.

And a written contract reciting an agreement between two persons by which one agreed to sell lots described by number in a 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

named block, known by a certain name, and the other agreed to sell him a certain numbered house on the corner of named streets, may be reformed in equity by substituting the word "exchange" for the word "sell," and inserting a more particular description of the property. House v. McMullen, 9 Cal. App. 664, 100 Pac. 344.

Nor will a bill in equity for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands be enforced where the defendant shows that by mistake, and without fault, he entered into an agreement very different from that which he thought he was making, and engaged to do something far more onerous than that which he supposed he was undertaking, and where the plaintiff, being cognizant of the mistake, did not disclose it. Chute v. Quincy, 156 Mass. 189, 30 N. E. 550.

(f) Bonds.

Where, by mistake or unskilfulness of the drawer, a bond is not according to the understanding of the parties, and thereby a party thereto is disabled to recover, equity, on account of the mistake, will grant relief. Huson v. Pitman, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 331; Olmsted v. Olmsted, 38 Conn. 309.

And it will reform the instrument, as well against sureties as principals. Olmsted v. Olmsted, supra.

And bonds apparently absolute may be shown by evidence to be merely counter securities. Todd v. Rivers, 1 Desauss. Eq. 155.

So, where, through mistake, a principal named in a bond executed by a surety delivers it without signing the same, a court of equity may reform the instrument, and require the principal to sign it. Ætna Indemnity Co. v. Baltimore, S. P. & C. R. Co. 112 Md. 389, 76 Atl. 251.

And where one person agreed to be bound in a bond as surety to another, and signed and sealed accordingly, but, by the neglect of the clerk, his name was not inserted, and the party for whom he was surety showed him the condition and his name and seal, and demanded payment, and threatened to sue him unless he gave fresh security, which he agreed to do, but refused after finding the mistake, and that he was not bound by law, equity will compel him to do so. Crosby v. Middleton, Prec. in Ch. 309.

And a court of equity may insert the penalty in a bond where the sum was omitted by mistake, and the extent of the liability of those who executed the instrument can be definitely ascertained. State ex rel. Frank v. Frank, 51 Mo. 98.

So, a bond making the obligors liable jointly only will be reformed in equity where it was drawn up by a tradesman ignorant of the nature of a bond, and was intended to be a joint and several bond. Simpson v. Vaughan, 2 Atk. 31.

And a joint bond may be held to be several against creditors in the administration of assets, where the evidence was full as to the intention that each partner should be severally bound, and the bonds were filled up as joint bonds through mistakes and ignorance of the parties. Burn v. Burn, 3 Ves. Jr. 573.

So, where a joint and several bond was given for duties at the customhouse, and afterwards a joint judgment was obtained against all the obligors, both principal and sureties, and then one of the sureties died and the survivors became insolvent, the United States is entitled to maintain a suit in equity for the recovery of the debt out of the assets of the deceased judgment debtor whose estate was also insolvent, in virtue of its general priority in cases of insolvency. United States v. Cushman, 2 Sumn. 426, Fed. Cas. No. 14,908.

And when a bond is executed by one member of a firm, all of the members intending the instrument should bind them, the obligee has no remedy against the firm at law, but, on the ground of mistake, may charge them in equity. McNaughten v. Partridge, 11 Ohio, 223, 38 Am. Dec. 731.

And where, on the appointment of a guardian by a court of probate, a bond was taken, payable to the judge of probate and his successors in office, conditioned that the guardian should faithfully discharge the duties of guardian according to law, and render a true account of his guardianship to the judge of probate or to the wards, when arriving at full age, which bond was executed jointly by the guardian as principal, and the father of the guardian and grandfather of the wards as sureties, and the guardian wasted the estate, and failed to account, and a successor was appointed, in a bill in equity by the successor and wards against the executrix of the surety of the defaulting guardian, it will be presumed that it was the intention of both the principal and the surety and the judge of probate that the bond should be obligatory on the sureties of the obligors, and therefore joint and several, and should be treated accordingly. Olmsted v. Olmsted, 38 Conn. 309.

So, where a declaration of trust recited that a bond of indemnity was to be given, and it was clear that it was intended that the bond should contain a condition as to the payment of certain amounts when adjusted, but it did not so state, a reformation of the instrument upon the ground of mutual mistake is proper. Darmour v. Chapman, 2 App. Div. 112, 37 N. Y. Supp. 674.

And where a bond was given in order to procure a discharge from a ne exeat conditioned to abide and perform the orders and decrees of the court, and the word "perform" was inserted by mutual mistake as to the legal effect of the instrument, a suit upon it to compel a surety to pay the amount of the decree may be enjoined. Griswold v. Hazard, 141 U. S. 260, 35 L. ed. 678, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, 999.

And where a bond for the delivery of personal property levied on by execution was executed by a judgment debtor and by the real owner as his surety, without intention on the part of the latter to concede his right, a recital that the property was that of the judgment debtor was rectified in equity at the instance of the owner. Helm v. Wright, 2 Humph. 72.

And where a bond was filed with the clerk of the proper court, and treated throughout the proceedings upon the estate of a deceased person as that of the executor of the estate, and it appeared that the intention of the parties was to execute a bond for the benefit of that estate, but they failed to express such intention, through inadvertence or mistake, not having named the estate in the bond, equity will reform the bond so as to make it conform to the intention of the parties, and the sureties will be held liable on the bond thus reformed. Foley v. Hamilton, 89 Iowa, 686, 57 N. W. 439.

And a mistake in the recital as to the amount for which an attachment issued may be explained and corrected by parol in an action on the attachment bond. Palmer v. Vance, 13 Cal. 553.

A clearly established misapprehension of the law by a surety on a bond creates a basis for the interference of a court of equity, resting on discretion, to be exercised only, however, in an unquestionable case, to relieve the surety on the bond from a liability he did not intend to assume. Griswold v. Hazard, supra.

And where two are bound by a bond, and the obligee releases one, supposing, by a mistake of law, that the other will remain bound, he will not be relieved in equity upon the mere ground of his mistake the law. Harman v. Cam, 4 Vin. Abr. 387; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. 123.

And where a bond was given by a surety as the parties intended it to be, but, by a subsequent event, the surety became discharged at law, he will not be charged in equity. Huson v. Pitman, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 331.

Nor can a mistake, upon the part of a person executing to an officer a bond for the release of attached property, as to its legal effect, it being intended as a delivery bond, but only binding the obligor to pay the judgment rendered against the attachment defendant, avail to avoid that construction of the instrument which the language used and rules of law applied thereto require. Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138.

And ignorance of the legal effect of a delivery bond conditioned to pay whatever judgment might be rendered against the defendant does not afford ground for equitable relief. Glenn v. Statler, 42 Iowa, 107.

And where a county treasurer who had given no bond to cover school funds, as required, was in default, and the sureties on his general bond, erroneously supposing themselves liable for school funds, under threat of suit, in settlement with the board of supervisors, made payment of an amount which they knew was less than the entire default, knowing, too, that the board was ignorant of the fact that it was less, on ascertaining that the general bond was not a security for the school funds, they cannot, on the ground of mistake or coercion, recover from the county the amount paid by them in excess of the default as to the general funds. Pass v. Grenada County, 71 Miss. 426, 14 So. 447.

(g) Negotiable instruments.

Mistakes in the execution of negotiable paper may always be corrected, unless the rights of third parties have intervened. German Nat. Bank v. Butchers' Hide & Tallow Co. 97 Ky. 34, 29 S. W. 882.

And where it is clearly established that a note was by mutual mistake executed for a smaller or different sum than intended, equity will, as between the parties, decree reformation in accordance with the transaction as it was actually agreed upon. Fuller v. Hawkins, 60 Ark. 304, 30 S. W. 34; Gould v. Emerson, 160 Mass. 438, 39 Am. St. Rep. 501, 35 N. E. 1065.

So, a court of equity may supply an omission in a promissory note, fixing the rate of interest so as to make it correspond with the intention of the parties. Hathaway v. Brady, 23 Cal. 121.

And where, from a note given on a sale of lands, the words "with interest" were omitted by mistake, the court has equity jurisdiction to correct the mistake, and decree the payment of interest that is overdue. Gump's Appeal, 65 Pa. 476.

And where a note is filled up with the name of the payee, the date, amount, and time of payment, and it is provided in a subsequent clause that failure to pay interest as therein agreed makes the note wholly due and payable, and the holder may then proceed to collect principal and interest, and in the mortgage by which the note is secured it is described as payable five years from date, with 10 per cent interest per annum annually, the note will bear interest from date, notwithstanding the printed words, "with interest after maturity," were not erased, according to agreement, at the time the note was filled up. Stanton v. Caffee, 58 Wis. 261, 16 N. W. 601.

So, the chancellor will relieve against a note for current money of the state, where it appears that the contract was for the current paper or bank notes, and that there is a difference in the value of the two kinds of money. Burdett v. Simms, 3 J. J. Marsh. 190.

And a note for a stated sum, which may be discharged in current bank notes, may be reformed in equity to read "payable in current bank notes," on admission in the answer that such was the contract. Talley v. Courtney, 1 Heisk. 715.

And where a renewed bill of exchange was drawn out with a blank for the drawer's name by an agent of the holder, who, by mistake, inserted above the place where the drawer's name was afterwards inserted, the name of the holder, and the signature 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the drawer and acceptor were afterwards added, and the bill indorsed by the holder, the holder cannot prove the real contract in an action on the instrument at law, because of the established jurisdiction in equity to correct mistakes in documents; but if the action had been simply for the reformation of the instrument, so as to render it such an instrument as the parties agreed should be given, the holder would be entitled to have it rectified. Druiff v. Parker, L. R. 5 Eq. 131.

So, where the word "dollars" was omitted from a bill single by mistake, so that a party was deprived of the specific security intended to be given thereby, he will be granted relief in equity. Newcomer v. Kline, 11 Gill & J. 457, 37 Am. Dec. 74.

And where a note was made payable for $1,000, and the consideration of the mortgage given to secure it was stated to be 1,000, the word "dollars" being omitted therefrom, the word will be supplied in an action brought to reform and foreclose the mortgage, agreeably to the understanding and meaning of the parties. Palmer v. Carey, 63 Wis. 426, 21 N. W. 793, 23 N. W. 586.

And where, in writing, a note was made payable in instalments of $8 per month, with interest, in accordance with the intention of the parties, but the note contained a printed promise to pay the principal five years after date, it will be reformed in equity so as to make it conform to the makers' intentions. Turpin v. Gresham, 106 Iowa, 187, 76 N. W. 680.

So, where the president and secretary of an incorporated company, in making a promissory note of the company for securing a debt owing by the company, by mutual mistake of the parties, executed the same so as to make it their own instead of the corporate obligation, a court of equity will reform the note so as to make the undertaking the obligation of the company. Fisher v. Barnett, 56 Ill. App. 649; Lee v. Percival, 85 Iowa, 639, 52 N. W. 543.

And a court of equity may reform a note if, in the execution thereof, the word "for," by the mutual mistake of the parties, was omitted after the signature of the president of the corporation for which the note was made. Prescott v. Hixon, 22 Ind. App. 139, 72 Am. St. Rep. 291, 53 N. E. 391.

So, a note signed by an individual name, followed by the word "president," and upon which the name of a corporation appears above the line on which are written the place and date of execution, but nowhere else, is not conclusively presumed to be the personal obligation of the signer, but it may be shown by parol evidence to be the contract of the corporation. Second Nat. Bank v. Midland Steel Co. 155 Ind. 581, 52 L.R.A. 307, 58 N. E. 833.

And though the language of a note executed by township trustees imports a personal obligation, it may be shown by parol evidence, on an issue of reformation, that the intention of both the makers and the payee was to execute an instrument binding only on the township, and that though the language used was that which they intended, it did not express their true purpose; and in such case the trustees, when sued individually, were entitled to have the notes reformed so as to bind the township. Western Wheeled Scraper Co. v. Stickleman, 122 Iowa, 396, 98 N. W. 139.

So, where it was the intention of all the parties concerned that certain promissory notes given by trustees should be payable out of the trust estate only, but, owing to a mutual mistake in the legal effect of the phraseology of the notes, they were so drawn as to render the trustees personally liable, the notes should be reformed in equity so as to express the true intention. Richmond v. Ogden Street R. Co. 44 Or. 48, 74 Pac. 333.

And where, in the settlement of partnership accounts, it was found that one partner had withdrawn from the funds of the firm a certain sum in excess of the amount withdrawn by the other, and through a mutual and innocent mistake the former gave to the latter a promissory note for such sum, instead of one half of it, a court of equity will grant relief against the mistake. Gould v. Emerson, 160 Mass. 438, 39 Am. St. Rep. 501, 35 N. E. 1065.

So, an administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband may bring suit against the maker and indorser of promissory notes made payable to her individually, alleging that the notes were thus made payable by mistake of all the parties, and that they should have been made payable to her as administratrix of her husband, and praying reform of the notes so as to be thus payable. Jackson v. McCalla, 133 Ga. 749, 66 S. E. 918.

And where a negotiable note payable at and discounted by a particular bank was repeatedly renewed, the several renewals being made payable in the same way until the last renewal, which was made payable at "said bank," the word said being by mistake substituted for the name of the bank, it being manifest that, in contemplation of all the parties, the word "said" meant the bank named in the previous renewals, they will be so read by the court; or, if they be not so read, the mistake, being pleaded and proved, would be corrected, if the rights of no third persons were involved. German Nat. Bank v. Butchers' Hide & Tallow Co. 97 Ky. 34, 29 S. W. 882.

And if a mistake is made in a seed grain note which is intended to be secured by a crop growing on certain land, the mortgagor may, on discovering the mistake, execute a new note without releasing the lien on the crop, because, if he did not do so voluntarily, he might be compelled by a court of equity in a suit to reform the original note to conform to the actual agreement of the parties. Miller v. McCarty, 47 Minn. 321, 28 Am. St. Rep. 375, 50 N. W. 235.

So, equity will grant relief from an indorsement which, through mistake as to the legal effect of the words used, binds the indorser to pay the note, when the true contract and intention was to write only such an indorsement as would convey the title without rendering the indorser liable. Clayton v. Bussey, 30 Ga. 946, 76 Am. Dec. 680.

And that a promissory note was given without consideration, although it was obtained from the maker by the holder by a representation that the maker was indebted to the holder in the sum mentioned in the note, whereas in truth no such sum of money or part thereof was ever due from the maker to the holder, was a sufficient defense to an action on the note, without an allegation that the representation was made fraudulently. Forman v. Wright, 11 C. B. 481.

Parol evidence is inadmissible, however, to vary or explain an unconditional indorsement of notes, but is competent for the purpose of reforming the contract of indorsement. Van Vleet v. Sledge, 45 Fed. 743.

And an entry in the books of the indorser of promissory notes, claimed to have been a written memorandum of a verbal agreement in regard to the indorsement, cannot be reformed to show that the indorsement was conditional, where it was, without mistake, made to appear that the notes were unconditional. Ibid.

But where the alteration of an instrument is prompted by honest motives, with a purpose of correcting it to correspond with what the parties in good faith believed to be the true engagement of the parties at the time of its execution, the act does not destroy the legal efficiency of the instrument, and recovery may be had on it when restored, and a court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit to restore the original conditions of a note alleged to have been changed under misapprehension of the rights of the parties, and to recover thereon, when the suit involves a discovery which is in some degree necessary to show the agreement and the mistake. Wallace v. Tice, 32 Or. 283, 51 Pac. 733.

(h) Insurance policies.

A policy of insurance which, by reason of mutual mistake of the parties, does not embody their real intention, may be reformed in equity. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 283; Bishop v. Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. 49 Conn. 167; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Hilliard (Fla.) 52 So. 799; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Jordan (Ga.) 68 S. E. 611; Welch v. Welch, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 639; Phenix F. Ins. Co. v. Gurnee, 1 Paige, 278, 19 Am. Dec. 431; Western Assur. Co. v. Ward, 21 C. C. A. 378, 41 U. S. App. 443, 75 Fed. 338; Abraham v. North German Ins. Co. 40 Fed. 717; Glover v. Mutual Commercial Marine Ins. Co. 2 Curt. C. C. 277, Fed. Cas. No. 10,498.

And the chancellor may, either upon the application of the insured, during his life, or upon the application of the beneficiary, after his death, correct the mistake. Welch v. Welch, supra; Scott v. Provident Mut. Relief Asso. 63 N. H. 556, 4 Atl. 792.

And a court of equity may enforce the contract when so reformed, in order to do complete justice to the parties in the controversy. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Hilliard, supra.

Courts of equity possess the power to correct mistakes in policies of insurance, even to the extent of changing the most material clauses. Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300.

An insurance policy, like any other written contract, may be impeached by either party thereto for fraud or mistake. Slobodisky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 52 Neb. 395, 72 N. W. 483; National F. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 16 Md. 260, 77 Am. Dec. 289.

Or if anything is omitted which it was the duty of the company to insert or indorse on the instrument. National F. Ins. Co. v. Crane, supra.

And an error in reducing a contract of insurance to writing may be corrected by the court. Lippincott v. Insurance Co. 3 La. 546, 23 Am. Dec. 467; Hill v. Millville Mut. M. & F. Ins. Co. 39 N. J. Eq. 66.

And a mistake by the parties to a policy of fire insurance, as to the effect of the language used, authorizes a reformation of the contract, although there is no direct allegation of a mistake of fact. Maher v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 283.

So, where a policy of insurance is sought to be reformed for mistake, parol evidence showing the real agreement is not objectionable, as contradicting the terms of the instrument. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 283.

Or as contravening any principle of statute or common law. Henshaw v. Clark, 2 Root, 1; Slobodisky v. Phenix Ins. Co. supra.

And this may be done where the court exercises the functions of law and equity at the same time, there being proper pleadings on the trial of the action thereon in which the mistake is shown. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill, supra.

So, if a party fails through mistake to obtain such an insurance policy as he is entitled to by an existing valid contract, equity will relieve him, though the mistake arose from ignorance of law. Oliver v. Mutual Commercial Marine Ins. Co. supra; McIntosh v. North State F. Ins. Co. 152 N. C. 50, 67 S. E. 45.

And where the agent of an insurance company wrote up a policy upon terms not agreed upon with the insured, the remedy of the insured, upon discovering the fact, is not limited to a return of the policy and the demanding of a rescission. Clem v. German Ins. Co. 29 Mo. App. 666.

And where a policy of insurance is sought to be reformed for mistake by showing that the real agreement between the parties was different from the policy, it is not material that the parol agreement was 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

made some weeks prior to the issuance of the policy. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill, supra.

But a statement made by a deceased beneficiary in an insurance policy issued two years before, as to his understanding of the terms of the policy, is not admissible to show mistake in it. Bowers v. New York L. Ins. Co. 68 Fed. 785.

So, an insurance policy may be reformed for mistake after, as well as before, loss, if the assured has not been guilty of laches. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill, supra; Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 364, 11 Am. St. Rep. 121, 20 N. E. 77; Delaware State F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Gillett, 54 Md. 219; McIntosh v. North State F. Ins. Co. supra; Brugger v. State Invest. & Ins. Co. 5 Sawy. 304, Fed. Cas. No. 2,051; Snell v. Atlantic F. & M. Ins. Co. 98 U. S. 85, 25 L. ed. 52.

And if the mistake is satisfactorily shown, either from the application or oral testimony. Brugger v. State Invest. & Ins. Co. supra.

So, a policy of insurance may be corrected as to a mistake in the date of the expiration thereof. Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Jaynes, 87 Ill. 199.

And where a life insurance policy was by mistake made payable to the agent who secured the policy, instead of the wife of the person insured, contrary to the agreement and instructions, the money received by the administrator after the death of the insured will be ordered to be paid to the widow, agreeably to the original instructions for filling up the policy. Henshaw v. Clark, supra.

Nor is evidence that, through a mistake as to the legal import of the language used in a policy of insurance, the policy was made to run in the name of one not the owner of the property insured, insufficient to sustain a decree of reformation of the policy. Lansing v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 4 Neb. (Unof.) 140, 93 N. W. 756.

And a mutual benefit certificate may be reformed after the death of the member to make the benefit payable to his administrator, where, by mutual misapprehension of the legal effect of the language used, it failed to make the benefit so payable, as the parties intended. Eastman v. Provident Mut. Relief Asso. 65 N. H. 176, 5 L.R.A. 712, 23 Am. St. Rep. 29, 18 Atl. 745.

So, where a mortgagee applied for insurance through an agent employed by a local agent of an insurance company, intending to procure an insurance of his mortgage interest, and so stating to the agent, but the agent drew the application as for an insurance on the property itself, in the name of the mortgagor, and as his property, the amount to be payable in case of loss to the mortgagee, and the policy was drawn accordingly, in the belief that such was the proper legal mode of effecting an insurance on the mortgage interest, the mistake may be corrected by a court of chancery, although it was one of law, and not of fact. Woodbury Sav. Bank & Bldg. Asso. v. Charter Oak F. & M. Ins. Co. 31 Conn. 517; Sias v. Roger Williams Ins. Co. 8 Fed. 183.

And in such case, the mortgagee's right to reform the policy in equity is not affected by the fact that the agent had been instructed by the company not to take applications for insurance upon mortgage interests, the mortgagee having no knowledge of such limitation of the powers of the agent. Woodbury Sav. Bank & Bldg. Asso. v. Charter Oak F. & M. Ins. Co. supra.

And where the owners of a warehouse, being indebted to a person, agreed to insure the warehouse against fire, for his benefit, and accordingly agreed with an insurance company for such insurance in their names, with loss payable to the creditor, but by mistake the creditor's name was written in the policy as the assured and owner of the property, and a loss occurred within the period of the risk, the creditor is entitled to have the contract reformed according to the true understanding and purpose of the parties thereto. Spare v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 9 Sawy. 142, 17 Fed. 568.

So, equity will reform a policy of marine insurance not containing a stipulation allowing a second port for loading a return cargo, when the antecedent correspondence of the parties shows that the insured intended to secure such protection, and that the insurer knew such to be his intention. Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300, affirmed in 20 Wall. 494, 22 L. ed. 398; National Traders Bank v. Ocean Ins. Co. 62 Me. 519.

And where an insurance policy insures eight boxes of indigo instead of eighteen boxes, and omits to state the route of the vessel having the goods on board, it will be reformed so as to correct the statements. Brioso v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Daly, 246.

And where the correspondence between the parties constituted a preliminary agreement to insure a vessel to the port of loading in Cuba, a policy insuring the vessel to port of discharge in Cuba is not in accordance with the agreement, and may be reformed. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. v. Hearne, 20 Wall. 494, 22 L. ed. 398, affirming 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300.

But courts of admiralty have jurisdiction over marine policies of insurance as maritime contracts, but not over contracts leading to policies, and they cannot reform a policy by an antecedent contract; that is within the jurisdiction of courts of equity. Andrews v. Essex F. & M. Ins. Co. 3 Mason, 10, Fed. Cas. No. 374.

And a clause in a marine insurance policy, permitting the vessel to stop at various ports for the purpose of procuring a return cargo, is not a part of the contract, to be inserted in the policy, but is a mere representation of fact, such clause not altering the nature of the insurance or liability of the underwriters; and where 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

such a clause is omitted, the policy cannot be reformed by its insertion. Ibid.

Nor does a slip signed by the agent of insurers, and presented by a clerk of the insurers' insurance broker, form a contract or constitute a binding agreement between the parties until the policy is signed and the premium paid; and where the insurers issue a policy of marine insurance on a cargo which suffers loss, and file a bill for reformation of the policy, so as to make it conformable to the real contract, in proof of which they produce in evidence such slip, they cannot recover. Mackenzie v. Coulson, L. R. 8 Eq. 368.

And where a vessel was insured to a port in Cuba, and thence to a port of advice and discharge in Europe, a bill to reform the policy by inserting a clause allowing the vessel to go to a second port in Cuba cannot be sustained after loss, on the sole ground of a usage that vessels making a voyage to Cuba should visit one port to discharge their cargo, and another to take a return cargo. Hearne v. New England Mut. M. Ins. Co. 20 Wall. 488, 22 L. ed. 395.

So, where a contract of insurance is agreed to, whatever it, by fair interpretation, includes, the underwriters are bound to insert in the policy; and if they omit to do so, the insured has a right to insist upon strict conformity with the original agreement. Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300; Esch Bros. v. Home Ins. Co. 78 Iowa, 334, 16 Am. St. Rep. 443, 43 N. W. 229.

And where the insured persons and the insurer agree that the policy of insurance shall be issued to protect them according to their respective interests, and the policy is not so issued, it may be reformed so as to show the real interests of the parties in all the property insured, and, as reformed, it may be enforced. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Hilliard (Fla.) 52 So. 799.

And where a member of a partnership applied for insurance upon the partnership property and in the name of the firm, and the officers of the insurance company so understood the application, but, by mistake, issued a policy in the name of the individual partner alone, a court of equity will reform the policy so as to make it conform to the intention of the parties. Keith v. Globe Ins. Co. 52 Ill. 518, 4 Am. Rep. 624.

And where the interest insured is described in the policy of insurance as that of a mortgagee, when in fact it was a mechanics' lien, the parties supposing that the description in the policy covered a mechanics' lien, the insured may show the mistake as one of fact in an action thereon, conducted as a proceeding in chancery, and recover on the instrument as corrected. Stout v. City F. Ins. Co. 12 Iowa, 371, 79 Am. Dec. 539.

And where insurance upon a mechanics' lien interest in real estate is applied for, and a policy is issued in which the interest of the assured is described as that of a mortgagee, both parties believing that the description embraces the interest of a mechanics' lien, the contract will be so reformed in equity as to make it express the real intent of the parties. Longhurst v. Star Ins. Co. 19 Iowa, 364.

So, a bill will lie to reform an insurance policy issued to protect a mortgagee's interest, where, by a mutual mistake, the name of the occupant and supposed owner of the premises was inserted as such in the policy, neither party having actual notice or knowledge of an adverse title growing out of an execution sale to set aside which a suit was then being prosecuted by such occupant, the insurance agent being informed that the title to the property was in dispute. Balen v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 67 Mich. 179, 34 N. W. 654.

And where a mortgagee applies to a general agent of an insurance corporation to obtain insurance upon his interest as mortgagee, and his application and the consideration for the insurance are accepted, whereupon he requests the agent to write the policy so as to effect his purpose, and relies upon him to determine what form is necessary under the law of insurance for that purpose, the agent is bound to write the policy so as to insure the mortgagee's interest in his own name; and if the agent adopts a wrong form, the policy may, after loss, be reformed in equity so as to express the intention of the parties, notwithstanding the rules of the company forbid the issuance of policies to mortgagees. Esch Bros. v. Home Ins. Co. supra.

So, where a policy of insurance which has been drawn up by the agent of the insurer, and merely accepted by the insured, does not represent the intention of both parties, because of the fault or negligence of the agent, it may be reformed so as to express the contract as it was intended to be made. Williams v. North German Ins. Co. 24 Fed. 625; Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 364, 11 Am. St. Rep. 121, 20 N. E. 77; Fitchner v. Fidelity Mut. Fire Asso. 103 Iowa, 276, 72 N. W. 530; Delaware State F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Gillett, 54 Md. 219.

And if an insurance agent makes a mistake in declaring the interest of the insured, equity will require it to be corrected and the policy to be reformed. Oliver v. Mutual Commercial Marine Ins. Co. 2 Curt. C. C. 277, Fed. Cas. No. 10,498; Bailey v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 4 McCrary. 221, 13 Fed. 250; German F. Ins. Co. v. Gueck, 130 Ill. 345, 6 L.R.A. 835, 23 N. E. 112, affirming 31 Ill. App. 151; Ben Franklin Ins. Co. v. Gillett, 54 Md. 212; Maher v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 283; Phoenix F. Ins. Co. v. Gurnee, 1 Paige, 278, 19 Am. Dec. 431.

And where, in a written application for a policy of insurance, the applicant committed a mistake in describing the encumbrance upon his property, in consequence of the representations of the agent of the company who drew up the application, and the property insured was afterwards destroyed by fire, a court of chancery has power to reform the contract and grant relief. Harris v. Columbiana County Mut. Ins. Co. 18 Ohio, 116, 51 Am. Dec. 448.

And where an insurance agent was applied to for insurance on goods kept in two separate buildings, and he was unable to supply it, and applied to an agent of other companies for it, and, in the preparation of the policy, by mistake of the two agents, the policy did not read as it was agreed between them that it should, but was just the kind of policy which the applicants had applied for, whatever rights the insurance company might have had if it had acted promptly in the matter, and informed the insured persons, instead of the agent, of the mistake, it could not, after the insured persons had relied upon the policy and suffered loss under it, escape liability on account of the mistake. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Shaver, 76 Iowa, 282, 41 N. W. 19.

So, although a party insured accepts a policy with knowledge of the language used in describing the property insured, if, at the time, he points out a mistake therein, but is prevented from having the same corrected, or is thrown off his guard and dissuaded therefrom by the acts or declarations of the insurer, he may show the mistake in an action upon the policy, and the insurer is estopped from setting up the letter of the contract in bar of the action, and from claiming that the situation of the property does not agree therewith. Maher v. Hibernia Ins. Co. supra.

And an insured person, if without negligence, is entitled to have his policy reformed so as to increase the amount of concurrent insurance allowed, where the company's agent knew, when the application was made, that the insured was actually arranging for other insurance, and had definitely fixed its amount, which, by the agent's mistake, was understated in the application, and such right is not dependent upon the authority of the agent to contract with reference to insurance, since the company is estopped to avail itself of the agent's mistake. Fitchner v. Fidelity Mut. Fire Asso. supra.

And where it appears that an insurance policy against loss by fire was issued to secure a mortgage of the insured property, but, by mistake, was made in the name of the owner of the property, instead of the mortgagee, who was the contracting party for the insurance, and the property was destroyed by fire during the term of the policy, equity will not permit the insurance company to set up its mistake in an action by the owner, to defeat the claim of insurance under the contract, and the contract will be reformed and judgment given against the insurance company, in favor of the mortgagee, for the amount of his mortgage. Fink v. Queen Ins. Co. 24 Fed. 318.

And where an agent having power to effect insurance without consulting the home office was fully apprised of the ignorance of the person insured, who was an illiterate German woman, unable to read or write the English language, and knew all about the nature and extent of her title, a policy issued by him on her property will not be void because she was not the absolute and unconditional owner, although it contained a stipulation that it should be void in that event. Hartford Ins. Co. v. Haas, 87 Ky. 531, 2 L.R.A. 64, 9 S. W. 720.

So, if the incorporation of other terms in an insurance policy than those agreed upon between the insured and the agent who wrote the policy was purposely done, thereby raising the inference of fraud, or from mistake, and the fact was not discovered until just before the loss, the insured is entitled to have the instrument reformed so as to express the real contract. Clem v. German Ins. Co. 29 Mo. App. 666; Thomason v. Capital Ins. Co. 92 Iowa, 72, 61 N. W. 843.

And to correct error in a policy of insurance, recourse may be had to the original memorandum of application for insurance, and its indorsements, showing its acceptance by the company. Lippincott v. Insurance Co. 3 La. 546, 23 Am. Dec. 467.

And where an agent of an insurance company, having full authority to enter into contracts of insurance for his principal, entered into a contract for insurance on property to the extent of $3,000 in several companies represented by him, a policy for a part of the sum being in the defendant company, this policy providing that it should be void if the assured should obtain additional insurance without the written consent of the company, in an action on the policy, wherein the additional insurance obtained under the contract was relied on as a defense, that the plaintiff relied on the agent to write the policy in accordance with the contract, and failed to read the policy to see if he had done so, was not such negligence as to bar him of the right to have the policy reformed so as to express the real contract. Barnes v. Hekla F. Ins. Co. 75 Iowa, 11, 9 Am. St. Rep. 450, 39 N. W. 122.

So, relief from a settlement and compromise of a claim for insurance will be granted where the insured acted without any real consideration, in ignorance of the rights and obligations of the parties, while the insurer had full knowledge thereof and of his ignorance, and induced him to act by false and fraudulent misrepresentations, although his mistake was in respect to his legal rights. Titus v. Rochester German Ins. Co. 97 Ky. 567, 28 L.R.A. 478, 53 Am. St. Rep. 426, 31 S. W. 127.

And where a member of a benefit association contracts for and pays the amount necessary to obtain a certificate for only $1,000, but, by the mistake and inadvertence of both parties, or by the mistake of the association, with knowledge on the part of the member, a certificate for $2,000 is issued and accepted, the association is entitled to a reformation in an action by the beneficiary upon the certificate. Gray v. Supreme Lodge K. H. 118 Ind. 293, 20 N. E. 833.

The power of courts of equity to correct mistakes in policies of insurance, however, should be exercised with great caution, and only when the proof is entirely satisfactory. Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300; Graves v. Boston M. Ins. Co. 2 Cranch, 419, 2 L. ed. 324.

Where an insurance policy differs from the parol contract on which it is founded, and it is sought to reform the policy, proof of the parol contract must be so clear as to place the matter beyond doubt, or, at least, beyond reasonable controversy. Bishop v. Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. 49 Conn. 167; Blake Opera House Co. v. Home Ins. Co. 73 Wis. 667, 41 N. W. 968.

A policy of insurance is prima facie presumed to embody the real intention of the parties, and evidence to overcome such presumption and reform a mistake must be clear and convincing. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 283.

And if an assured person accepts a policy without dissent, it is presumed he knows its contents; and the burden is on him in a proceeding to reform it for mistake to prove that he did not know its contents when it was accepted, as by showing that when he received it he put it away without inspection, or that he relied on the insurer's knowledge, and supposed he had drawn it correctly. Ibid.

And a policy of insurance on a building owned by a wife, providing for nonliability of the insurer if the title of the insured is not absolute, will not be reformed and enforced on the ground of mistake in issuing the same in the name of the husband, if the latter, with whom the contract was made, said nothing as to the title, but left it to be inferred that he was the owner. Schmid v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 37 S. W. 1013.

So, where an insurance policy insured buildings stated to be situated on a named section, when they were situated upon another section, and the section named was named by mistake, no recovery can be had for a loss to the buildings on the intended section without a reformation of the policy. Collins v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 44 Minn. 440, 46 N. W. 906.

Nor is the mere fact that an insured person did not know that his policy contained a certain provision a ground for reformation. McCormick v. Orient Ins. Co. 86 Cal. 260, 24 Pac. 1003.

And a policy of fire insurance will not be reformed so as to be upon the property as a whole, instead of being upon separate articles thereof in specified amounts, upon the testimony of the insured and his wife that such a mistake had been made, which was not only vague and uncertain, but which was flatly contradicted by the agent of the insurance company, who informed the insured at the time that, under the rules of the company, the policy must specify a separate amount upon each item, and that he read that portion of the policy to plaintiff as he wrote it. Epstein v. State Ins. Co. 21 Or. 179, 27 Pac. 1045.

And a policy of insurance insuring the owner of property against loss by fire on a building in process of erection by a contractor will not be reformed so as to insure the contractor also, where, although it was agreed in the building contract that the owner should insure the building so as to protect the contractor's interest, the agent who issued the policy did not know of such agreement, and was not requested, and did not undertake or intend, to write the insurance in that way. Santa Clara Female Academy v. Delaware Ins. Co. 93 Wis. 57, 66 N. W. 1140.

So, where a policy of insurance insured property in a certain section of a store, which section, for the purpose of insurance, was considered as a separate building, it is not in the power of a court of equity to reform the policy by specifying another section in the building as the one in which the property was located. Bryce v. Lorillard F. Ins. Co. 55 N. Y. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 249.

And evidence in an action on the policy to recover for the loss, that, for the purpose of insurance, each section was considered as a separate building, is properly received, and no recovery on the policy can be had. Ibid.

In the above case, Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 526, infra, IV. f, 1, was distinguished upon the ground that there the chancellor refused to enforce a contract for the purchase of land, resting in parol, on the ground that the vendee did not understand and intend it as the vendors did. And Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525, infra, IV. f, 1, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the conveyance was reformed on the ground of the fraud of the assignee of the contract, and on the ground that it was an erroneous performance of a contract as to the terms of which there was no dispute.

Nor can a policy of insurance be reformed to cover the interests of children of the insured person merely because the insured supposed he was insuring their interests as well as his own, when nothing was said at the time of the insurance as to the nature and extent of the interest insured. Hartford Ins. Co. v. Haas, 87 Ky. 531, 2 L.R.A. 64, 9 S. W. 720.

And an insurance policy cannot be reformed in equity on the ground that the statement of the existence of an encumbrance on the property and of the real interest of the parties intended to be insured was omitted by the inadvertence and mistake of agents of the parties, to whom these matters were known. Farmville Ins. & Bkg. Co. v. Butler, 55 Md. 233.

And where a man owned two buildings, one of which was a dwelling, and the other was used as a dwelling and a paint shop, and he applied to an insurance agent for insurance "on my house," and the agent thereupon made out a policy upon the dwelling, charging one half per cent premium, which was a smaller rate than was chargeable on the other building, the fact does not show an intent upon the part of the owner to insure the building used as a paint shop and dwelling, and does not justify a reformation of the policy so as to cover that building. Mead v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 453.

To warrant a reformation of an insurance policy, it must be shown that the contract as written was not what both parties to it intended it should be, and it must point out the mistake, and show that it was mutual, and a mistake of fact, and not of law; and a mere averment that an old condition in the policy was to have been erased and a new one inserted in its place does not show mutual mistake which will be reformed in equity. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Rogers, 11 Ind. App. 72, 38 N. E. 865.

And where it was claimed that a provision orally agreed upon has been omitted from the policy, it must be clearly and satisfactorily proved that before the policy was issued there was a distinct agreement that it should contain such provision, and that, through inadvertence or mistake, the stipulation was omitted. If the testimony is conflicting, or of such undecisive character as to raise a substantial doubt in the minds of the court, the contract as written must stand. Harrison v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. 862.

Nor can insurance policies be reformed where an insurance company issued two policies on the same property by mistake caused by a variance in the descriptions, since there was no meeting of minds, and the company did not consent to insure the same property twice. Ordway v. Chace, 57 N. J. Eq. 478, 42 Atl. 149.

So, if an insurance agent declared the interest of the insured in the wrong person, but did not do it by mistake, but through a fraudulent design, equity will not relieve the principal. Oliver v. Mutual Commercial Marine Ins. Co. 2 Curt. C. C. 277, Fed. Cas. No. 10,498.

And where an insurance company issued an accident policy to a person, by the terms of which death resulting from intentional injuries inflicted by another person was excepted from its benefits, and afterwards the insured was killed by an assassin, and upon suit brought by the beneficiary in the policy, to have it reformed by striking out the exception, evidence of the subagent of the insurance company, who solicited the insurance, that when he issued the policy he knew that the insured was engaged in a dangerous business, and was likely to be assassinated, and wanted a policy to protect his family in that event, and the agent told him the policy issued to him would cover the case of his being assassinated, but that he did not intend to make any different contract from that contained in the usual form of policy, and that his representations to the insured were due to ignorance of the terms of the policy, or misunderstanding of their effect,—is insufficient to justify the reformation of the contract. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Henderson, 16 C. C. A. 390, 32 U. S. App. 536, 69 Fed. 762.

(1) Other miscellaneous acts and contracts.

The same general rules would appear to apply to the reformation for mistake of other miscellaneous acts and contracts in general.

Thus, one who becomes a purchaser of property in ignorance of liabilities he is incurring will not be held to a strict compliance unless some rule of law requires it. Hunting v. Walter, 33 Md. 60.

And where one person purchased of another the capital stock and assets of a corporation upon agreed terms, and the papers were hastily read over to the purchaser before signing, and he did not notice that the sum mentioned in the agreement was greatly in excess of what he had agreed to pay, and that certain deductions or allowances agreed upon had not been made, it is a proper case for relief in the administration of the principles of equity. Humphreys v. Hurtt, 5 Thomp. & C. 433.

And where a party unconditionally assumes a liability contingent as to its eventual amount, as in the case of the stock mortgages of a bank, he is bound thereby, although he erroneously believed that such liability would be nothing, or less than it proved to be; such error affects the accidental, and not the substantial, quality of the object, and cannot affect the contract, unless induced by the fraud or false representations of the other party. Prescott v. Cooper, 37 La. Ann. 553.

So, where the purchaser of property and other persons bind themselves jointly to reimburse the seller the amount of notes given to him for the purchase price, if not paid at maturity, each will be bound for his proportion of the loss only; and where the purchaser, supposing himself bound for the whole, makes a contract for the payment of the whole claim, in such belief, he is entitled to relief. Barthlet v. Andry, 14 La. 30.

And where two parties agreed orally for the performance of work for a specified sum, and that the architect should draw up a written contract for signature, which contract, through an error of the draftsman, named a larger sum, the contract will be reformed on a showing of the mistake, although the plaintiff had failed to examine it and discover the error before signing, his negligence in failing to do so in no wise affecting or altering the defendant's condition. Paisley v. Casey, 41 N. Y. S. R. 339, 18 N. Y. Supp. 102.

So, where the owner of a patent for clay shingles agreed to give a manufacturer a license for certain states, the licensee to pay royalties upon at least 3,000 squares of patented shingles each year, and the license was drawn up to read 30,000 squares per annum, instead of 3,000, the instrument itself evidences a clerical error known to be such by the licensor at the time of executing the contract, and a reformation thereof should be decreed. Trenton Terra Cotta Co. v. Clay Shingle Co. 80 Fed. 46.

But an assignment of all a patentee's interest in a patent will not be reformed on the ground of mistake, so as to assign merely his rights on one county, where the allegations of the bill are indefinite, and the proofs to support the same are not clear and satisfactory. Baldwin v. National Hedge & Wire-Fence Co. 67 Fed. 853.

So, one who has been induced to enter into a contract to perform public work by fraudulently underestimating the amount of work to be done, and concealing from him the plans and specifications in accordance with which he is to do the work, or by mutual mistake based on the erroneous estimate of the public engineer of the amount of work to be done, may, in the absence of laches or neglect on his part, maintain an action for the cancelation of the contract and recovery of whatever money may be incidentally necessary to afford full relief, if defendant can be put substantially into his original position. Long v. Athol, 196 Mass. 497, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 96, 82 N. E. 665.

And in such case the contractor is not precluded from securing a cancelation in case the estimate is not even approximately correct, by the fact that the contract stipulates that the estimate is approximate only, and that he is satisfied therewith, and has judged for himself as to all conditions affecting the cost of performance. Ibid.

And where two people contracted with reference to certain work to be done, and the agreement was that it was to be for a specific price per square yard, and one of the parties drew up the agreement in writing and read it to the other, placing the expression "running yard" in the agreement instead of "square yard," but read it "square yard," whether he made a mistake in inserting it and reading it, or deliberately read the same so as to induce the other to sign it, the contract will be reformed to conform to the intention of the parties. Basserman v. Staten Island Belt Line R. Co. 25 Jones & S. 521, 8 N. Y. Supp. 548.

Nor can a municipal corporation avoid cancelation of a contract for public work based on the estimate of its engineer, on the theory that it did not represent the estimate to be true, and did nothing to prevent full investigation by the contractors. Long v. Athol, supra.

And that work already done on a public contract shows that the original estimate is not correct, so that a new contract cannot be secured on as advantageous terms, will not prevent a cancelation of the contract for mutual mistake as to the amount of work required, on the theory that the public cannot be put in statu quo. Ibid.

And a municipal corporation which has induced a contractor to undertake public work by mutual mistake as to the amount to be done is placed in statu quo, so as to warrant cancelation of the contract, by being required to pay merely the full value of the labor and materials already furnished. Ibid.

So, a court of equity has jurisdiction to correct a contract for the sale of standing timber by adding thereto the description of certain lands which were covered by the oral negotiations for the sale of the timber, but which were, by mutual mistake of the parties, omitted from the written contract, though before the omission was discovered a payment had been made on the contract, and the purchaser had proceeded to lumber the lands not in dispute. Metropolitan Lumber Co. v. Lake Superior Ship Canal, R. & Iron Co. 101 Mich. 577, 60 N. W. 278.

And where all the preliminary negotiations for paving a street with asphalt on the foundation of a wooden block pavement, such foundation to be brought to subgrade with additional concrete, proceeded on the theory that the amount of concrete needed therefor was not ascertainable prior to letting the contract, that compensation therefor should be fixed separate and apart from that for laying the asphalt, and in a way to obviate payment for more than required, that the resolutions, proposals, and specifications were in harmony with such a course, and the bids were executed with the definite understanding of all parties that separate prices be paid for laying the asphalt and for raising the foundation with concrete, but, in the preparation of the contract subsequently executed, the intention of the parties as thus manifested was not expressed, the contract should be reformed in equity to give effect to what was intended, though one of the parties thereto was a city. Fullerton v. Des Moines (Iowa), 126 N. W. 159.

And where, on the sale of a quantity of timber, the vendor represented to the agent of the purchaser that he owned and controlled a large amount of timber land which had not theretofore been cut over, and from which he proposed to and did sell to the purchaser the timber, the writing should have stated that all of the timber in question was to be furnished from trees cut from the virgin forest, and will be reformed to that effect. Knuckles v. J. D. Hughes Lumber Co. (Ky.) 116 S. W. 1193.

So, where corn was sold by the bushel, a mistake in the contract of sale, in omitting an agreement that the corn should be measured in the crib at the rate of a specified number of inches to the bushel, as was the custom in that neighborhood, will be inserted in equity. Reid v. Cook, 88 Iowa. 717, 54 N. W. 353.

And where the parties to a contract for the sale and purchase of iron intended to contract for a certain number of tons gross 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

weight, at a specified price per ton, but, in reducing the contract to writing, the term "tons" only was used, without anything appearing on the face of the contract to show that any other than statute tons of 2,000 pounds avoirdupois were intended, in a suit at law upon the contract, the parties would be precluded from showing that tons gross weight were intended, but the party injured might file a bill in chancery to reform the written contract so as to make it conform to the actual understanding and intent of the parties thereto. Many v. Beekman Iron Co. 9 Paige, 188.

So, where an agreement to pay a sum of money in gold is reduced to writing, but by mistake the word "gold" is not written in the contract, the instrument may be reformed to correspond to the real contract. Gammage v. Moore, 42 Tex. 170.

And the chancellor will relieve against the legal effect of a covenant to pay current money of Kentucky, on proof that the covenant was executed under a mutual mistake, each party supposing that current money of Kentucky imported whatever medium should be in fact current at the time of payment. Bryan v. Masterson, 4 J. J. Marsh. 225.

And where a mortgage account has been settled on the footing of compound interest with half yearly rests, both parties wrongly understanding the mortgage deed to require the same, the settled account may be reopened in equity. Daniell v. Sinclair, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 181, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 144.

And if a release is given for a particular purpose, and it is understood by the parties that its operation is to be limited to that purpose, but it turns out that the terms of the release are more extensive than was intended, a court of equity will interfere and confine it to that which was in the contemplation of the parties at the time it was executed. Lyall v. Edwards, 6 Hurlst. & N. 337.

So, if a father gives a sum of money by way of advancement to his daughter, requesting that she give him some writing which will evidence the fact, and make her chargeable in the distribution of his estate, and they, through mutual mistake as to the legal effect of the language used, made a promissory note from her to him, she is in equity entitled, upon parol evidence of these facts, to have the writing reformed so as to express the real purpose of its execution. Hausbrandt v. Hoffer, 117 Iowa. 103, 94 Am. St. Rep. 289, 90 N. W. 494.

And while at law a recovery cannot be had of purchase money the receipt of which is recited in a deed, in equity this obstacle is removed, where the recital results from inadvertence, and was inserted under a mistake as to its legal effect, without any intention of the parties that it should bar a recovery of the purchase money. Shaw v. Williams, 100 N. C. 272, 6 S. E. 196.

And a person who was treasurer for two churches which were in negotiation for uniting, and who gave a receipt as treasurer of one of them, may show that he gave the receipt mistakenly, supposing that the union would be completed, and that the money for which the receipt was given belonged to the other church. Russell v. First Presby. Church, 65 Pa. 9.

And where a mortgagor and mortgagee entered into a contract by which the mortgagee took an assignment of a contract as collateral security for the mortgage debt, upon which he was to apply whatever amount he was able to collect on the contract, and the contract was reformed because of a mistake in drafting it, and the reformation reduced the amount due the assignor thereon, and the mortgagee, as part of the consideration of the assignment, surrendered to the assignor certain notes and mortgages held as collateral and additional security for the mortgage debt, he has the right to demand of the mortgagor an amount sufficient to meet the balance of his claim, if any, remaining after exhausting his securities aside from the contract, and applying the proceeds on the debt, not exceeding the amount of the mortgagor's indebtedness on the contract before its reformation. Burns v. Caskey, 100 Mich. 94, 58 N. W. 642.

So, where an administrator sold land of his intestate, supposing that it was the fee that he was selling, and the purchaser supposing it was the fee that he was buying, and nothing passed by the sale but an equity of redemption, it is a case of mixed and mutual mistake of law and fact, entitling the purchaser to relief in equity. Griffith v. Townley, 69 Mo. 13, 33 Am. Rep. 476.

And where in a proceeding in a probate court by an administrator to sell lands of his intestate to pay debts, a mistake occurred in the return of the appraisement, by which it appeared that one parcel of land to be sold had been appraised with an adjoining tract of surface, whereas in fact such parcel had been appraised with a tract of coal land, and the mistake was afterwards carried into the deeds by which the administrator conveyed to different purchasers, and the result of the mistakes was such that the parcel so appraised was conveyed to the purchaser of the adjoining tract of surface, who had neither bought nor paid for it, instead of the purchaser of the coal tract, who had done both, a court having general jurisdiction in equity is authorized to correct the mistake in both the proceedings in the probate court and in the deed, and parol evidence is admissible on the issue respecting the mistake. Gill v. Pelkey, 54 Ohio St. 348, 43 N. E. 991.

And if a widow renounced her right under her husband's will, with the idea that she was entitled to one half of the property in her own right, and it afterwards appeared she was in error as to the extent of her claim, the renunciation will not bind her. Tanner v. Robert, 5 Mart. N. S. 255.

So, a writing reciting an agreement between the parties thereto by which one agreed to sell the other property described, and the other agreed to sell and convey to the former certain other property, the latter agreeing to assign a certain mortgage, though imperfectly expressed, contains all the elements of a contract, within the meaning of a statute making parties capable of contracting, their consent, a lawful object, and a sufficient consideration essential to every contract, and hence it was susceptible of reformation on the ground of mistake. House v. McMullen, 9 Cal. App. 664, 100 Pac. 344.

And a bill in chancery to have reformed a written contract upon which a judgment at law has been rendered, so that, as reformed, it will not support such judgment, and asking for a perpetual injunction against the judgment, which bases the complainant's right to relief upon the fact that the contract upon which the judgment was rendered had the form as written in consequence of a mutual mistake of the parties, and the agreement really entered into was materially different from that evidenced by the writing, contains equity, such fact constituting a purely equitable defense which the complainant could not have availed himself of in a suit at law, making it against conscience to execute the judgment. Stevens v. Hertzler, 114 Ala. 563, 22 So. 121.

And where, under writs, a sheriff entered into possession of an opera company's personal chattels, and afterwards, on the winding-up petition, a provisional official liquidator was appointed, subject to the rights of the sheriff, and the play was then being performed, and the sheriff took the money at the door, out of which he paid the execution creditors and retained his own charges, and paid the balance to the liquidator, and afterwards, on being ordered to withdraw, he did so without having sold any of the goods seized, and was afterwards ordered to pay the liquidator the amount which he had paid the creditors, the court will compel the liquidator to repay the sheriff the amount so paid, since it will not allow the liquidator, as its officer, to profit by the sheriff's mistake. Re Opera [1891] 2 Ch. 154.

The omission of a necessary seal from an agreement which, by its terms, purports to be a sealed instrument, is a mistake apparent upon the face of the instrument, which a court of chancery will correct. Henkleman v. Peterson, 154 Ill. 419, 40 N. E. 359; Potter v. Frank (Me.) 76 Atl. 489; Bullock v. Whipp, 15 R. I. 195, 2 Atl. 309.

And where a grantor, by inadvertence or mistake, fails to place a seal upon his deed, equity will require him to perfect it so that it will comply with his intention at the time of giving it. Harding v. Jewell, 73 Me. 426; Gaylord v. Pelland, 169 Mass. 356, 47 N. E. 1019.

A paper purporting to be a deed, which is duly signed, witnessed, and acknowledged, but which has no seal affixed to it, furnishes sufficient evidence on its face that the signer intended to seal it and omitted to do so by mistake, and a court of chancery will rectify such an omission; and if the original paper is lost, its existence and contents may be shown by secondary evidence. Colchester v. Culver, 29 Vt. 111.

So, where a person signed but did not seal a paper purporting to be a mortgage of land as security for a note, and the mortgagee sold the land under a power contained in the mortgage for enough to pay the note, but the purchaser refused to pay the money, because the mortgage was not under seal, the mortgagee is entitled to maintain a bill in equity against the mortgagor and the purchaser to reform the mortgage; and where a bill for that purpose is taken as confessed, the mortgagor may be decreed to affix its seal to the mortgage, and the instrument directed to have, as against the parties to the suit, full force and effect as the mortgagor's deed from the time it was first delivered to the mortgagee. Springfield Five Cents Sav. Bank v. South Cong. Soc. 127 Mass. 516.

And where it was the intention of both the mortgagor and mortgagee to make a mortgage a good, valid, and legal mortgage, and they failed to do so by omitting to attach a scroll to the signature of the mortgagor, in consequence of a mutual mistake of the law upon the subject, the mortgagee is entitled to have the mortgage reformed so as to speak the intention of the parties, and when so reformed it may be foreclosed; and a proceeding for that purpose is not subject to objection that because the instrument was not under seal, it would be barred by the statute of limitations. Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63.

So, if, in the execution of an instrument intended as a bond, the seal be omitted by mistake, chancery will supply the defect. Montville v. Haughton, 7 Conn. 543.

And if the signers of a constable's bond at the time of signing neglected to affix their seals to the same, but intended to do so, a court of chancery will decree that the bonds be treated as if sealed. Rutland v. Paige, 24 Vt. 181.

And where township bonds were given and signed by authorized commissioners, but seals on them were omitted by oversight and mistake, and the town set up the want of seals in defense in an action at law afterward brought against it by one who had purchased such bonds for value, in good faith, and without observing the omission, to recover interest on the bonds, a court of equity, at his suit, will decree that the bonds be held as valid as if actually sealed before being issued, and will restrain the setting up of the want of seals in the action at law. Bernards Twp. v. Stebbins, 109 U. S. 347, 27 L. ed. 958, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252.

So, an injunction bond purporting by its terms to be a sealed instrument may be corrected as against sureties by adding seals to their signatures, omitted by mistake, and should be so corrected, where its recitals show that it was the intent of the parties that it should be sealed and made sufficient. Henkleman v. Peterson, supra.

And where a will made a joint and several appointment of executors, and they were jointly appointed by the probate court, and accepted the trust, and gave a joint and several bond, they thereby assumed a joint as well as a several liability, and where seals were omitted from the bond through mistake, they may be compelled by chancery to affix them. Probate Ct. v. May, 52 Vt. 182.

So, that a contract is not attested in such a manner as is necessary to pass the title to realty is no objection to its reformation, where it embraces both real and personal property. Thompson v. Marshall, 36 Ala. 504, 76 Am. Dec. 328.

And where the proceedings are regular leading up to a sheriff's deed, and the deed is defective for want of a seal, it may be corrected in equity. Gilbreath v. Dilday, 152 Ill. 207, 38 N. E. 572.

And where a father made a promissory note in favor of one of his daughters, but by mistake failed to seal it, and delivered it in escrow for his daughter, and afterwards made similar provisions for other daughters, and the daughter whose note was not sealed survived the father, and died intestate, and her husband, as administrator, demanded the amount of the note, payment of which was refused, a court of equity will supply the seal, and enforce the note against the administrators of the maker, the consideration of love, affection, and parental duty being sufficient to authorize such action. Conover v. Brown, 49 N. J. Eq. 156, 23 Atl. 507.

d. Mistake as to one's own legal rights, interests, or relations.

The rule that equity will not interfere to cancel a contract made through mistake of law applies to a mistake as to the general law, and not to a case where a party is mistaken as to the effect of existing circumstances in relation to his private rights. Toland v. Corey, 6 Utah, 392, 24 Pac. 190; Marshall v. Lane, 27 App. D. C. 276; Bonney v. Stoughton, 122 Ill. 536, 13 N. E. 833; Cook v. Sumner Spinning & Mfg. Co. 1 Sneed, 698; Waggoner v. Waggoner (Va.) — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 68 S. E. 990; Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 Week. Rep. 1053, 22 Eng. Rul. Cas. 870.

And a mistake by a party as to his antecedent existing legal rights, as distinct from a mistake as to the legal import of the act done, furnishes a ground for equitable relief from the consequences of the mistake in cases in which the mistake can be rectified without injury to the rights of others. Re McFarlin (Del.) 75 Atl. 281; Wyche v. Greene, 16 Ga. 57.

In such case the mistake is really one of fact. Marshall v. Lane, 27 App. D. C. 276.

And a representation concerning a man's private rights, though it may involve matters of law, is, as a whole, deemed to be a statement of fact, of which equity will take cognizance. Motherway v. Wail, 168 Mass. 333, 47 N. E. 135.

And when a person is ignorant or mistaken with respect to his own antecedent and existing rights, interests, or assets, and enters into some transaction the legal scope and operation of which he correctly apprehends and understands, for the purpose of affecting such assumed rights, interests, or assets, equity will grant relief, defensive or affirmative, treating the mistake as analogous to, if not identical with, a mistake of fact. Renard v. Clink, 91 Mich. 1, 30 Am. St. Rep. 458, 51 N. W. 692.

And where parties have presupposed facts or rights to exist as the basis of their contracts which did not exist, such contracts, made in mutual mistake, will be relieved against in equity, the principle being that where a party has been misled to his injury, and he has no opportunity of satisfying himself of the truth of matters, or has been prevented from taking the steps necessary to verify the assertion, he is entitled to relief. Watts v. Cummins, 59 Pa. 84.

So, the maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse for the breach or nonperformance of any agreement has no application to special or private acts of the legislature, which are designed to operate only upon particular persons, or to regulate private concerns. Cook v. Sumner Spinning & Mfg. Co. supra.

And where a release is so general in its terms as to release the rights of a party of which he was in ignorance, and which were not in contemplation of the parties to the bargain at the time it was made, the instrument will be restored in equity to serve the purposes of the bargain, and the release confined to the right intended to be released. Blair v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 89 Mo. 383, 1 S. W. 350.

So, where one delivers chattels to another as indemnity for suretyship, the law regards such delivery as a pledge merely; and that the property was transferred by an absolute bill of sale does not alter the case in a court of equity, even though the contract stipulates that the pledge shall be irredeemable; and where the party acts upon the misapprehension that he has no title to the property, a court of equity will relieve him from the legal effect of instruments which surrender such unsuspected title. Morgan v. Dod, 3 Colo. 551.

And where persons conveyed to another half of the real estate left by the latter's wife, because they supposed he was entitled to inherit it as her husband, and by law he was not so entitled, but the grantors were entitled to it, the grantors are entitled to relief against the mistake; but a lease executed by the grantee after the conveyance to him, the lessees being without notice of the grantors' rights, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) should be allowed to stand. Keauhulihia v. Puahiki, 4 Haw. 279.

And where a husband and wife entered into a marriage settlement by which property belonging to her was conveyed to a trustee for the joint use of herself and husband and such children as she might have, and at her death to go to her children, both of them believing that such deed was necessary to prevent the husband's marital rights from attaching, and both being ignorant of the law then existing, which secured to her all her property, equity has jurisdiction of a bill to set aside and cancel the marriage settlement, and a verdict and judgment canceling and setting it aside is binding on the parties and their privies until set aside in some of the modes provided by law. Gefken v. Graef, 77 Ga. 340.

So, to hold an indorser who has been discharged liable on a promise to pay the debt, it must appear that when he made the promise, he was under no mistake or misapprehension as to either the law or the facts, and that he knew he was fully discharged by reason of the facts and the law applicable to them. Williams v. Union Bank, 9 Heisk. 443.

Where a deed purports to convey all the interest and title of the grantor, it will be given effect accordingly, however, although he actually held a greater interest than either he or the grantee, at the time of the conveyance, supposed he owned. A party must know enough about his title not, by his want of knowledge of it, to mislead a purchaser, to his detriment. Thomas v. Chicago, 55 Ill. 403.

And where a woman having with her brother a joint estate in a tract of land, under her father's will, but believing that she had only a life interest in a moiety, with remainder to her brother, conveyed to him in fee her interest in one half of the tract after division, and took from him a conveyance of his interest in the other half, for the term of her natural life, there is no ground for reforming these deeds, and after her death one half of the part taken by her in the division remains the absolute property of the brother, and the other half passes under her will to her devisee. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 20 S. C. 317.

e. Mistake as to legal rights, as affecting compromises and settlements.

Where parties deal with each other with the knowledge and in view of the fact that something is uncertain as to the amount or condition of the subject-matter of their dealing, and the contract relating thereto is in the form intended, there is no ground for correcting a mistake in a court of equity, if it should finally turn out that one has intervened. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827; Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 309, 29 Am. Dec. 407; Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 556;

Kowalke v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 103 Wis. 472, 74 Am. St. Rep. 877, 79 N. W. 762; Pickering v. Pickering, 2 Beav. 31.

In such case, a court of equity will endeavor to support the conclusions or agreements to which the parties may fairly come at the time, and that, notwithstanding the subsequent discovery of common error. Pickering v. Pickering, supra.

Nor can a contract or payment made for the purpose of avoiding litigation be rescinded for error of law. Urquhart v. Gove, 4 Rob. (La.) 207.

Compromise of doubtful rights or voluntary settlements between parties, when characterized by good faith and a full disclosure of all the facts, are favored by the courts, and such settlements will not be disturbed for any ordinary mistake, either of law or fact, in the absence of conduct otherwise inequitable, since their very object is to settle all such possible errors without judicial controversy. Wells v. Neff, 14 Or. 66, 12 Pac. 84, 88; Underwood v. Brockman, supra; Perkins v. Gay, 3 Serg. & R. 327, 8 Am. Dec. 653.

And though equity generally relieves against a plain mistake, it does not interfere for misconception alone, to overturn an agreement made to prevent a domestic feud; these agreements partake largely in their nature of the compromise of a doubtful right, which is a sufficient consideration. Lies v. Stub, 6 Watts, 48.

And where parties have made settlements of controversies, whereby the rights of third parties are acknowledged and considerable sums paid over to them, they cannot be allowed to come into equity and overturn them afterwards without the fullest proof of ignorance of facts, fraud, or imposition. Brown v. Rowles, 21 Md. 11.

And a court of equity will endeavor to support arrangements by which family differences have been compromised, especially where these differences relate to questions of legitimacy, even though arising upon grounds which might not be considered satisfactory if the transaction had occurred between strangers. Westby v. Westby, 2 Drury & War. 502.

A compromise of a doubtful claim will not be set aside in equity except for fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment of facts, or for such imposition as amounts to unfair and unconscientious dealing. Mills v. Lee, 6 T. B. Mon. 91, 17 Am. Dec. 118.

And concealment of facts which a party is not bound to disclose is not ground for avoiding a compromise, and one party to a controversy concerning land is not bound to disclose to his adversary defects in his own title. Ibid.

And where a person enters into a contract for the purpose of avoiding litigation, based on full confidence in a statement made to him that "illegitimate children could claim the succession of their mother as forced heirs," he acts under error of law, for which the contract cannot be rescinded. Lyles v. Martin, 5 La. 113.

So, an agreement of compromise, fairly entered into, will not be set aside merely upon the ground that the party seeking relief was mistaken in the law. Lewis v. Cooper, Cooke (Tenn.) 467; Underwood v. Brockman, supra; Converse v. Blumrich, 14 Mich. 109, 90 Am. Dec. 230.

And a person purchasing a title to real estate, believed by himself and by his grantor to be doubtful, cannot recover back the consideration therefor by showing that such title was in fact void; his recovery would be limited to a case where the parties, believing the title purchased to be good, were laboring under a mistake of fact. Granger v. Olcott, 1 Lans. 169.

Nor will a court of equity inquire into the adequacy or inadequacy of the consideration of a compromise fairly and deliberately made. Naylor v. Winch, 1 Sim. & Stu. 555.

And where there is no actual fraud in a settlement of an estate among members of a family, and no confidential relation between the parties, or ignorance of the facts upon the part of any of them, inadequacy of consideration will not avoid the contract. Hughes's Estate, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 168.

And an agreement in settlement of a family dispute, containing in itself an amicable adjustment of conflicting claims and interests, and founded in mutual promises imposing a like duty upon each of the parties that each shall collate and account for all that he had received, constitutes a mutual promise, which is a good consideration to uphold the agreement, and it will not be set aside because of ignorance of law, and a consequent mistake as to title. Farnsworth v. Dinsmore, 2 Swan, 38.

So, where several creditors have agreed with their debtor to compromise their claims against him at a stipulated rate, each agreeing to compromise upon consideration of the like agreement of the others, no one of them can avoid or rescind such agreement on his part, upon the ground that it was made through mistake, forgetfulness, or ignorance as to the amount or situation of his claim, or the manner in which it was secured. Johnson v. Parker, 34 Wis. 596.

And it is not necessary in such case that the creditors should have convened, or that a formal promise should have been made by each to all the others to abide by the settlement; it is sufficient that they have communicated with each other through the debtor by accepting his proposition in writing, made in the same form to each, from which it appears that the consideration for the promise of each was the like promise made by the others. Ibid.

And where persons interested have a knowledge of all the facts, and take advice, whether they got proper advice or not, and the money is divided and the business settled, the settlement will not be reopened on the ground that some of the parties have by mistake received a share or more than a share, and that the complainant acquiesced in the receipt of it by mistake. Rogers v. Ingham, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 351.

So, where one, with full knowledge of all the facts constituting his title to land, purchases it of another, or compromises a controversy in reference to it, and acts on the presumption that he has no title, the mistake, if one is made, is of law, and not of fact, and not correctable in equity. Hadley v. Ware, 15 Ala. 149; Neale v. Neale, 1 Keen, 672; Stewart v. Stewart, 6 Clark & F. 911.

And where a question upon the construction of a will, whether the personal estate was wholly or partially disposed of, was not decided, an agreement upon the subject will be upheld, though the instrument that was prepared was not executed, it being established as clear, fair, and reasonable, not within the statute of frauds, concluded with full knowledge of the circumstances, and not waived. Gibbons v. Caunt, 4 Ves. Jr. 840.

And where parties to a pending action have, for the purpose of compromising the same, entered into an agreement under seal, embracing mutual releases and a stipulation, which was carried into effect, for the entry of a judgment for a merely nominal sum, they being then ignorant of a material matter, the court has not the power, after the discovery of such matter, to reform the agreement on motion, relieving one of the parties in part from the release which he had made, but leaving the other party bound by the corresponding release on his part. Gerdtzen v. Cockrell, 50 Minn. 546, 52 N. W. 930.

Nor can a person who compromised a litigation on the authority of a judicial decision recede from his agreement on the ground that he misapprehended the decision, and that there was really no question to be the subject of the compromise. Ex parte Lucy, 4 De G. M. & G. 356.

And where parties submit matters in issue between them to arbitration, and an award is rendered and made the judgment of the court, without objection on the part of the losing party, a bill will not lie at his instance to set aside the judgment, upon the ground that he could have prevented the award from becoming the judgment of the court by filing exceptions, but was ignorant of his right to do so. Thurmond v. Clark, 47 Ga. 500.

So, nullity of the title, in the execution of which a compromise was made, can only be invoked as a cause of rescission when the title was falsely supposed to be valid through error of fact, not through error of law. Dugas v. Donaldsonville, 33 La. Ann. 668.

And where two judgment creditors entered into an agreement for the division between them of a fund arising out of a surety's sale of property of a common debtor, it not being sufficient to satisfy both, the fact that one acted on the belief that the other had a valid mechanics' lien on the property, which proved not to be the case, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

is not such a mistake of law as will cause the agreement to be set aside. DeGive v. Healey, 60 Ga. 391.

Nor can payment of the amount due on an instrument by one who indorsed it, which is made and accepted in the mistaken belief of both parties that such indorser was legally liable, where the matter was equally open to the inquiry and judgment of both parties, be recovered back, whether the mistake is to be considered one of fact or of law. Alton v. First Nat. Bank, 157 Mass. 341, 18 L.R.A. 144, 34 Am. St. Rep. 285, 32 N. E. 228.

And a verbal agreement between the attorneys for the respective parties in a pending suit, that judgment may pass for one of the parties, with a certain amount of costs, supposed by them to be equivalent to certain claims relinquished by the opposite party, with relief from the litigation, is in effect a compromise of a litigated suit, and is final and conclusive between the parties, no fraud being shown, even though entered into under a mistake of law. Montgomery v. Ellis, 6 How. Pr. 326.

Equity, in a proper case, however, will relieve against an agreement of compromise, made under a mistake of law by the party seeking relief. Jones v. Munroe, 32 Ga. 181.

And while compromises made under mistake of law are upheld in equity, if the parties are not on equal terms, and one misleads the other, and obtains property thereby against right and equity, as well as against law, he will be compelled to restore it. Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 556.

So, a compromise must be set aside for an obvious mistake of plain law when there was no other motive for it, and therefore nothing reasonably or intrinsically doubtful to be compromised, and the rule is the same whether the compromise is evidence of fraud, surprise, or imbecility. Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 309, 29 Am. Dec. 407.

And the rule that courts do not undertake to relieve parties from their acts and deeds fairly done on a full knowledge of the facts, though done under a mistake of law, is relaxed in all cases of compromises of doubtful, and perhaps in all cases of doubted, rights, and especially in all cases of family arrangement, where there is a total ignorance of title, founded on the mistake of a plain and settled principle of law, and in cases of imposition, misrepresentation, undue influence, misplaced confidence, or surprise. Dupre v. Thompson, 4 Barb. 279.

And that a party whose mind was impaired by disease was assailed from time to time with a charge that he had assumed an illegal authority, and made to believe that he had incurred a heavy responsibility, and was thus induced to compromise a fraudulent claim, is sufficient ground for granting him relief against the compromise and claim. Underwood v. Brockman, supra.

So, where a contract was made for the purchase of land of administrators of an estate, and a compromise was made under a mutual mistake that a forthcoming bond had been executed and forfeited by a party to the contract, with the force and effect of a judgment against the land, the money paid, with interest, should be refunded, and the note given therefor should be surrendered. Nabours v. Cocke, 24 Miss. 44.

And if a compromise of a doubtful right be obtained from a person through the misrepresentation of another, and in consequence of the influence of the testimony of the latter, and the persuasion of arbitrators to whom the matter had been referred, it is not binding if the party benefited by the compromise knew of such misrepresentation, and availed himself unduly of its influence. Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts, 163, 26 Am. Dec. 52.

And the effect of a deed made for the purpose of carrying into effect a family arrangement may be varied, where it contained a declaration of right inconsistent with the actual rights of the parties, and there was no evidence that the inconsistency was known to or contemplated by the parties or their solicitors, or that their actual rights were intended to be altered. Ashhurst v. Mill, 7 Hare, 502.

Nor can a transaction be considered as a family arrangement where the doubts existing as to the rights alleged to be compromised are not presented to the mind of the party interested. Harvey v. Cooke, 4 Russ. Ch. 34.

Parol evidence is admissible to make out a case for the reformation of a settlement, but the jurisdiction in such cases is to be cautiously exercised. Barrow v. Barrow, 18 Beav. 529.

f. Mutuality, as affecting ignorance or mistake of law.

1. General rules.

If both parties to a contract make an honest mistake of law as to its effect, or are ignorant of a matter of law and enter into the contract for a particular object, the result of which would by law be different from what they mutually intended, the court will interfere to prevent the enforcement of the contract, and relieve the parties from the unexpected consequences of it. State v. Paup, 13 Ark. 129, 56 Am. Dec. 303; Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 230; Loudermilk v. Loudermilk, 98 Ga. 780, 25 S. E. 927; Taylor v. Holmes, 14 Fed. 498, affirmed in 127 U. S. 489, 32 L. ed. 179, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1192; Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, 2 Jac. & W. 205.

This is the rule of DOLVIN v. AMERICAN HARROW CO.

And a mistake of law on the part of both contracting parties, owing to which the object of their contract cannot be attained, is sufficient ground for setting aside such contract. Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend. 407, 31 Am. Dec. 382.

And an agreement may be decreed to be delivered up upon the ground of surprise, neither party understanding the effect of it. Willan v. Willan, 16 Ves. Jr. 72.

A mutual mistake of the parties to a contract is sufficient to justify the reformation thereof. Wood v. Michaud, 63 Minn. 478, 65 N. W. 963; Linton v. Unexcelled Fire-works Co. 128 N. Y. 672, 28 N. E. 580, reversing 37 N. Y. S. R. 173, 13 N. Y. Supp. 495; Wheadon v. Olds, 20 Wend. 174; Jones v. Warren, 134 N. C. 390, 46 S. E. 740; MacVeagh v. Burns, 2 S. D. 83, 48 N. W. 835.

And equity has jurisdiction to reform written instruments where there has been an actual agreement but the contract, executed through mutual mistake, does not express the real intention of the parties. Hand v. Cox (Ala.) 51 So. 519; Mulgrew-Boyce Co. v. Freeborn County (Minn.) 127 N. W. 396.

So, though one party's mistake will not entitle him to correct a written instrument, when there is a mutual mistake, or mistake on one side and either fraud, undue influence, or like cause on the other, giving rise to the first party's mistake, the court will grant relief. Jones v. Warren, supra.

And in cases of mutual mistake going to the essence of a contract, it is not necessary that there should be any element of fraud to warrant the interposition of a court of equity. Relief will be granted on the ground of mutual mistake as to the existence of the thing which constituted the basis of the contract. King v. Doolittle, 1 Head, 77.

The general principle that where parties have contracted in ignorance of mistake of a fact essential in the inducement to the formation of a contract, which mistake injuriously affects the rights and interests of one of the parties under it, a court of equity will grant relief against the consequences of the mistake, applies not only to cases where there has been a studied suppression or concealment of material facts by one of the parties which would amount to a fraud, but also to many cases of innocent ignorance and mistake on both sides. O'Connell v. Duke, 29 Tex. 299, 94 Am. Dec. 282; Farenholt v. Perry, 29 Tex. 316; Taylor v. Fleet, 4 Barb. 95.

Mutual mistake for which a contract may be reformed in equity is a mistake common to all the parties to a written contract or instrument, and usually a mistake concerning the contents or the legal effect of the contract or instrument. Page v. Higgins, 150 Mass. 27, 5 L.R.A. 152, 22 N. E. 63.

It is a mistake reciprocal and common to both parties where each alike labors under the same misconception in respect to the terms of the written instrument. Botsford v. McLean, 45 Barb. 478.

It is a mistake which involves both parties, so that the contract, as written, fails to carry out the intention or understanding of either. Jenkins v. Lefaiver, 29 N. Y. S. R. 886, 9 N. Y. Supp. 19.

And relief from a mistake of law with reference to a contract will be given in equity where it was a mutual mistake of both parties to the contract, and was to be attributed to the agent of the party now endeavoring to take advantage of it. Green v. Morris & E. R. Co. 12 N. J. Eq. 165.

And the mutual mistake for which a deed may be reformed relates to the time of making the agreement for the conveyance, and not to the execution and delivery of the deed, which merely carried the agreement into effect. Cleghorn v. Zumwalt, 83 Cal. 155, 23 Pac. 294.

To be correctable in equity, however, a mistake of law in an instrument not induced by fraud or circumvention must have been mutual. Harvey v. United States, 13 Ct. Cl. 322; New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 30 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 63, reversing 78 Fed. 33; Durham v. Fire & M. Ins. Co. 10 Sawy. 526, 22 Fed. 468; Parker v. Carter, 91 Ark. 162, 120 S. E. 865; Schoonover v. Dougherty, 65 Ind. 463; Baldwin v. Kerlin, 46 Ind. 426; Wachendorf v. Lancaster, 61 Iowa, 509, 14 N. W. 316, 16 N. W. 533; Williams v. Hamilton, 104 Iowa, 423, 65 Am. W. 1022; Henderson v. Beasley, 137 Mo. 199, 38 S. W. 950; Ramsey v. Smith, 32 N. J. Eq. 28; Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099; Lesser v. Demarest (N. J. Eq.) 72 Atl. 14; Lanier v. Wyman, 5 Robt. 147; Devereux v. Sun Fire Office, 51 Hun, 147, 4 N. Y. Supp. 655; Allison Bros. Co. v. Allison, 144 N. Y. 21, 38 N. E. 956; *Berringer v. And to justify a court of equity in reforming a written instrument for an alleged mistake, it must be distinctly alleged and conclusively proved that the mistake was mutual, or that it was the mistake of one party superinduced by the fraud or some inequitable conduct of the other. Thornton 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v. Krimbel; Williams v. Hamilton; and Chute v. Quincy,—supra; Martini v. Christensen, 60 Minn. 491, 62 N. W. 1127; Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525; Story v. Conger, 36 N. Y. 673, 93 Am. Dec. 546; Bryce v. Lorillard F. Ins. Co. 55 N. Y. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 249; Paine v. Jones, 75 N. Y. 593; Moran v. McLarty, 11 Hun, 68, affirmed in 75 N. Y. 25; Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652; Avery v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 117 N. Y. 451, 23 N. E. 3; O'Donnell v. Harmon, 3 Daly, 424; McMinn v. Patton, 92 N. C. 371; Kennerty v. Etiwan Phosphate Co. 21 S. C. 226, 53 Am. Rep. 669.

And the plaintiff must show that the alleged mistake was that of both, or all, if more than two, of the parties to the contract. Evarts v. Steger, supra; Hertzler v. Stevens, 119 Ala. 333, 24 So. 521; Parker v. Carter, supra; Varner v. Turner, 83 Ark. 131, 102 S. W. 1111; McGuigan v. Gaines, 71 Ark. 614, 77 S. W. 52; Bell v. Americus, P. & L. R. Co. 76 Ga. 754; Schoonover v. Dougherty, supra; Page v. Higgins, 150 Mass. 27, 5 L.R.A. 152, 22 N. E. 63; Burns v. Caskey, 100 Mich. 94, 58 N. W. 642; Tesson v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 40 Mo. 33, 93 Am. Dec. 293; Nevius v. Dunlap; Paine v. Jones; and Devereux v. Sun Fire Office,—supra; Miaghan v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 12 Hun, 321; Berringer v. Schaefer, supra; Moran v. McLarty, 11 Hun, 68; Bryce v. Lorillard F. Ins. Co. supra; Diman v. Providence, W. & B. R. Co. 5 R. I. 130; Deseret Nat. Bank v. Dinwoodey, 17 Utah, 43, 53 Pac. 215; Fishack v. Ball, 34 W. Va. 644, 12 S. E. 856; Bradford v. Romney, 30 Beav. 431.

So that by correcting the writing, as requested, the court will make it express the contract designed to be entered into by both. Diman v. Providence, W. & B. R. Co. supra.

To constitute a mutual mistake which will authorize reformation of an instrument, the minds of the parties must have met in a common intent. Potter v. Frank (Me.) 76 Atl. 489; Douglas v. Grant and Lanier v. Wyman, supra.

And both must have done what neither of them intended, Sutherland v. Sutherland, 69 Ill. 481; Douglas v. Grant; Varner v. Turner; McGuigan v. Gaines; and Houser v. Austin,—supra; Dulany v. Rogers, 50 Md. 524; Devereux v. Sun Fire Office and Miaghan v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. supra.

The intention of the parties, to express and carry out which a written agreement between them will be reformed, must be the intention of both parties as to something upon which their minds actually met. Santa Clara Female Academy v. Delaware Ins. Co. 93 Wis. 57, 66 N. W. 1140; Henderson v. Stokes, 42 N. J. Eq. 586, 8 Atl. 718.

Where the minds of the parties to a contract never met, one understanding one thing and another another, the court will not reform, but will rescind, the contract. Rowley v. Flannelly, 30 N. J. Eq. 612.

An instrument will not be reformed in equity where it expresses exactly what was intended by one party, but contains important insertions that the other party, the one who executed it, did not know were in it, of which want of knowledge the first party had no information or suspicion or any agency in producing. Kennerty v. Etiwan Phosphate Co. supra; Eames Vacuum Brake Co. v. Prosser, 88 Hun, 343, 34 N. Y. Supp. 398.

And the fact that a different agreement was intended by both parties must be established by evidence uncontrovertible, clear, and convincing. Allison Bros. Co. v. Allison and Hertzler v. Stevens, supra; Denny v. Barber, 72 Ark. 546, 81 S. W. 1055; Ezell v. Humphrey, 90 Ark. 24, 117 S. W. 758; Tesson v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. supra; Henderson v. Beasley, 137 Mo. 199, 38 S. W. 950; Slobodisky v. Phenix Ins. Co. 52 Neb. 395, 72 N. W. 483; Henderson v. Stokes, 42 N. J. Eq. 586, 8 Atl. 718; Lesser v. Demarest (N. J. Eq.) 72 Atl. 14; Bradford v. Romney, supra.

A contract cannot be reformed without conclusive evidence of an intention on the part of both parties at the time of its execution to enter into some other contract. Fowler v. Fowler, 4 De G. & J. 250.

The mistake should be made to appear beyond reasonable controversy. Parker v. Carter, 91 Ark. 162, 120 S. W. 836; McKnight v. Witherington (Ark.) 127 S. W. 727; Turner v. Todd, 85 Ark. 62, 107 S. W. 181.

And it must be established to the satisfaction of the court. Kent v. Manchester, 29 Barb. 595.

So, a mistake of one party is not ground for reforming a contract. Harvey v. United States, 13 Ct. Cl. 322; Ruffner v. McConnel, 17 Ill. 212, 63 Am. Dec. 362; Sutherland v. Sutherland, supra; Douglas v. Grant, 12 Ill. App. 273; Baldwin v. Kerlin, 46 Ind. 426; Stockhoff v. Brannin, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 717; Dulany v. Rogers, supra; Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816, 33 N. W. 38; Bancharel v. Patterson, 64 Minn. 454, 07 N. W. 356; Benn v. Pritchett, 163 Mo. 560, 63 S. W. 1103; Steinberg v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 49 Mo. App. 255; Ranney v. McMullen, 5 Abb. N. C. 246; Moran v. McLarty, 11 Hun, 68; White v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 110 N. C. 456, 15 S. E. 197; Jones v. Warren, 134 N. C. 390, 46 S. E. 740; Archer v. California Lumber Co. 24 Or. 341, 33 Pac. 526; MacVeagh v. Burns, 2 S. D. 83, 48 Pac. 835; Fallon v. Robins, 16 Ir. Ch. Rep. 422; Mortimer v. Shortall, 2 Drury & War. 363; Stewart v. Kennedy, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 108.

Unless the other party induced him to act under such mistake. Benn v. Pritchett, 163 Mo. 560, 63 S. W. 1103.

And where two parties entered into a contract, and error is claimed by one party to exist on an important point, which is claimed to be correct by the other party, it cannot be amended as against the party correctly understanding it; he acting in good faith and supposing that the other understood the contract as he did. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525.

Courts will not make contracts for parties under the guise of reforming a unilateral undertaking. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cox, 133 Ga. 763, 66 S. E. 1088; Stewart v. Dunn, 77 App. Div. 631, 79 N. Y. Supp. 123; Borden v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 113 N. C. 570, 37 Am. St. Rep. 632, 18 S. E. 392.

And a party to a contract cannot avoid it on the ground that he made a mistake, where there had been no misrepresentation, and there is no ambiguity in the terms of the contract, and the other contractor has no notice of such mistake and acts in perfect good faith. Borden v. Richmond & D. R. Co. supra.

A court of equity may not reform a written agreement on the ground of mistake, so as to impose on one of the parties obligations which he did not intend to assume. New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 30 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 63, reversing 78 Fed. 33.

Though a mistake on one side only may be ground for rescinding an agreement. Sutherland v. Sutherland, 69 Ill. 481; Douglas v. Grant, supra; Dulany v. Rogers, 50 Md. 524; Bancharel v. Patterson, supra.

But equity cannot give affirmative relief by way of reformation for a mistake of one of the parties to a contract, not induced by fraud or mistake of the other. Bigelow v. Wilson, 99 Iowa, 456, 68 N. W. 798; Greene v. Smith, 160 N. Y. 533, 55 N. E. 210; White v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 110 N. C. 456, 15 S. E. 197.

To justify the reformation or cancellation of a document because one of the parties was mistaken as to its legal effect, it must appear that some relation of trust or confidence existed between the parties, or that there was fraud or misrepresentation, or that the means of knowledge as to the terms and conditions of the contract were not equally open and accessible to both parties. Archer v. California Lumber Co. 24 Or. 341, 33 Pac. 526.

And the mistake of the scrivener who drew a deed will not constitute a mutual mistake as a ground for the reformation of the deed, unless he acted for both parties. Benn v. Pritchett, supra.

And where a party accepts a mortgage believing that all the land agreed to be conveyed by the mortgage is included in the description, the mortgagor is estopped to assert that he intentionally brought about or silently acquiesced in the discrepancy between the instrument and the agreement, so that the mistake was not mutual. Keister v. Myers, 115 Ind. 312, 17 N. E. 161.

So, where it appears that the contract, as executed, is just the contract one of the parties intended to make and the one he understood the other intended to make, the court has no power to reform it. Paine v. Jones, 75 N. Y. 593.

And a party seeking to reform or rescind a contract for mistake has the burden of proving by clear and satisfactory evidence that the other party knew of his mistake, and, in the absence of such proof, there can be no reformation or rescission. Grant Marble Co. v. Abbot, 142 Wis. 279, 124 N. W. 264.

Nor will equity reform a written contract by inserting a condition therein, except upon proof that the parties intended at the time of executing the contract to insert it, and that it was omitted by fraud, accident, or mistake. Bell v. Americus, P. & L. R. Co. 76 Ga. 754.

And it must be shown what the agreement of the parties was and wherein the writing fails to embody it. Durham v. Fire & M. Ins. Co. 10 Sawy. 526, 22 Fed. 468.

And a written instrument will not be reformed in equity unless it be shown that the parties to it had agreed on a certain contract, and the writing, by mistake in drawing, does not express such contract. Wilson v. Watkins, 48 S. C. 341, 26 S. E. 663.

To justify the reformation of an instrument there must be a mutual mistake, or its equivalent, in law, accompanied with an enforceable contract of the tenor sought to be established. Moehlenpah v. Mayhew, 138 Wis. 561, 119 N. W. 826.

And where a contract is contained in several papers, and one party is not even aware of the existence of a clause in which an alleged omission occurs, and the other party is aware of the existence of the clause and of an unfilled blank therein, and leaves it in that condition, apparently by design, it cannot be considered that either party or that both parties intended that the omitted word should be supplied before the execution of the contract, but through mistake neglected to have it done. Clark v. Higgins, 132 Mass. 586.

The rule that, to reform an agreement between parties, it is essential that mutual mistake or fraud on the part of one of the parties be shown, however, is not necessarily applicable to a case where the mistake occurs merely in the reduction of the agreement to writing. Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652; Rider v. Powell, 28 N. Y. 310.

And it is only where an action is to reform the agreement itself that it is necessary to allege in the pleading and proof on the trial that the mistake was mutual. Born v. Schrenkeisen, 110 N. Y. 55, 17 N. E. 339.

Nor does the rule that a court of equity will not interfere to rectify an instrument unless it is proved that the mistake was common to both parties, apply to the case of a contract which has been executed between parties in the relation of vendor and purchaser, whom it is in the power of the court to replace in their original position. Harris v. Pepperell, L. R. 5 Eq. 1; Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816, 33 N. W. 38.

In Harris v. Pepperell, supra, Bradford v. Romney, 30 Beav. 431, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case there had been a settlement on marriage, and the marriage had taken place and children had been born, and that it was impossible to undo the marriage and remit the parties to the same position they were in before.

2. Application in particular cases.

Where a contract is entered into in good faith, by which it is mutually understood and intended, for an adequate consideration, that one party shall part with and the other acquire a valid title to property, and it turns out that at the time of the contract, by the operation of some settled principle of law of which they were alike ignorant, the supposed title is wholly valueless, or does not in legal contemplation exist, the mistake is not a mere mistake of law, it involves in some measure a mistake of fact as well as of law, and a court of equity will replace the parties in statu quo. King v. Doolittle, 1 Head, 77.

But where a party, previous to executing a written agreement, has full opportunity to examine it so as to know its contents, yet voluntarily signs without making such examination, he cannot claim a reformation of the agreement simply upon evidence that it contains obligations of which he was not cognizant and to which he did not intend to agree; there must be clear evidence of a mutual mistake or of fraud to authorize a reformation. Moran v. McLarty, 75 N. Y. 25.

So, a mistake in a conveyance as to the subject-matter conveyed, superinduced by ignorance of the true description of the land which the grantor intended to sell, and the grantee intended to buy, when participated in by both parties, is a mutual mistake of fact, which equity will correct. American Asso. v. Williams, 93 C. C. A. 1, 166 Fed. 17.

And allegations of a bill in equity to reform a written contract on the ground of mistake, that the terms of the contract were agreed upon, that they were to be put in writing by the plaintiff, and that both plaintiff and defendant executed the writing under the mistaken impression that it did conform to the prior verbal agreement, show a mutual mistake, and are not subject to the objection that the bill states merely a case of unilateral mistake in making a proposition. Providence Steam Engine Co. v. Hathaway Mfg. Co. 79 Fed. 512.

And where a person purchases another's interest in a partnership business, agreeing to pay the debts of the firm, and pays them on the basis of an inventory, made by himself, of the firm's assets and liabilities, in which there was a mistake, by reason of which he paid $500 too much, the mistake, though not mutual, was a good consideration for a promise upon the part of the other party to the contract to repay the excess, and the written agreement was no impediment to showing such moral consideration by parol evidence. De Voin v. De Voin, 76 Wis. 66, 44 N. W. 830.

So, where a mistake in a deed was a mixed mistake of law and fact, brought about by the ignorance of the person who drew the deed, who in doing so was acting for both parties, the mistake is mutual, and a court of equity will correct the deed to conform to the intentions of the parties. Williamson v. Brown, 195 Mo. 313, 93 S. W. 791; Warrick v. Smith, 137 Ill. 504, 27 N. E. 709.

And where a person purchased land from the agent of two executors of an estate which owned the land, whose power of attorney recited that they had a right to sell the land, when in fact there were three executors and this land was not mentioned in the will, if the title thus acquired was not a good legal title it was a mistake of law on the part of the purchaser and on the part of the parties from whom he purchased, no actual fraud appearing upon the part of either, and the title will be held to be good. Ware v. Barlow, 81 Ga. 1, 6 S. E. 465.

So, a person paying part of the purchase money of land is not precluded from recovering it, where there was a misunderstanding between the parties as to the kind of title to be conveyed, and the money was paid under a mistaken belief by one party that the other understood the contract as he did. Porter v. Citizens' Bank, 73 Mo. App. 513.

And where a right of way through a lane became extinguished by the purchase of the servient estate by the owner of the dominant one, and the purchaser afterwards sold the dominant estate, conveying it by warranty deed with its privileges and appurtenances, but did not in express terms grant the right of way, and both parties were ignorant of the legal principle under which the right of way had become extinguished, and both supposed that it still existed, and the consideration paid by the grantee covered a right of way and would not have been paid for the land alone, a court of equity will correct the mistake in the deed so that it will cover the right of way. Blakeman v. Blakeman, 39 Conn. 320.

So, a mistake by one party to a deed at the date of the conveyance, which is known or suspected by the other party, without reference to prior mutual mistake in the agreement, is ground for a reformation of the deed if no rights of third parties are involved. Cleghorn v. Zumwalt, 83 Cal. 155, 23 Pac. 294.

And where the evidence shows clearly that none of the parties to a deed understood that a railroad right of way was included in it, but it was so included by mistake of law or fact of all the parties, the deed will be reformed to express the real contract. Pierce v. Houghton, 122 Iowa, 477, 98 N. W. 306.

And where a deed contained covenants of seisin of the premises, and that they were free from encumbrances, and that the grantor had lawful authority to sell, and warranting to defend against any lawful claims of any persons whomsoever claiming through or under them, the concluding words "claiming through or under us," being written while the others were printed, might be reformed so as to make the written qualification apply to all the preceding covenants, the circumstances of the case and the situation of the parties indicating that such was the intention. Crum v. Loud, 23 Iowa, 219.

So, where a deed was made of a lot with a dwelling house, under the supposition on the part of both parties that it secured the purchaser the right to the use of a sewer, and the deed did not convey such right, the purchaser's acceptance of the deed was made under a mistake as to its effect, and did not conclude him. Butterfield v. McNamara, 54 Conn. 94, 6 Atl. 188.

And where, under a mistake of law, a conveyance by a guardian was made to include an interest of his wards of which he and the grantee were alike ignorant, equity will relieve the wards of the consequences of his mistake. Baker v. Massey, 50 Iowa, 399.

And where a guardian invested funds of her two wards in land, taking the deed in her own name, and on settlement the wards took a deed for equal portions of the land from the guardian and gave her a release, and more was due to one ward than to the other, the guardian is not interested, and a mutual mistake on her part need not be shown in order to have the deed corrected so as to give each ward her proper proportion of the land. Scott v. Queen, 94 N. C. 462.

And where, at the time a deed was made, both parties supposed that the interest of the grantor in the land was a contingent remainder in one fourth, and both parties understood that a grandmother had made her election to take a child's part, whereas the fact that her declaration to that effect had not been filed in her lifetime was not known to them, and for that reason the grantor's interest was an undivided half, the minds of the parties never met on the sale of a half interest, and hence equity will set aside a deed thus made in pursuance of a mutual mistake. Castleman v. Castleman, 184 Mo. 432, 83 S. W. 758.

So, where a parcel of land offered for sale was fenced, and both parties were upon the ground and saw the inclosed land, which was described to the purchaser as two lots, it having been so described in the mortgages which the vendor had purchased, who had afterwards taken a deed containing a like description, when in fact one half of one of the lots was owned and occupied by an adjoining proprietor, the mistake was a mutual one, which could be corrected in equity. Conlin v. Masecar, 80 Mich. 139, 45 N. W. 67.

And where one purchases and pays full consideration for land held by his vendor by title bond, and it is agreed that the latter shall cause a conveyance to be made to the purchaser, but without his knowledge and consent the vendor causes the conveyance to be made to the purchaser's son, a reformation of the deed cannot be defeated on the ground that the mistake is not mutual. Roszell v. Roszell, 109 Ind. 354, 10 N. E. 114.

So, a mutual mistake is sufficiently shown by a complaint in an action for the reformation of a mortgage alleging that the mortgagors agreed to convey the whole of a certain tract of land as security for the debt, and that both parties intended that the entire tract should be included in the mortgage, but that by mistake of the scrivener the description written in the mortgage covered only a part of the tract. Keister v. Myers, 115 Ind. 312, 17 N. E. 161.

And a mortgage executed under the belief by both mortgagor and mortgagee that a certain building which was regarded as the principal security was upon the mortgaged property, but which by mistake had been built upon adjoining lots not owned by the mortgagor, will be corrected so as to cover the lots upon which such building was placed, as against a grantee through conveyances of the property who shared the common mistake, and who, to protect himself and with full knowledge of the original mistake, bought the lots upon which the building stood at their ground value. Way v. Roth, 159 Ill. 162, 42 N. E. 321.

So, where a person agreed to pay a specified sum for property, assuming a mortgage and paying taxes as a part of the price, and the mortgage and the taxes due just made up the sum agreed upon, and there was a year's interest unpaid on the mortgage, which made the aggregate more than the amount agreed upon, there having been no fraud on the part of the seller, the mistake as to the amount to be paid is a mutual one, entitling the purchaser to recover the overpayment in an action to reform the contract. Ragsdale v. Turner, 141 Iowa, 604, 120 N. W. 109.

And where, in an action by a grantee of one parcel of land covered by a mortgage, to have it reformed by correcting the description of a second parcel, which was claimed was intended to be covered by it, the mortgagee denied the allegations of the petition on the ground of not having any information on the subject sufficient to authorize a belief, the answer is not conclusive against the plaintiff to take the case out of the list of cases of mutual mistake. Manatt v. Starr, 72 Iowa, 677, 34 N. W. 784.

So, where both the maker and payee of a promissory note intended that it should bear no interest, and ignorantly supposed that this would result from an omission to insert in the note any reference to the subject of interest, equity will, at the instance of the maker when sued upon the note by a third person, to whom the payee had indorsed it, correct such mistake when it appears that the holder took the note as a donation, paying nothing for it, and that at the time of taking it he had full knowledge of the fact that the original parties to it intended that it should not bear interest. Loudermilk v. Loudermilk, 98 Ga. 780, 25 S. E. 927.

And where a negotiable note was transferred and the parties agreed that the note should be taken without recourse to the party transferring it, and they mistakenly supposed that the form of assignment of the note adopted by them would have that effect, being ignorant of the provisions of the law of commercial paper, which makes the indorser liable in case of default of the maker of the note, equity will reform the contract of indorsement so as to make it conform to their intention. Stafford v. Feters, 55 Iowa, 484, 8 N. W. 322.

In the above case Glenn v. Statler, 42 Iowa, 107, and Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138, supra, IV, b. 3 (b), (2), were distinguished on the ground that in those cases the mistake was not in expressing the contract, but as to its legal effect.

So, where it was intended to assign an insurance policy to a particular person, and by mistake of an agent a nonexistent person was named as assignee, and a renewal policy carried the same error, the company having no acquaintance either with the party to whom the policy was to be assigned or the nonexistent person named, the assignment contains a mutual mistake rightfully to be reformed in equity. Thomason v. Capital Ins. Co. 92 Iowa, 72, 61 N. W. 843.

And a mutual mistake between the parties to an official bond as to the time when it shall take effect and be in force may be corrected in equity. Lewiston v. Gagne, 89 Me. 395, 56 Am. St. Rep. 432, 36 Atl. 629.

On an issue as to reformation of a written instrument, however, an honest difference of understanding as to what the contract was, is fatal to relief. Hertzler v. Stevens, 119 Ala. 333, 24 So. 521; Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064.

And where a party to a contract prays for reformation of it on the ground of mistake, and the testimony given by each party is flatly contradicted by the other, the complainant must fail unless the other evidence supports his claim. Goerke Co. v. Diskon (N. J. Eq.) 75 Atl. 780.

And where each party to a deed misunderstood the understanding of the other in regard to land which was agreed to be conveyed, this is a common mistake as to the subject-matter of the contract, and it is not a mutual mistake in inserting in the deed the description of the land. Page v. Higgins, 150 Mass. 27, 5 L.R.A. 152, 22 N. E. 63.

So, where a person conveys a part of a piece of land to another, and afterwards, having retained possession of that with his other land, conveyed the whole to another person without making any reservation, his application to have the deed reformed by inserting therein an exception of the lot first sold will be denied, in the absence of proof that the mistake was mutual. Morris v. Penrose, 38 N. J. Eq. 629.

And where land is devised to several persons in fee in undivided shares, a subsequent conveyance by the deviser to one of the devisees of a part of the same land will not revoke or be deemed a satisfaction of the devise to the grantee, but he is entitled to the land conveyed by deed and to a share of the land remaining under the will, and this although it appears that there was a mutual mistake as to the effect of the deed, both parties supposing that the land conveyed would be in lieu of the share of the grantee by the will. Arthur v. Arthur, 10 Barb. 9.

So, a complaint to reform a deed of conveyance of land on the ground of a mistake in the omission therefrom of words of inheritance, whereby an estate for life was created, when it was the intention of the parties to create an estate in fee simple, is bad on demurrer if it contains no averment to the effect that, at the time of the execution of the deed, the grantor and grantee were both ignorant of its precise contents, or of the omission therefrom of the alleged words of inheritance. Nicholson v. Caress, 59 Ind. 39.

And where owners of land deeded it, reserving the coal and minerals therein, but never procured them, and afterwards the then owners of the land demised the coal under it to certain persons, and still later the then owner of the land demised the coal under another part to another person, and after this the successors of the original owner became aware of the reservation in the first deed and brought action to establish their right to the minerals,—it was held that the last lease could not be rectified, as there was no common mistake; and that it could not be set aside, as the lessee was not prepared to give up possession of the property comprised in it. Sutherland v. Heathcote [1892] 1 Ch. 475, 17 Eng. Rul. Cas. 785.

So, where, without any previous agreement, a creditor prepared a mortgage including part only of the debtor's lands, and the debtor executed it, reformation thereof on the ground of mutual mistake, to include the remainder of the land, cannot be had though they intended that it should include all the land and believed that it did, neither of them having knowledge of the intent or belief of the other. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Judy, 146 Ind. 322, 43 N. E. 259.

And a mortgagee who has received in good faith a mortgage executed by his debtor and his wife, of property the record title to which was in the husband, is not liable to have his mortgage invalidated as to a portion of the premises, on a claim by the wife of the mortgagor that she held such portion by an unrecorded deed from her husband, and that the same was included in the mortgage by a mistake of her husband, for which mistake it is not claimed the mortgagee was in any way responsible. Shepard v. Shepard, 36 Mich. 173.

So, a court of equity will not reform a warranty deed to conform to the alleged intention of the parties, that it was to be a mortgage, on the ground that there was a mistake, in the absence of fraud, unless it clearly appears that the mistake was a mutual one. Forester v. Van Auken, 12 N. D. 175, 96 N. W. 301.

In order to establish that a deed, absolute on its face, is in fact only a mortgage, it must be shown either by direct evidence, or by the circumstances of the case, that it was the intention and understanding of the grantor and the grantee that it should so operate; it is not enough that one of the parties so considered it; both must concur, otherwise the deed will be treated according to its import, unless tainted by fraud, or the result of accident or mutual mistake. Reeder v. Gorsuch, 55 Kan. 553, 40 Pac. 897.

So, if a party could have learned that his contract with another was to wainscot six stories of a building instead of five stories, and, without attempting to do so, through mistake, he estimated the cost of doing the work upon the basis of five stories, there is not a mutual mistake authorizing reformation. Grant Marble Co. v. Abbott, 142 Wis. 279, 124 N. W. 264.

And where a party made a contract with another to separate ore for him at a specified price per ton, and carried the contract partially into effect by separating ore under it for several months without any knowledge of the alleged ignorance of the other party that 2,000 pounds was a ton, instead of 2,240 pounds as he supposed, the latter denying that he intended to contract with reference to anything but the 2,000-pound ton, equity will not reform the contract so as to require the party to separate ore at the stipulated rate for each gross ton, since this would be making a new contract for them. Hall v. Reed, 2 Barb. Ch. 500.

In the above case Many v. Beekman Iron Co. 9 Paige, 188, supra, IV. c. 3 (i), was distinguished upon the ground that that case was based upon the fact that both parties had really agreed and intended to contract for the sale and purchase of the iron at the rate of 2,240 pounds to the ton, and not for iron to be delivered and paid for as statute tons.

So, where a bill brought to recover on a policy of insurance stated that the several owners of a certain warehouse applied to the defendant for insurance against fire on their interest in said property, with loss, if any, payable to one of them, and that thereupon the defendant issued its policy on the interest of that one alone, instead of all, it does not appear that the defendant ever agreed to insure the interest of but one of the owners, and therefore it is not shown that the mistake was mutual and one which equity will correct. Durham v. Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 10 Sawy. 526, 22 Fed. 468.

And where the owner of a house insures it against fire, the policy payable in case of loss to a mortgagee, and containing a provision that if the property should be sold the policy should be void, and afterwards the owner sold the house, and the mortgagee entered for the purpose of foreclosure and notified the insurance company, the agent of which indorsed on the policy that it shall attach and cover the mortgagee's interest as such, the agent not knowing of the previous conveyance by the owner, and the mortgagee knowing of it but not then thinking of it,—the insurance company cannot maintain a bill in equity against the mortgagee to correct and reform the indorsement, upon the ground that it was in construction and legal effect a mutual mistake and did not express the real contract previously made between the parties. German American Ins. Co. v. Davis, 131 Mass. 316.

g. Mistake superinduced or accompanied by fraud or inequitable conduct.

1. General rules.

If mistake of law is occasioned by the fraudulent representation or culpable negligence of another, or if the mistake of law is not pure and simple, but is induced or accompanied by other special facts giving rise to an independent equity on behalf of the mistaken person, such as inequitable conduct of the other party, a court of equity will interpose its aid. Tolley v. Poteet, 62 W. Va. 231, 57 S. E. 811.

And equity will reform a written instrument which, through the mistake of one party, accompanied by fraud or other inequitable conduct of the other party, does not express the true intention. Hand v. Cox (Ala.) 51 So. 519; Koons v. Blanton, 129 Ind. 383, 27 N. E. 334; Hayes v. Stiger, 29 N. J. Eq. 196; MacVeagh v. Burns, 2 S. D. 83, 48 N. W. 835; Kyle v. Fehley, 81 Wis. 67, 29 Am. St. Rep. 866, 51 N. W. 257; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 15 Pet. 233, 10 L. ed. 721.

While mere ignorance of law will not ordinarily relieve a party from the performance of his written contract, where he signs and delivers the same with full knowledge of all the facts, if on account of misplaced confidence, and because of artifice and deception fraudulently practised upon him by the opposite party, a vital and material part of the contract was omitted from the writing, which purported to express the whole contract, and the party overreached was fraudulently led to believe that the contract as written was in effect the same as if the omitted portion had been inserted, equity will decree a reformation. Hansford v. Freeman, 99 Ga. 376, 27 S. E. 706.

If a party dealing with another misleads him, and takes advantage of his ignorance of his legal rights, equity may exercise its jurisdiction to prevent imposition. Ramey v. Allison, 64 Tex. 697.

The rule that a court of equity will only interfere to correct a mistake in a written instrument when it has been mutual does not apply, either where the party against whom the relief is sought has acted in bad faith or disingenuously, with full apprehension that the instrument did not express what the other party desired or intended, or where confidence was reposed in him, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and he was intrusted with, and assumed, the preparation of the instrument, but had in its preparation, either wilfully or negligently, omitted what had been clearly stated to him as the intention of the other party, who, relying on its correctness, and without particular examination of the document as prepared, assented to it under the supposition that it conformed to the verbal terms of the negotiation as previously agreed upon. Brioso v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Daly, 246.

Misrepresentation, whether wilful or accidental, if prejudicial, is a ground for reforming a deed or contract. Zentmyer v. Mittower, 5 Pa. 403; Taymon v. Mitchell, 1 Md. Ch. 496.

And where a contract is obtained by misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment of superior knowledge, a court of equity will intervene and rescind the contract thus obtained. Tolley v. Poteet, 62 W. Va. 231, 57 S. E. 811.

Though the means of correct information be equally open to both parties to a contract, yet if either of them does or says anything tending to impose upon the other, and he is imposed upon to his injury, the contract will not be allowed to stand. Taymon v. Mitchell, supra.

Mistake as to the legal effect of a written agreement, induced by misrepresentation, entitles a party to relief in equity, and the court will carry into effect the intention of the parties though the agreement fails to express it. Tyson v. Passmore, 2 Pa. St. 122, 44 Am. Dec. 181.

And a mistake of law, made through and because of the representations of an agent, may be corrected in equity. Bailey v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 4 McCrary, 221, 13 Fed. 250.

So, if a person is ignorant of a matter of law involved in a transaction, and another, knowing of such ignorance, takes advantage of such circumstance to make a contract, the court will relieve from the contract on account of the fraud. State v. Paup, 13 Ark. 129, 56 Am. Dec. 303.

And a clerical mistake by one party in reducing the terms agreed upon to writing, which is either shared in or known to be a mistake by the other party at the time of executing the contract, is sufficient ground for decreeing a reformation. Trenton Terra Cotta Co. v. Clay Shingle Co. 80 Fed. 46. ✓

And cancelation of an instrument may be awarded, under a bill the gravamen of which is fraudulent representation and undue influence though it does not by name denominate the transaction as being one produced by mistake, on proof of mistake on one side, and knowledge thereof by the other and taking advantage of it. Moehlenpah v. Mayhew, 138 Wis. 561, 119 N. W. 826. ✓

So, the mistake of a grantor, if known to the grantee, who conceals the truth from the grantor in order to secure a conveyance of land from him which he knows the grantor never intended or agreed to convey, is a case of a mistake of one party, accompanied by fraud or inequitable conduct of the other party, and is good ground for a reformation of the instrument. Crookston Improv. Co. v. Marshall, 57 Minn. 333, 47 Am. St. Rep. 612, 59 N. W. 294.

And a court of equity will reform a deed or written contract, where, through fraud or mistake of fact, it fails to express the intention of the parties, though it is in the very language agreed upon. Smith v. Jordan, 13 Minn. 264, Gil. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 232.

Every mere false assertion of value, when no warranty is intended, however, will not constitute a ground of relief to a purchaser, if the assertion is a mere matter of opinion in which parties may differ, or if the seller indulges in the common language of puffing, not amounting to a warranty. Taymon v. Mitchell, supra.

And a misrepresentation as to the legal effects of a contract, or the rights of the parties under it, instrumental in procuring its execution, is not a ground for canceling it as fraudulently obtained. Catlin v. Fletcher, 9, Minn. 85, Gil. 75; Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. ed. 203.

Unless the person deceived was unable to judge of its true construction. See Berry v. Whitney, 40 Mich. 72, infra, IV. g, 2 (a).

And opinions hazarded as to the effect of legal documents, where the parties stand on an equal footing, are not admissible in evidence for the purpose of reforming or rescinding a contract, since the parties are not presumed to be misled, where each had equal means of information. Zentmyer v. Mittower, 5 Pa. 403.

Nor will a representation of what the law will or will not permit to be done ordinarily amount to such fraud as a court of equity will take cognizance of, but is to be regarded rather as the expression of an opinion than the assertion of a fact. Abbott v. Treat, 78 Me. 121, 3 Atl. 44; Fish v. Cleland, 33 Ill. 243; Platt v. Scott, 6 Blackf. 389, 39 Am. Dec. 436; Ramey v. Allison, 64 Tex. 697.

So, no representation, promise, or agreement made or opinion expressed in the previous parol negotiations as to the terms or legal effect of the resulting written agreement can be permitted to prevail, either at law or in equity, over the plain provisions and just interpretation of the contract, in the absence of some artifice which concealed its terms and prevented the complainant from reading or understanding it. New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 30 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 63, reversing 78 Fed. 33.

And if the subject of a contract is in its nature uncertain, and if all that is known about it is matter of inference from something else, and if the parties making it and receiving representations on the subject have equal knowledge and means of acquiring knowledge, and equal skill, it will not be presumed that representations made by one would have much or any influence upon the other. Clapham v. Shillito, 7 Beav. 146.

Nor do ordinary mistakes on the part of a purchaser, relative to the qualities of property purchased, caused by the communications of the seller, call for interposition of a court of equity. Taylor v. Fleet, Barb. 95.

And a mistake as to the legal effect of an agreement will not avail a party to it, unless led into it by fraud or the representations of the other party. Hawralty v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 613; Townsend v. Cowles, 31 Ala. 428; Leszynsky v. Ross, 35 Misc. 652, 72 N. Y. Supp. 352.

So, unless the grantee in a deed makes statements inducing mistake or misapprehension on the part of the grantor, or, with knowledge of such mistake, keeps silent, he is not guilty of fraud furnishing ground for cancelation. Stewart v. Dunn, 77 App. Div. 631, 79 N. Y. Supp. 123.

And if a party to whom representations with reference to a contract were made himself resorted to the proper means of verification before he entered into the contract, and relied upon the result of his own investigations and inquiry, and not upon the representations made to him by the other party, or if the means of investigation and verification were at hand, and the attention of the party receiving the representations was drawn to them, the circumstances of the case may be such as to make it incumbent on a court of justice to impute to him a knowledge of the result which upon due inquiry he ought to have obtained. Clapham v. Shillito, supra.

Nor is the mere fact that a person is of a weak understanding, whether produced by old age, accident, or disease, if there be no fraud or surprise, an adequate ground for relief against his contracts. Nace v. Boyer, 30 Pa. 99; Graham v. Pancoast, 30 Pac. 89.

And that the execution of a written contract was procured by the oral promise of the other party that he would not enforce it, and that he is proceeding to enforce it, is no ground for canceling the contract as fraudulently obtained. Catlin v. Fletcher, 9 Minn. 85, Gil. 75.

Nor will a misrepresentation avoid a contract, if it be of such a nature that he to whom it was made had no right to rely upon it, since courts of equity will not aid one who refuses to exercise his own sense and discretion when it is incumbent on him to do so. Zentmyer v. Mittower, supra.

And a misrepresentation which is not acted on cannot serve as a ground for a suit in equity for reformation. Boyce v. Watson, 20 Ga. 517.

So, misrepresentation, whether wilful or accidental, to be a ground for reforming a deed or contract, must be of some material fact which the party might have placed confidence in, and not an opinion, unless there be peculiar circumstances of contrivance or abuse of confidence reposed; and it must be shown that the complaining party acted on the misrepresentation, or a mistake induced by the party seeking to bind him by the written evidence. Zentmyer v. Mittower, supra.

And a person cannot obtain relief in equity on the sole ground that a bargain he had made was an unconscionable one, which would not have been made but for his ignorance, without proof tending to show that his alleged mistake was caused by the fraud of the opposite party. Schiels v. Hickey, 26 Mo. App. 194.

And where, by mistake of the scrivener, greater privileges with reference to seaweed were granted than were bargained for, but the purchase was induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the vendor as to the productiveness and value of the seaweed privilege really bargained for, and especially where it appears that the mistake in the grant merely makes the privilege granted equal in productiveness and value to the privilege contracted for as it was represented, the court will not interfere with such a providential adjustment of equities, but will dismiss the complaint. Allen v. Brown, 6 R. I. 386.

So, to entitle a person to rescind a contract on the ground of mistake or fraud as established by the evidence, he must plead a case of fraud and mistake, or fraud or mistake. Moehlenpah v. Mayhew, 138 Wis. 561, 119 N. W. 826.

And where the complaint in an action sets forth facts which, being denied by defendant, raise issues as to unfairness, surprise, and undue advantage by means of which an instrument was obtained, a court of equity will not let the defendant take advantage of it, though the complaint does not allege fraud in terms. Bean v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 107 N. C. 731, 12 S. E. 600.

And the defendant in an action to reform mortgage notes cannot complain that his error in drawing up the same for an amount more than was agreed on, as shown by the evidence, was not charged as a fraud on his part, and that the action was restricted, by the complaint and issue submitted without objection, to an inquiry whether there was a mutual mistake. Jones v. Warren, 134 N. C. 390, 46 S. E. 740.

2. Fraud.

(a) General rules as to.

Relief against mistake in law will be given where there is actual or legal fraud by one who seeks to obtain the execution of an agreement to benefit himself or those for whom he acts. Whelen's Appeal, 70 Pa. 410.

Misrepresentation and fraud in corruptly deceiving one as to matter of law amounts to fraud in a legal sense, and furnishes ground for interference of equity. Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 303; Townsend v. Cowles, 31 Ala. 428; Nelson v. Betts, 21 Mo. App. 219.

And a mistake of law by one of two parties to a written agreement, if accompanied and induced by fraud of the other party, may in a proper case authorize a reformation, or a refusal to enforce the contract. Williams v. Hamilton, 104 Iowa, 423, 65 Am. St. Rep. 475, 73 N. W. 1029; Broadwell v. Broadwell, 6 Ill. 599.

And where, by the fraud of a party to a contract, the real contract is not reduced to writing, the defrauded party may have the contract reformed. Grant Marble Co. v. Abbott, 142 Wis. 279, 124 N. W. 264.

So, a court of equity will decree a rescission of a contract obtained by the fraudulent representations or conduct of one of the parties thereto, on the complaint of the other, when it satisfactorily appears that the party seeking the rescission has been misled in regard to a material matter by such misrepresentation or conduct, to his injury or prejudice. Seeley v. Reed, 25 Fed. 361; Townsend v. Cowles, supra.

And fraudulent representations as to the legal effect of an instrument will avoid it, even though made to one who has actually read it, if he was unable to judge of its true construction. Berry v. Whitney, 40 Mich. 72.

And where an assertion is made by one man to another, as to the effect of an instrument which the former desires to obtain from the latter, which is false and fraudulently made, and which is the procuring cause of the execution of that instrument, the party defrauded is entitled to relief in equity; and the granting of such relief is not subject to the objection that the false and fraudulent statement was only an assertion of what the law is. Chestnut Hill Reservoir Co. v. Chase, 14 Conn. 123.

So, if any peculiar fiduciary relation exists between parties, of which one knowingly avails himself, so as to mislead the other by a misrepresentation of the legal effect of a contract between them, or if he knowingly takes advantage of the other's actual ignorance of the law, it amounts to a fraud which is correctable in equity. Townsend v. Cowles, supra.

Nor can one by falsehood and lies deceive an illiterate man, and impose upon him a writing for one thing when it really is another, and then come into a court of justice, and expect to receive the benefit of his fraud. Decker v. Hardin, 5 N. J. L. 579.

And if a party was induced by the fraud or misrepresentation of the other party to a contract to execute it without reading it, the contract executed being materially different from what he had a right to believe he was executing, he may have an action to rescind on the ground of fraud; but if he brings an action to rescind or cancel on the sole ground that the other party has failed to perform, he must stand on the contract as he executed it. Quimby v. Shearer, 56 Minn. 534, 58 N. W. 155.

Undue concealment which amounts to fraud from which a court of equity will relieve, when there is no peculiar relation of trust and confidence between the parties, is the nondisclosure of those facts and circumstances which one party is under some legal or equitable obligation to communicate to the other, and which the latter has not merely a conscientious right, but a legal one, to know. Fish v. Cleland, 33 Ill. 243.

So, when stipulations are kept out of a contract by fraud such contract will be reformed in equity and specifically enforced. Cubberly v. Cubberly, 39 N. J. Eq. 514.

And a person whose duty it is to prepare a written contract according to a previous agreement, but who prepares one materially changing the terms of the previous agreement, and delivers it as in accordance therewith, commits a fraud entitling the other to relief. Hay v. Star F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 235, 33 Am. Rep. 607; Gewin v. Shields (Ala.) 52 So. 887.

And where one party to a contract is induced to and does execute it upon the faith of the representation that it is drawn in accordance with the understanding of the parties, when in fact it is not so drawn, he may have relief upon the ground of fraud, if nothing further appears to deprive him of it. Rochester & K. F. Land Co. v. Davis, 79 Hun, 69, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1148.

And when a grantor fails to observe the contract pursuant to which a deed is made, the grantee, who has not assented to the terms of the deed, or been advised at the time of its delivery of the defective execution of the contract, may seek a remedy in an action for the reformation of the deed, founded upon the charge of fraud on the part of the grantor. Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652.

So, if a party is intrusted to reduce a contract to writing, he is bound to do it truly; and any variation from it, either by omitting some of its terms, or by inserting provisions not embraced in it, if not known to the other party and distinctly assented to by him, is a fraud which equity will correct. Botsford v. McLean, 45 Barb. 478.

And where an important part of an actual bargain is omitted at the request of one of the parties, on his solemn assurance that it shall be performed though not inserted, and he afterwards refuses to perform, the other party is entitled to prove such facts, and to relief in equity. Lauchner v. Rex, 20 Pa. 464.

So, chancery will decree a return of the purchase money for insufficiency of title, even after the purchase has been carried completely into execution by delivery of the deed and payment of the money, and whether the deed is with or without covenants, provided there has been a fraudulent representation as to the title. Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 303.

And the law of constructive notice can never be so applied as to relieve a party from responsibility for misstatements and frauds. Converse v. Blumrich, 14 Mich. 109, 90 Am. Dec. 230.

Where a written instrument is alleged to have been given because of a misrepresentation, however, the gist of the inquiry is not whether the person making the statement knew it to be false, but whether the statement made as true was believed to be true, and therefore, if false, deceived the party to whom it was made. Joice v. Taylor, 6 Gill & J. 54, 25 Am. Dec. 325.

And a misrepresentation, in order to affect the validity of a contract, must relate to some matter of inducement in the making of the contract, where the purchaser relies on the superior knowledge and information of the seller, but not where the purchaser has equal means of information, and may rely upon his own judgment founded upon actual examination. Hill v. Bush, 19 Ark. 522.

And fraudulent representations as to the legal effect of an instrument, which will avoid it, must be contemporaneous with the execution of the instrument, and must consist in obtaining the assent of the party defrauded by inducing a false impression as to its legal or literal nature and operation. Berry v. Whitney, 40 Mich. 72.

So, a person who claims to have been drawn into a purchase by fraud must exercise care and diligence to discover the fraud, and must be prompt in repudiating his contract on the ground of such fraud. Upton v. Tribilcock, 13 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 171.

If the fact with reference to which a mistake in a contract is alleged be unknown to the parties, or if each has equal or adequate means of information in regard to it, and the parties have acted with good faith, equity will not interfere. Wood v. Patterson, 4 Md. Ch. 335.

And where fraud is relied upon to secure the reformation of an instrument, it must be averred. Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479; Daughtrey v. Knolle, 44 Tex. 450.

And one seeking to secure the annulment of a contract, or to prevent its performance, upon the ground that he has been induced to enter into it by fraudulent misrepresentations of the other party or his agent, has the burden of establishing the allegations of his bill by clear and conclusive proof. McShane v. Hazlehurst, 50 Md. 107.

Nor will cancelation for fraud be decreed in a suit to reform a deed to defendants so as to include plaintiffs as grantees, where the grantor devised all the property described in the deed by will duly probated after a contest by one plaintiff, and the time has elapsed in which the others can question its validity. Bonneville v. Dum (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 1179.

So, the Michigan statute (How. Stat. §§ 8722, 8726) referring to the fraudulent concealment of a cause of action is applicable to a concealment of law, as well as of fact, entitling the victim of the fraud to an action notwithstanding the statute of limitations. Tompkins v. Hollister, 60 Mich. 470, 27 N. W. 651.

(b) Application to particular cases.

Where a party has been induced to enter into a contract of sale by the fraudulent misrepresentations, by the other party or his agent, of material facts upon which he relied and had a right to rely, a court of equity will grant him relief by refusing to decree a specific performance, or by annulling the contract after it has been carried into execution by delivery of deeds to the purchaser. McShane v. Hazlehurst, 50 Md. 107.

So, where the vendor of a lot of land secretly intended to sell only a part of the lot, but succeeded in making the vendee understand that he was buying the whole of it, and only a part of the lot was included in the deed of conveyance, for which the vendee paid the vendor the whole consideration intended by him to be given for the whole lot, the court will decree that the vendor execute to the vendee a conveyance of the whole. Wiswall v. Hall, 3 Paige, 313; Winans v. Huyck, 71 Iowa, 459, 32 N. W. 422.

And where a grantor pointed out to a grantee land that was inclosed by a fence, and sold and conveyed the same as one lot and a portion of another, when there was in fact a part of a third lot owned by the grantor included within the inclosure, equity will reform the deed so as to embrace all of the land pointed out and represented as being inclosed by the fence, whether the misdescription was the result of mutual mistake or of intentional misstatement on the part of the grantor. Ezell v. Peyton, 134 Mo. 484, 36 S. W. 35.

And where the terms of a deed are agreed upon, and the parties employ a conveyancer, and state such terms to him, and the grantor afterwards, without the knowledge of the grantee, gives other directions as to the terms to be inserted, which are followed, and the grantee accepts the deed, supposing it to be drawn as agreed on, a court of equity will reform it, the proceeding being a fraud upon the grantee. Bergen v. Ebey, 88 Ill. 269.

So, equity will relieve on the ground of fraud when, between the parties to a conveyance absolute in terms there was an agreement that the grantees would hold the property conveyed in trust for the grantor during his life, the fraud consisting in the violated promise, on the presumption that but for such promise the grantor would have inserted in the deed the substance of the parol agreement. Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665.

And if the grantee of land had a deed for the same prepared for execution, and a mistake occurred in making a conveyance of the fee, instead of a life estate, and he knew of such mistake, and induced the grantors to execute the deed, under a mistake as to its terms, without informing them of the fact, his conduct is such a fraud on the grantors as, coupled with the mistake he led the grantors into, will authorize a decree reforming the deed. Deischer v. Price, 148 Ill. 383, 36 N. E. 105.

So, where the grantee in a deed represented she was seeking only a life estate in certain land, and presented to the grantor, who was her daughter, a deed to be executed therefor, and the latter made the deed under the belief that she was conveying a life estate, when in fact it conveyed an absolute estate in fee simple, equity will set aside the conveyance, whether the transaction was one of mutual mistake, or of fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the grantee. Summers v. Coleman, 80 Mo. 488.

And where the executor of the will of a woman who died leaving property told the deceased's husband that there was nothing left for him in her will, and procured from him a deed of the property for an inadequate sum, when in fact her real estate descended to him irrespective of the will, the deed may properly be set aside as fraudulent. Motherway v. Wall, 168 Mass. 333, 47 N. E. 135.

And where one person contracted to sell and convey to another certain premises, subject to certain mortgages thereon, and the latter assigned the contract to a third person, and the vendor executed a deed to the third person containing a clause by the terms of which the grantee assumed and agreed to pay said mortgages; which deed the grantee accepted and put on record in ignorance of the fact that that clause was contained therein, and supposing that the deed in that particular followed the terms of the contract; and such clause was also inserted without the knowledge or consent of the original grantor,—an action is maintainable to reform the deed by striking out such clause, on the ground that the insertion thereof was a fraud on the grantee. Kilmer v. Smith, 77 N. Y. 226, 33 Am. Rep. 613. ✓

And where it was agreed that certain land should be conveyed by one person to another for a certain consideration, and, in order to describe it in the conveyance, the parties agreed to measure the width of the same, and to do so the grantor furnished a tape-line which was used by them, the length of which was fraudulently misrepresented by the grantor, by reason of which the deed did not embrace all the land which it was agreed and understood should be conveyed, and the grantee was thereby misled and induced to believe that the land was properly described, and to pay the consideration agreed to be paid therefor, a reformation of the deed in equity is warranted. Taylor v. Deverell, 43 Kan. 469, 23 Pac. 628.

So, an aged German woman unacquainted with business forms, who agreed to convey land subject to a lease, and was subsequently induced by the false representations of the grantee to execute a warranty deed making no mention of such lease, is entitled to have the deed reformed in equity so as to conform it to the agreement of the parties. Kyle v. Fehley, 81 Wis. 67, 29 Am. St. Rep. 866, 51 N. W. 257.

And the offer of the grantee in such case to prove that he proposed to reconvey the land in dispute is properly rejected as immaterial. Ibid.

And where an ignorant old man was induced to execute a deed surrendering to his children a large fund to which he was entitled, by being informed by them of the opinion of a lawyer whom they had employed and in whom he had great confidence, which opinion was that he had no right, and by the false representation of one of his children as to what they had agreed to give him, and as to the purpose for which the deed was to be used, a court of equity will disregard such conveyance as being against conscience, and decree the fund as if the conveyance did not exist. Powell v. Cobb, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 456.

So, where it is charged that by mistake of the plaintiff a deed does not contain a reservation in his favor, to which under the prior contract between the parties he was entitled, and that the defendant knew all the facts, relief may be given on the ground of fraud on the part of the defendant, though fraud is not charged in words. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525.

And where a person contracting to convey a piece of land intended to reserve a strip of a certain width, but through inadvertence signed a contract with a reservation of a smaller strip, and the vendee knew of the mistake, but did not inform the vendor of it, and attempted to obtain the benefit of it, the act of the vendee was fraudulent, and the contract should be reformed on the ground of fraud. Gillett v. Borden, 6 Lans. 219.

And where a piece of land was contracted for which had never been surveyed, but which was supposed to contain about a certain number of acres, and afterwards, upon a survey being made, it was found to be considerably larger, and the vendor then measured off just the quantity that the whole piece had previously been supposed to be, and deeded it to the purchaser, the purchaser's right to a specific performance of the contract of sale is unaffected by her acceptance, through mistake, of the deed thus fraudulently imposed upon her. Place v. Johnson, 20 Minn. 219, Gil. 198.

So, where a husband and wife by separate deeds conveyed lands owned by them, and took back a mortgage to themselves jointly for the purchase money, and on foreclosure thereof the property was bid in for the wife, but the deed was given to her husband alone, who retained it unrecorded for four years representing to the wife that the deed was taken in her name, and the fact that it was not in her name was not discovered by her until after her husband's death, a finding of fraud warranting reformation of the deed is warranted; and the statute of limitations is not a bar to the action. Dunworth v. Dunworth, 37 N. Y. S. R. 905, 13 N. Y. Supp. 489.

And where a man who was a brother of the testatrix in question, while a visitor at her house, induced her to execute to him a deed of certain property by falsely representing to her that the instrument would not deprive her of the right to dispose of the property as she might desire during her lifetime; and the testatrix was ignorant of the law and of the character of the conveyance; and the brother recorded the instrument during testatrix's lifetime, in violation of his express agreement not to do so,— 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) his misrepresentations were misrepresentations of fact, constituting actionable fraud and justifying a vacation of the deed. Busiere v. Reilly, 189 Mass. 518, 75 N. E. 958.

So, where the owner of land lays it off into town lots with streets, etc., for their use, and sells lots accordingly, it is a dedication of these ways to the use of the purchasers; and the plan exhibited is evidence of the existence and location of the streets; and a reference in a deed to such plan is an assertion of a positive fact, which, if material, enters into the consideration, and, if false, is a ground of relief, where its falsity was unknown to the purchaser, and he took no covenant to protect himself. McCall v. Davis, 56 Pa. 431, 94 Am. Dec. 92.

And where a vendor, under a misapprehension of his legal rights, sold a lot of land which, by the terms of the conveyances of adjoining lots to prior purchasers, had been constructively dedicated for the purposes of a public street, and represented that the lot would not be taken for a street without paying to the vendee the full value thereof, but without communicating the facts upon which the legal question as to the rights of the prior purchasers depended, the vendee is entitled to relief against a bond and mortgage given by him for the purchase money, the lot being in fact worth nothing at the time of his purchase. Champlin v. Laytin, 6 Paige, 189.

So, where a lot of land is sold upon proclamation by the sheriff that it is sold to pay the purchase money, it being understood by the bystanders to mean to satisfy the vendor's lien, and being so meant by the sheriff, but it turns out to be a mistake, no deed having been executed and filed in compliance with the statute, the sale will be rescinded at the instance of the bidder, and a resale ordered. Horton v. Moyers, 25 Ga. 89.

A deed will not be reformed for fraud of the grantee in taking unfair advantage of the grantor by accepting a deed with knowledge that it contained a mistake in the description of the property, of which the grantor was ignorant, however, if the grantor had every opportunity to inform himself as to the proper description, and neglected to do so. Cherry v. Brizzolara, 89 Ark. 309, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 508, 116 S. W. 668.

And for a deficit in the quantity of acres named in a deed, if not provided for by an express warranty of quantity, an action will only lie in case of actual misrepresentation as to quantity, acted upon by the vendee; and the specific acts of fraud or misrepresentation must be alleged and proved in an action to recover for such deficiency. Daugherty v. Knolle, 44 Tex. 450.

And where a person loaned a sum of money, and received for security a warranty deed of land from the borrower, who, being called upon for repayment, negotiated a loan from another person, and agreed to give him the same security, and all parties met, and the last lender furnished the money with which to pay the previous lender, and presented him with and requested him to sign a deed of warranty from the previous lender to him, thus saving the expense of two deeds, assuring him that that was the correct way to do business, and that the bond for reconveyance, executed by the lender to the borrower, would clear the former lender from any claim, the deed was not obtained by fraudulent representations of the former lender, and will not be set aside in an action for covenant broken. Grant v. Grant, 56 Me. 573.

And where the owners of land contracted with another to convey it to him or order, and the latter, by showing a purchaser another and better tract of land, representing it to be the one he was buying, induced the purchaser to contract with him to purchase the land in question, and the original owners at his request deeded the land direct to the latter purchaser, the transaction was a sale by the original owners to their vendee, and another sale by him to the latter purchaser, the first vendee not being the agent of the owners, and they not being responsible for his fraud; and such fraud affords no ground for rescission as between the purchaser and the original owners. Reeves v. McCracken (Tex.) 128 S. W. 895.

So, where one of the owners of a remainder in real estate, in negotiating a purchase of a life estate therein, falsely represented that a sale of the property could not be made unless all consented thereto, and that one of the owners in remainder refused to sell, the representation that one of the owners refused to sell, if untrue, was only a representation in regard to the seller's chance of a sale, or the probability of her getting a better price than that for which the property was offered by him; and such a misrepresentation is not alone sufficient ground for setting aside the contract. Fish v. Cleland, 33 Ill. 243.

And that a grantor was induced to deliver a conveyance from a misconception of the legal effect of the articles in, and perhaps of the deed itself, touching his remedy for enforcing payment of the purchase money, which misconception did not originate in the misrepresentation of the grantee, but of another and disinterested person, is not admissible in evidence for the purpose of correcting the deed. Zentmyer v. Mittower, 5 Pa. 403.

But where a person offered his entailed estate for sale at a certain price, by letter containing a particular stipulation that the sale was made subject to the ratification of the court, this amounting to an absolute sale, the fact that the agent of the other party gave him a draft of the offer, to copy and sign as his own letter, representing that the effect of writing the letter would be merely to give the seller a little hold upon the purchaser; and that the seller was not aware of any mode of selling an entailed estate except under a statute under which the court judged of the sufficiency of the price,—raises an issue of essential error induced by the agent of the other party. Stewart v. Kennedy, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 108. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Likewise, when a mortgage is obtained by the misrepresentation of the mortgagee, it is void; and it is immaterial, as to its legal effect upon the instrument, whether the mortgagee at the time he made the misrepresentation knew it to be false or not; if he made the statement of facts, knowing it to be false, it would be a legal fraud; and though he did not know that it was false, yet if he undertook to state it to be true, without a knowledge of its truth or falsehood, and it operated as a deception of the other party to whom it was made, and thereby induced the mortgage, it would avoid it. Joice v. Taylor, 6 Gill & J. 54, 25 Am. Dec. 325.

And where a mortgage does not cover all the premises owned by the mortgagor which he, by false and fraudulent representations, induced the mortgagee to believe were included therein when the latter made a loan and accepted it as security therefor, a court of equity will, as against the mortgagor or his voluntary grantee, reform the mortgage and enforce it against the part of the premises not originally embraced therein. De Peyster v. Hasbrouck, 11 N. Y. 582.

And a mortgage executed to secure a security debt of the mortgagor's testator, which was barred by the statute, and for payment of which no promise had been made during the life of the obligation, is not binding upon the legatee giving the mortgage, where she acted under the mistaken belief and upon the representation of the mortgagee that the property was already in lien to secure the same debt. Blakemore v. Blakemore, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1619, 44 S. W. 96.

So, the only fraud necessary to sustain a judgment reforming a lease for mistake is such as may be inferred from the failure of the lessee to correct a mistake of the lessor, known or suspected by the lessee at the time of the execution of the lease. Wilson v. Moriarty, 88 Cal. 207, 26 Pac. 85.

And where, when a person executed a lease, she did not understand it to be a lease for ten years, with a privilege of renewal, but understood it to be for a single term of five years, and the lessee well knew that she so understood it, and fraudulently induced her to misunderstand it, the lease will be reformed in equity. Ibid.

But a lessee is not entitled to have a lease of land described as a named ranch, giving it a particular name, reformed so as to include certain land therein, where he was guilty of bad faith in inducing the lessor to include more land in the lease than he had a right to lease, and did not identify the boundaries of the ranch described. St. Dennis v. Harras (Or.) 105 Pac. 246.

So, where purchasers of goods were trusted to draw notes for the purchase price, and they drew them and delivered them, knowing that two of them which ran for the longest period did not bear interest, it is a clear case of fraud entitling the vendor to have the notes reformed. Botsford v. McLean, 45 Barb. 478.

And where a note payable to a bank, given for the indebtedness of an incorporated company, was, by direction of the president and cashier of the bank, signed by the officers of such company, followed by the official designation of each officer, and the bank officials at the time represented to such signers that they were not personally liable, and the note was executed and accepted as the obligation of the company alone, equity will reform the note to correspond with the intention of the parties, and such intention may be shown by parol evidence. Lawrence County Bank v. Arndt, 69 Ark. 406, 65 S. W. 1052.

So, where a person gave a note for a share in a tract of oil land, and claimed that the note was invalid because of misrepresentations as to the value of the land, if he was induced to subscribe by representations of the agent of the owners of the land, believed to be true by well-informed men, he cannot allege that he was deceived and defrauded by such representations; but if the representations were made by such agent, knowing them to be false, and they were made by fraud of the owners, for the purpose of obtaining the note, and the note was given in consequence thereof, no recovery can be had on the note. Watts v. Cummins, 59 Pa. 84.

And where partners gave two notes to a person, and afterwards both of them died, and at the time of the death of the survivor both notes were barred by the statute of limitations, and after such death the holder, knowing the notes were barred, fraudulently or under a mistake of the law represented to the administratrix of the survivor that the notes were unpaid and valid and in full force against the estates, and succeeded in securing her bond for half the amount, while this was a misrepresentation of the law, still, it is a case in which equity will relieve the administratrix, and the defense may be made at law by a plea under the statute, setting out the facts. Brown v. Rice, 26 Gratt. 467.

So, when a release is given to one joint debtor, although under a misapprehension of its operating to discharge the codebtor, a court of equity will not relieve against it, unless there was fraud or unfair practice. Joy v. Wurtz, 2 Wash. (C. C.) 206, Fed. Cas. No. 7,555.

And mere ignorance of a party to a note, at the time the note was executed, that it was unlawful to contract for the payment of interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, in the absence of proof of fraud or misrepresentation, furnishes no ground to equity to reform the contract. Ottenheimer v. Cook, 10 Heisk. 309.

So, the taking of a bond for discharge upon no exeat, which makes the surety liable for any amount adjudged to be due in the action, which was executed by the surety in the belief that it was a bond only to secure defendant's appearance, under an agreement with defendant that the bond was to secure the amount adjudged due, of which agreement the surety was ignorant, is a fraud upon the surety. Griswold v. Hazard, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

And where a contract was made between a landowner and another for the cutting of timber on the landowner's land, in consideration that half the lumber manufactured therefrom should be delivered to the landowner; and at the same time an executory contract was made for the sale of the land to the same person for a price representing the value of the land without timber, it being understood that the timber was reserved to the vendor by the contract first mentioned; and afterwards a purchaser who had succeeded to the rights of the former purchaser under both contracts paid up the purchase money of the land, and a deed was delivered, which by mistake on the part of the vendor contained no reservation of any interest in the timber, the purchaser being aware of the vendor's mistake, and receiving the deed knowing that the vendor supposed that the timber was reserved,—the vendor is entitled to a reformation of the deed on the ground of fraud, and to damages for the removal of timber by the purchaser claiming the same under the deed. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525.

And where a life insurance company by its authorized agent falsely and fraudulently represented to the executor of the assured, whose mental faculties were at the time impaired by age, financial disasters, and domestic affliction, that sufficient evidence had been discovered to avoid the policy, and that the company would contest and defeat its collection, and thereby procured a settlement of the claim, and a surrender of the policy by paying an amount grossly unjust to the estate of the assured,—such settlement may be set aside in equity, and the balance due on the policy recovered. McLean v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 100 Ind. 127, 50 Am. Rep. 779.

So, where a bond for title incorrectly describes land to be conveyed, a certain number of feet being given in the description, when enough land to include designated buildings was contracted for, and the vendor assured the vendee that the designated number of feet included the buildings, which it did not, the purchaser is entitled to a correction of the bond, and the mistake may be established by parol evidence. Goff v. Jones, 70 Tex. 572, 8 Am. St. Rep. 619, 8 S. W. 525.

And where a man was induced to marry a widow upon the hope and confidence of having the interest she had in the estate of her former husband, without which he never would have married her, and the widow had voluntarily disposed of the property, equity will set aside the deed. Howard v. Hooker, 2 Rep. in Ch. 81.

3. Inequitable conduct.

(a) General rules as to.

While it is a general rule that for a mistake of law, pure and simple, there is ~~no~~ remedy or relief, yet where the surrounding circumstances are of such a nature that the adverse party is seeking to avail himself of the opportunities afforded by the mistake, and attempting to enforce an inequitable advantage without consideration, and the other party is not blamable, equitable relief can in such case be afforded to the party so mistaken, if the other party is not thereby injured; and such mistake need not be mutual. Lane v. Holmes, 55 Minn. 379, 43 Am. St. Rep. 508, 57 N. W. 132; Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816, 33 N. W. 38; Sands v. Sands, 112 Ill. 225; Smith v. Patterson, 53 Mo. App. 66; Whelen's Appeal, 70 Pa. 410; Hunt v. Moore, 2 Pa. St. 105; Sparks v. White, 7 Humph. 86.

Equity will, if possible, restore both parties to the same condition as before, where they have acted under a mistake of law, though there was no actual fraud, if one was unduly influenced and misled by the other to do that which he would not have done but for such influence, and he has in consequence conveyed property to the other without any consideration, or purchased what was already legally his own. Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 556.

And if a man is clearly under mistake in point of law, which mistake is produced by the representations of the other party, he can be relieved in equity as well as if the mistake were as to a matter of fact. Drew v. Clarke, Cooke (Tenn.) 374, 5 Am. Dec. 698; Cooper v. Joel, 1 DeG. F. & J. 240.

And where the plaintiff's complaint showed that her mistake as to her legal rights was induced and encouraged by the misrepresentation of the defendant, and was known to and taken advantage of by him, and that he could not in conscience retain the benefit acquired through such mistake, the complaint stated a cause of action sufficient to withstand demurrer for want of facts. Bales v. Hunt, 77 Ind. 355.

Equity will take cognizance of mixed questions of law and fact, such as ignorance or mistake of law admixed with misrepresentation, imposition, undue confidence, undue influence, mental imbecility, or surprise. Emerson v. Navarro, 31 Tex. 334, 98 Am. Dec. 534; Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 303.

Or where advantage is taken of another's situation or condition. Moreland v. Atchison, supra.

And a mistake of fact occasioned by acting on the representations of another, which representations were in turn occasioned by a mistake of law, is sufficient ground for relief in equity from a contract entered into with the person making the representations, on the faith thereof. Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend. 407, 31 Am. Dec. 382.

And if a party to a contract is ignorant of the law, and the other party, knowing this and also knowing the law, takes advantage of his ignorance to misstate the law, and by inequitable, unfair, and deceptive conduct affirms his mistake and conceals the truth, the former may have relief in equity. Busiere v. Reilly, 189 Mass. 518, 75 N. E. 958.

And a court of equity will relieve against misrepresentations, though innocently made, by rescinding the contract on the ground of mistake. Holmes v. Clark, 10 Iowa, 423.

So, where one who has had superior means of information, or professes a superior knowledge, even of the law, and thereby obtains an unconscientious advantage of another who is confessedly ignorant, and who has not been in a situation to be informed, the injured party is as much entitled to relief on the ground of fraud as if the misrepresentation were a matter of fact. Moreland v. Atchison, supra.

And in some instances, mistake on one side, and knowledge thereof on the other, and taking advantage of it, may be sufficient to justify the reformation of a contract, provided there is another existing contract which may be substituted. Moehlenpah v. Mayhew, 138 Wis. 561, 119 N. W. 826.

So, equity will relieve when the legal effect of a transaction is misunderstood, if the want of proper understanding of its effect was produced by the misleading statements of the other party to the contract. Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665.

And a mistake in the execution of an instrument, as to its legal effect, induced by the act of a party, whether fraudulent or innocent, entitles the other party to its reformation, conforming it to its intended meaning and operation. Heert v. Cruger, 14 Misc. 508, 35 N. Y. Supp. 1063; Evans v. Llewellyn, 2 Bro. Ch. 150.

So, if one, through mistake of his legal rights and mistake of facts, assumes an obligation which he would not have assumed but for such mistake, a court of equity will grant relief; and this is especially so if the mistake was induced or encouraged by the representations of the party benefited, or if he withheld information which, under the circumstances, it was his duty to impart. Wilson v. Maryland L. Ins. Co. 60 Md. 150.

And equity may relieve against mistakes of law which relate merely to legal rights in particular transactions, where the parties do not stand in equal positions, or where the mistake is seen and taken advantage of by the one party, or where there are circumstances which excite suspicion of fraud, imposition, misrepresentation, or undue influence on one side, or imbecility, credulity, or blind confidence on the other. Nelson v. Betts, 21 Mo. App. 219.

So, a mistake of law—as, when an instrument has a different legal effect from what a party to it intended—may be relieved against in equity, if the mistake be that of one of the parties, who placed great trust and confidence in the other, and the confidence was betrayed. Adair v. McDonald, 42 Ga. 506.

And where it appears that one of the parties to a written agreement knew at the time of its execution that it did not truly express the intention of the parties, and also knew that the other party signed it supposing the intention to be correctly expressed, a case for revision is made out. The right to revision does not depend upon the fact that he might or might not have discovered the mistake before signing. Higgins v. Parsons, 65 Cal. 280, 3 Pac. 881.

And though there were no such peculiar relations between the parties as to place the one who remained silent under an unusual obligation, he must be deemed to have appreciated the legal effect of the transaction, and to have known that the other was acting in ignorance of such fact. Eldridge v. Dexter & P. R. Co. 88 Me. 191, 33 Atl. 974.

And a deed executed by an ignorant and illiterate person in reliance upon the agent for the grantee, to whom he has intrusted its preparation, which does not express the real contract between the parties, will be reformed in equity, where it also appears that the grantor believed that the agent was his attorney, and relied entirely on him to prepare the papers properly. Archer v. California Lumber Co. 24 Or. 341, 33 Pac. 526.

So, a court of equity will interfere when called upon to relieve a party against his mistake, made under a combination of such adverse circumstances as to destroy his capacity to know the nature of the contract or engagement to which he became a party. Bean v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 107 N. C. 731, 12 S. E. 600; Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 303.

And a person who, having heretofore occupied a fiduciary relation to another, fraudulently suffered her to pay an obligation upon which she was not legally liable, whereby he became the beneficiary, cannot defend in a court of equity by insisting that she ought to have known the law. Tompkins v. Hollister, 60 Mich. 470, 27 N. W. 651.

So, an illiterate party to a contract is not negligent in signing a contract without informing himself as to its contents or legal effect, where he relies upon the other party properly to express the terms of their oral agreement in the writing, and upon the latter's representation that he has done so. Williams v. Hamilton, 104 Iowa, 423, 65 Am. St. Rep. 475, 73 N. W. 1029.

And in such case an illiterate party who relies upon the other, to the latter's knowledge, to embody their oral agreement in a written contract, may have the contract reformed so as to conform to their understanding, where it was read over to him before it was executed, and he called attention to a certain omission, but was assured by the other party that the contract covered everything agreed upon, which was not true. Ibid.

And when a court is endeavoring to ascertain what reliance was placed on representations in the making of a contract, it must consider them with reference to the subject-matter and the relative knowledge of the parties; and if the subject is capable of being accurately known, and one party is, or is supposed to be, possessed of accurate knowledge, and the other is entirely ignorant, and a contract is entered into, after representations made by the party having knowledge, without any means of verification being resorted to by the other, it may be presumed that the ignorant man relied on the statements made by the other, supposing him to be better informed. Clapham v. Shillito, 7 Beav. 146.

So, where one party to an agreement has knowledge of a mistake in it, and of the other party's ignorance thereof, and, with such knowledge, remains silent when he should speak, he is estopped to defeat a reformation by asserting that the mistake lacks mutuality. Roszell v. Roszell, 109 Ind. 354, 10 N. E. 114.

And although a mistake as to the law forms no ground for reforming a contract, yet where a party acting under a mistake of law or of fact does acts which mislead the adverse party, he is estopped as well as if he were not acting under such mistake. Garnar v. Bird, 57 Barb. 277.

And specific performance of a contract can only be had by one whose hands are perfectly clean and whose conscience is entirely void of offense; and if a contract has been obtained from a party in ignorance of his rights, either as to law or facts, specific performance will be refused. Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529, 42 Am. Dec. 447.

To justify a court of equity in reforming a written contract, however, it should clearly appear that there was some relation of trust or confidence between the parties that had been abused, or that there was fraud, or fraud on one side accompanied by mistake on the other, or that the means of knowing the facts were not equally open to both parties. Kleinsorge v. Rohse, 25 Or. 51, 34 Pac. 874.

And equity will not reform a written contract because of mistake as to the contents of the writing on the part of the complaining party, who was able to read, and fraud of the other party, which consisted only in making false representations as to such contents, on which the complaining party relied as true because of confidence in the party making them, no fiduciary or confidential relation existing between the parties, and no sufficient excuse appearing why the complaining party did not read the contract. Weaver v. Roberson (Ga.) 67 S. E. 662; Meade v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 89 Va. 296, 15 S. E. 497.

So, where the parties dealing with property stand upon a footing of equality, they must take the consequences of a contract deliberately entered into, and cannot have the same reformed in equity. Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. ed. 798; Deare v. Carr, 3 N. J. Eq. 513.

A misapprehension of the law by a party to an express contract will not authorize him to rescind it, if there have been no fraud and no misapprehension of the facts. Jenks v. Mathews, 31 Me. 318.

And when parties deal at arms' length, and there is no confidential or fiduciary relation between them, mere silence on the part of a purchaser of realty, or failure to disclose knowledge on his part of a peculiar value affecting the property or the title thereto, is not sufficient to set aside a sale fairly made, which is otherwise unimpeachable. Pennybacker v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 624, 11 S. E. 39; Fritz v. Fritz, 94 Minn. 264, 102 N. W. 705.

And where a conveyance was obtained from persons uninformed of their rights, and it was accepted and executed after the vendors had gone home and consulted friends, they ought not to be relieved. Evans v. Llewellyn, 2 Bro. Ch. 150.

And that a party entered into an agreement to avoid a controversy at law, that he was ignorant of the law, and was alarmed by the other party issuing against him a writ of ne exeat, when it does not appear that the other party sued out that process with any improper object, constitutes no ground for relieving him from such contract, voluntarily and deliberately entered into. Gunter v. Thomas, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 199.

Nor can a purchaser, in the absence of fraud, obtain compensation, after conveyance, for a misrepresentation, even though such misrepresentation related to the subject-matter of the conveyance. Manson v. Thacker, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 620.

In the above case, Bos v. Helsham, L. R. 2 Exch. 72, supra, IV. g, 2, (a), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the vendor was, in the opinion of the court, guilty of a fraud.

So, to constitute a ground for the rescission of a contract, a voluntary statement must be believed by the party to whom it is addressed. Pennybacker v. Laidley, supra.

And one who in honest error asserts that which is not true, for the purpose and with the effect of influencing another, who in good faith relies upon the assertion, cannot correct the mistake for his own benefit and to the injury of the party deceived. Smith v. Cramer, 39 Iowa, 413.

And where the evidence in an action for the reformation of a contract fairly shows that the contract expressed the intent of the parties when it was signed, a claim by the plaintiff that the other party to the contract was his attorney, in whom he placed special confidence, is immaterial and will be ignored. Roundy v. Kent, 75 Iowa, 662, 37 N. W. 146.

(b) Application in particular cases.

A voluntary settlement by a widow upon a clergyman and his family will be set aside in equity, when obtained by undue influence of and abused confidence in the clergyman as an agent undertaking the management of her affairs, upon principles of public policy and utility applicable to the relation of guardian and ward. Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. Jr. 273, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 834.
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

And where one was a near neighbor and regarded as a particular friend to a grantor who was an old, infirm, and ignorant widow, and obtained from her a deed for a tract of land by untruly stating to her that the supreme court had decided adversely to her interest in an action for such land, the deed will be set aside in equity. Mason v. Pelletier, 82 N. C. 40.

And equity will interfere in the case of an immigrant who, having just arrived, meets an old citizen who professes familiarity with the land titles of the country, and proposes to sell him land to which he assures the immigrant he has perfectly good title, when he has not. Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 303.

And under a statute like that of South Dakota, providing that apparent consent to a contract is not real or free when obtained through mistake, including mistake of law arising from a similar misapprehension of the law by all the parties, or a mistake by one party of which the others are aware at the time of contracting, but which they do not rectify, and that a party to a contract may rescind if the consent of the party rescinding, or of any party jointly contracting with him, was given by mistake, provided he acts promptly on discovering the facts, where a widow was clearly mistaken as to her legal rights in her husband's estate at the time she signed an agreement with the other distributees to accept one sixth of the estate, and such other distributees appeared at the time to have understood that she was entitled to one third of her husband's property, she is entitled to rescind such agreement, she having acted immediately on ascertaining her rights, before any change has occurred in the situation of the parties. Griffing v. Gislason, 21 S. D. 56, 109 N. W. 646.

So, where a favorite son took advantage of his mother's affection, and induced her to make a conveyance of all her estate to him upon the assurance of the son that the deed was in the nature of a will, and would not take effect in her lifetime, the mother being at the time over seventy years of age and greatly weakened in body and mind, and the paper was handed to the son to be placed with her papers, and after recovery she destroyed the deed, equity will not interfere to compel her to re-execute it. Sands v. Sands, 112 Ill. 225.

And where the mother acted under the assurance and belief that the deed would not take effect until recorded, and the grantee agreed not to procure the same to be recorded during her life, the deed does not take effect as to the grantee, and the grantor has a right to destroy it at pleasure. Ibid.

So, if a father making a grant to his children was induced by the grantees to omit from the deed a clause showing that it was to take effect only after his death, and was led to believe that the oral understanding would have the same effect to protect him in his possession during his life that the omitted clause would have had, the grantees will not be permitted to take advantage of the grantor's failure to insert the clause. Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665.

And where a deaf and aged father made a deed to his son, in whom he reposed confidence, conveying a tract of land in fee, but omitting, either by the mistake or contrivance of the son, under whose direction the deed was drawn, to reserve a life estate to the grantor, an equity arises in favor of the father to have such instrument reformed in accordance with the original intention of the parties. Day v. Day, 84 N. C. 408.

So, where a woman by importunity and misrepresentation obtained a deed from her daughter, who at the time was only seventeen years old, and, though recently married, still lived with her mother, and the deed was made by the daughter in entire ignorance of her rights, it will not be allowed to stand. Baldock v. Johnson, 14 Or. 542, 13 Pac. 434.

And a deed of land obtained by a father from his daughters by misrepresentation and undue influence, whereby the fee was conveyed, instead of a life estate as the daughters intended, is reformable in equity; and a purchaser from the father with notice will be enjoined, after the death of the father, from claiming title thereunder. Bailey v. Woodbury, 50 Vt. 166.

And equity will set aside a deed from a single woman to her grandfather, creating an irrevocable separate use for the grantor, when it was not executed in contemplation of marriage, nor with the intent to make an irrevocable gift, but upon an assurance by the grandfather and mother that it could be revoked, and without the advice of counsel upon the point, the only purpose of execution having been accomplished. Bristor v. Tasker, 135 Pa. 110, 20 Am. St. Rep. 853, 19 Atl. 851.

Nor will a conveyance by an eldest son to his brothers, of his interest in the estate of their father, for an inadequate consideration, be permitted to stand, where he was ignorant of his rights, and there was an absence of full and free disclosure of all the material facts known to the brothers, the eldest son being under pecuniary pressure and without proper legal advice. Sturge v. Sturge, 12 Beav. 229.

And where a person died intestate, having considerable real estate, and leaving two persons his coheirresses at law, both of whom were advanced in years and illiterate; and a third person, ascertaining the heirship of the coheirresses, induced them to sign an agreement whereby, in consideration of his revealing to them the existence of the property and their title to it, of which they were unaware, they agreed to give him half of the net amount of the property, which property was in the hands of a public trustee of another country; and the title of the coheirresses was clear, and no litigation was contemplated,—the agreement will be set aside as an improvident bargain obtained by taking an unfair advantage of the coheirresses' position. Rees v. De Bernardy [1896] 2 Ch. 437.

And where a daughter accepted a large legacy left her by her father, who recommended to her to release her right to her orphanage part, which she did release accordingly, the orphanage part being much more than the legacy, though she was told she might elect which she pleased to take, yet if she did not know she had a right first to inquire into the value of the personal estate and the quantity of her orphanage right before she made her election, she may avoid her release. Pusey v. Desbourrie, 3 P. Wms. 315, 10 Eng. Rul. Cas. 351.

So, an account between an aged tenant for life and the remainderman, who was also executor, which was settled and signed by the tenant for life under the advice of her solicitor, will be set aside on the ground of the executor not having furnished full information, and of the account being founded on an erroneous opinion of counsel as to the rights of the parties, obtained ex parte by the executor, and of the account being complicated in its form, and, though professing to be made in conformity with the opinion, yet containing an addition of a purchase and sale between the parties. Pickering v. Pickering, 2 Beav. 31, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 37.

And where an executor, supposing a person to be entitled to a legacy under the will of which he was the executor, paid the sum to such person out of the deceased's estate, in the presence of the legatee's husband, with his consent, when the legatee was not in truth entitled to such legacy under the will, which was known to her husband at the time of the payment, but was not disclosed to the executor, the husband of the legatee, who received the money, had no moral or conscientious right to retain it, and the executor was entitled to recover it back in an action against him for the recovery of money paid under mistake. Northrop v. Graves, 19 Conn. 548, 50 Am. Dec. 264.

So, a sale of an annuity by an attorney to his client may be set aside, where the client was a widow seventy years of age, and the attorney lived in the same place, and failed to use reasonable diligence to see that she thoroughly understood the situation. Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. Jr. 266.

And where a woman who was unacquainted with business was dealing not at arms' length with persons who were business men aided by legal counsel, who misrepresented matters to her, and she, under the mistaken belief that her premises were subject to certain mortgages, and that she was without remedy, signed a deed for the property under protest, and acknowledged it unwillingly, equity will relieve against such deed. Toland v. Corey, 6 Utah, 392, 24 Pac. 190.

. And a deed for land obtained from a person who was old and infirm, but had mental capacity sufficient to make a deed, through fraud and concealment of material facts, known to the grantee, respecting the effect of the deed and the nature of the title sought, will be set aside at the suit of the one thus defrauded, although part of the interest thus acquired was subsequently reconveyed and accepted by her while still ignorant of the facts relating to her title and the effect of such prior and subsequent deeds. Tolley v. Poteet, 62 W. Va. 231, 57 S. E. 811.

And where a banking firm advanced money to a man, and took a promissory note for it, which was signed by the man and his wife, the wife having no separate property, and the man died insolvent, and shortly after his death one of the partners in the bank went to the widow and asked her if she could pay any money on account, and on her answering that she could not, obtained her signature to a new promissory note written by him, such note is invalid in equity, it being doubtful whether or not she knew that she was not liable upon the original note. Coward v. Hughes, 1 Kay & J. 443.

And where a man and woman engaged to marry each other entered into an antenuptial marriage contract whereby the man gave the woman a life estate in a house and lot worth $6,000; and the woman, in consideration thereof, relinquished all interest in the man's estate; and the man's attorney prepared the contract, the woman having no other adviser, and he undertook to explain the transaction to the woman, and her husband at the time of the contract and at his death had an estate of about $100,000; and she had $3,700 of personal estate which passed to the husband by virtue of the marriage; and there was no issue of the marriage; and she was not informed that her $3,700 became the property of her husband by virtue of the marriage,—the contract was based on an inadequate consideration, and entered into under mistake of both law and fact, and she was not bound by it. Spurlock v. Brown, 91 Tenn. 241, 18 S. W. 868.

So, where the legal title to property stands in the name of a wife, and the property is insured in her name, and the wife dies, and the husband and children continue to occupy the property, and the insurance is renewed, making it payable, as before, to the wife, the agent doing so inadvertently forgetting for the moment her death, and taking payment of premium from the husband, the husband supposing that that was the legal method of insurance, the policy will be reformed in equity so as to make it payable to the heirs at law of the deceased wife, and recovery can be had in equity, as part of the suit for reformation, in favor of such heirs at law. Taylor v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 44 Fla. 273, 32 So. 887.

And where the soliciting agent of a fire insurance company, having been previously informed by an applicant for insurance that the interest desired to be insured was that of the applicant as administratrix and of the heirs of a deceased person, by mistake wrote the application as for the administratrix alone, and the policy was so issued, and the applicant, being an illiterate woman and not accustomed to business, did not notice the mistake, the insurance company cannot avoid liability for such error of its agent by virtue of any clauses of limitation contained in the application; and the insured person is entitled to have the policy so reformed in equity as to cover the interests of the heirs of the deceased person. Jamison v. State Ins. Co. 85 Iowa, 229, 52 N. W. 185.

And where an applicant for insurance told the insurance agent that he wished to insure his life for the benefit of his wife, and the application was so filled out, but the agent, conceiving that the application made out in that way in the absence of the wife would be irregular, induced the insured to consent that the application might be rewritten and the policy made payable to himself, which was done, the agent assuring him that his wife would get the money under the second form of application as well as under the first, the chancellor had power, after his death, to correct the mistake and give the fund to the widow, as against his creditors. Welch v. Welch, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 639.

And where a mortgagee had insurance upon premises as mortgagee, and took another mortgage upon the same premises, and applied to the same insurance company for a renewal of the first policy, with an increase of insurance to the amount of both mortgages, and this was agreed to, and a new policy was issued containing a clause not in the first policy, to the effect that in case of loss the assured should assign to defendant all her right to receive satisfaction from any other person, and that the loss should not be payable until after the enforcement of the original security, and the insurance company should only be liable for so much as could not be collected, both mortgages containing the usual insurance clause, and it being agreed thereby that the mortgagors should pay the premiums and have the benefit of the policy on payment of the debt,—the policy is properly reformed by striking out the clause differing from the old policy, and enforced as reformed, since it was bad faith upon the part of the insurance company to change the terms of the renewal policy without notice. Hay v. Star F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 235, 33 Am. Rep. 607.

So, where the maker of a note secured by mortgage executed the same with the understanding, induced by representations of the payee's agent, that she was assuming no personal liability, the payee is not entitled, after foreclosing the mortgage, to enforce the note against the maker personally. Merchants' & F. Bank v. Cleland, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1169, 77 S. W. 176, 719.

And an instrument in the form of a promissory note, issued by a bank, with the corporate seal on its face, is a specialty; and an indorsement in blank by the payee does not make him liable as the indorser of a negotiable note; and where the payee of such a note indorsed in blank put it in the hands of his partner to obtain money upon it for the use of the firm, and the partner delivered the note to a money broker, who took it to a lender, and, being asked as to its value, pointed to the payee's indorsement, and assured the lender of his sufficiency, whereupon the lender discounted the note, the lender may recover back from the indorser the money paid to the broker. Frevall v. Fitch, 5 Whart. 325, 34 Am. Dec. 558.

So, where a grantor in a deed acts under a total misconception of his legal rights or the extent of his interest or estate in the thing granted, or where his confidence is imposed upon to his injury, and in other like cases, the lack of an adequate consideration will have a material bearing on the question whether the deed ought to stand or not. Baldock v. Johnson, 14 Or. 542, 13 Pac. 434.

And where the owner of a tract of land contracts in writing to sell and convey it, excepting and reserving a certain vein of coal, and subsequently executes a deed of general warranty thereof, without any reservation whatever, the grantee, by accepting the conveyance with knowledge of the error, perpetrates a fraud on the grantor, and equity will reform the deed so as to make it conform to the intentions of the parties as expressed in the contract. Cook v. Liston, 192 Pa. 19, 43 Atl. 389.

And where a bond was given for a lease for ninety-nine years of a tract of land granted to the lessor forever by grant which contained no words of inheritance, the grant being by virtue of a treaty between the United States and a tribe of Indians, and the lessor believed, or pretended to believe and so represented to the lessee at the time the lease was made, that he had an absolute estate in fee simple in the land, whereas he had only an estate for life, which was determined by his death, equity will enjoin an action against the lessee on the bond, and relieve against a judgment obtained thereon. Drew v. Clarke, Cooke (Tenn.) 374, 5 Am. Dec. 698.

And a contract for the rescission of a sale of land will not be required to be specifically performed, where the vendee had gone in under the deed and remained in possession for several years, and had been induced to rescind by doubts of the title fostered by the complainant in ignorance of the fact that the vendor was the owner of the moiety of the land as to which the title was in dispute, and the facts touching which were withheld by the complainant, the land having greatly depreciated in value between the dates of the purchase and the agreement to rescind. Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529, 42 Am. Dec. 447.

So, where a person agrees to give up his claim to property in favor of another, such renunciation will not be enforced if at the time of making it he was ignorant of his legal rights and of the value of the property renounced,—especially if the party with whom he dealt possessed and kept back from him better information on the subject. McCarthy v. Decaix, 2 Russ. & M. 614, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

There is no such relation of trust and confidence existing between a son-in-law and his mother-in-law, however, that in dealings between them the latter should be supposed to act upon the presumption that there would be no concealment of facts from her; and a court of equity cannot afford relief on the mere ground of such concealment, in the absence of anything to show that she acted on such presumption. Fish v. Cleland, 33 Ill. 243.

And where a widow owned a life estate in lands of her deceased husband, and he had several children who owned the remainder, and a proposition was made to purchase the widow's life estate, the owners of the remainder were under no obligation to disclose to her that they contemplated a partition and sale of the property, nor their estimate of the value of the life estate. Ibid.

And where there was a controversy as to title, and a judgment was obtained for trespass on the land with reference to which the controversy existed, and one of the parties to the controversy represented to the other that by reason of the covenants contained in his deed he was liable to pay the judgment, and the other party thereupon executed a bond to him for the payment of the same, the representation is not one which would warrant a court of equity in canceling the bond. Abbott v. Treat, 78 Me. 121, 3 Atl. 44.

So, where a person, having arrested his debtor on a ca. sa., sets him at liberty on agreed terms, no further execution of any sort can be issued; and an agreement having been drawn and signed by the plaintiff's own attorney, a learned and able counselor of law, a court of equity will not interpose to enjoin the defendant from pleading such discharge as payment, upon allegations in a bill demurred to, that there was either a mistake common to both parties as to the effect of the agreement, or else that the plaintiff not knowing its effect while the defendant did know it, it would be a fraud in the defendant now to profit by the plaintiff's misconception or ignorance of what he was doing. Magniac v. Thomson, 2 Wall. Jr. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 8957.

h. Effect of character of the act or instrument on reformability.

1. Void acts or instruments.

Where a contract is void at law for want of power to make it, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to enforce it, or, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, to so modify it as to make it legal, and then enforce it. Brazoria County v. Youngstown Bridge Co. 25 C. C. A. 306, 52 U. S. App. 6, 80 Fed. 10.

And a court of equity has never gone so far as to hold an act valid which the statute declares invalid, merely because it was done through ignorance or mistake of the law. Erwin v. Hamner, 27 Ala. 296.

And reformation of an assignment to make it conform to the laws of the state cannot be had, since if it does not conform to the laws of the state it is a mere nullity, and no contract. Stricker v. Tinkham, 35 Ga. 176, 89 Am. Dec. 280.

So, a nuncupative will rendered void by statute cannot be established in equity on the ground that the decedent was ignorant or mistaken as to the change of law made by the statute in this respect. Erwin v. Hamner, supra.

And the reformation of a mortgage seven months after an attempted sale, by a decree allowing a seal to be affixed, would not have the effect to give validity to a transaction originally void, and thereby to make the sale binding upon the purchaser. Springfield Five Cents Sav. Bank v. South Congregational Soc. 127 Mass. 516.

And where a bill in equity by a mortgagee for the reformation of the mortgage shows that the mortgage is tainted with usury, the complainant is not entitled to relief unless he offers to abate the whole interest. Hawkins v. Pearson, 96 Ala. 369, 11 So. 304.

And where an agreement is usurious, the fact that it recites that it was given to remove doubts as to the usurious character of a previous agreement between the parties does not authorize a reformation of such subsequent agreement for mutual mistake, so as to obviate its usurious features, in the absence of evidence of mistake in the terms of the agreement; mistake as to its effect being mistake of law only. Bexar Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Seebe (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 875.

So, a person purchasing county warrants which show on their face that they were issued in violation of law and do not constitute a charge on the treasury is presumed to know the law; and if there is no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the seller, the purchaser cannot recover from him the money paid. Christy v. Sullivan, 50 Cal. 337, 19 Am. Rep. 655.

And where a county judge entered into a contract for the purchase of a courthouse, which was within his power, but went beyond his authority in attempting to bind the county for a large indebtedness therefor, by negotiable securities running a series of years and paying an annual interest of 10 per cent, secured by coupons, it is not competent for the chancellor to enforce the contract so far as it is legal, ignoring the rest, since it cannot be so reformed without involving an important change in the terms of the contract. Casady v. Woodbury County, 13 Iowa, 113.

And where a banking association agreed to secure a party to whom it was under a legal liability, and for that purpose executed its promissory notes for the amount of the liability, in a form prohibited by law, and at the same time executed a trust deed of a portion of its effects, which on its face was declared to be collateral to the notes, but contained no reference to the original liability, in the absence of any allegation or proof of mistake in the deed, a court of equity cannot reform it so as to enable it to stand as security for the original liability. Leavitt v. Palmer, 3 N. Y. 19, 51 Am. Dec. 333.

Likewise, the maxim, Ignorance of law excuses no one, is applicable to purchasers of bonds void for some defect which is a matter of law unmixed with matter of fact. Rochester v. Alfred Bank, 13 Wis. 433, 80 Am. Dec. 746.

And a person who, through a mistake of law, acknowledges himself under an obligation which the law does not impose upon him, is not bound thereby. Warder v. Tucker, 7 Mass. 449, 5 Am. Dec. 62.

And a deed which is a nullity will not be reformed so as to give it effect. Powell v. Morisey, 98 N. C. 426, 2 Am. St. Rep. 343, 4 S. E. 185.

So, a mistake as to the existence or identity of the subject-matter of a contract is fatal to the contract itself, because of the mutual assent necessary to its creation; but to produce this result the mistake must be one which affects the existence or identity of the thing sold. Hecht v. Batcheller, 147 Mass. 335, 9 Am. St. Rep. 708, 17 N. E. 651.

And a mortgage of part of a particular tract of land, specifying the quantity, but not the particular part conveyed, and not referring to any matter or thing by which it can be identified, is void for uncertainty; and, in the absence of fraud, an agreement and understanding between the parties, of the particular part intended, and an understanding as to the reasons for not describing it in the mortgage, do not authorize the reformation and enforcement of the instrument in equity. Freed v. Brown, 41 Ark. 495.

And a deed of settlement of land on a wife by her husband, in which no boundaries are given, and no landmarks, natural or artificial, are mentioned, will not be reformed in equity as against a subsequent purchaser for value. Adams v. Edgerton, 48 Ark. 419, 3 S. W. 628.

So, while if a draftsman in preparing a deed makes a mistake and omits some portion of the contract of the parties, or by mistake inserts into it some matter which was not a part of the agreement as made by the parties, rendering the agreement variant from the contract they designed and supposed they had executed, a court of equity, on a proper case, has power to reform it and enforce it as it was designed to be executed,—if, in an attempt to convey lands, the description employed is such that the premises cannot be found and identified, or if the description calls for subject-matter having no existence, the contract must be regarded as void, and courts cannot admit extraneous evidence to explain the intention of the parties. Carter v. Barnes, 26 Ill. 454.

And where the owner of land, being involved in debt, persuaded another to receive a deed thereof and give his negotiable promissory note therefor, assuring him that payment of such note should never be enforced, and that as soon as a purchaser could be found the note should be given up on the reconveyance of the estate; and, being wholly innocent of any fraudulent or sinister design in the transaction, and desirous only of aiding the owner, the purchaser received the deed and gave his note,—the arrangement is fraudulent as to creditors, and neither of them can be permitted to allege such fraud as a ground of relief from it; and, as between them, the parol agreement could no more be received to destroy the effect of the deed and note, in equity than in law. Bryant v. Mansfield, 22 Me. 360.

Nor can parties by agreement convert a judgment into a personal mortgage or a bill of sale, or give it any greater effect than the law gives to it; and a parol agreement that a judgment shall be a lien upon all the debtor's personal property will not be enforced in equity, even as against subsequent assignees who assented to the arrangement. Lanning v. Carpenter, 48 N. Y. 408.

And oral evidence that an instrument purporting to be an agreement between a husband and wife was signed by both, with the understanding that they were not legally bound thereby, is admissible in equity to show that the instrument should not be given any effect. Earle v. Rice, 111 Mass. 17.

So, a purchaser under a decree in foreclosure may petition to be released from his purchase or that the sale be set aside, where it has been subsequently discovered that the court rendering the decree had not acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of persons having interests in the property, or that, for other reasons, the estate directed to be sold would not pass. Boggs v. Fowler, 16 Cal. 559, 76 Am. Dec. 561.

Where, however, a person under a mistake of law was induced to enter into a contract fixing the price of a patented article manufactured under licenses alleged to be in violation of the Sherman anti-trust law, and the defendant sought to hold the complainant thereto, the complainant is entitled to sue in equity for a cancellation of the contract, though he could plead its illegality as a defense to an attempt by defendant to enforce it as to him, as such defense would not relieve him from the pains and penalties provided by that law. Chalmers Chemical Co. v. Chadeloid Chemical Co. 175 Fed. 995.

And equity will sustain an executed sale of a school-house site to a district by one of its directors, after large expenditures by the district in improving the property, even though such sale was unlawful while executory only. Rich v. School Trustees, 158 Ill. 242, 41 N. E. 924.

So, a mortgage on real estate, made by an agent for his principal, though inoperative at law for want of a formal execution in the name of the principal, is binding in equity if the attorney had authority and a failure to execute in the name of the principal resulted from accident or mistake, and will be enforced against the principal and subsequent lien creditors and subsequent purchasers with notice, no reformation being necessary, and it being immaterial whether the mistake in the execution was one of law or of fact. Love v. Sierra Nevada Lake Water & Min. Co. 32 Cal. 639, 91 Am. Dec. 602.

And where one person executed a deed of trust in favor of another to secure payment of a debt, and it was agreed between them that, in order to avoid a sale, the creditor should take the property bound, upon an agreed valuation, and the debtor delivered the property, and executed a deed to the land, which was his homestead, and afterwards refused to surrender possession, claiming that the last deed was void by reason of the failure of his wife to join in it, the creditor is entitled to have the trust deed restored, the debtor having failed to effectuate and perform his agreement to satisfy it by making a good and valid deed to the lands conveyed. Sparks v. Pittman, 51 Miss. 511.

And promissory notes cannot be defended against for failure of consideration for the reason that the notes were given for exclusive ferry rights which the payee held under a city ordinance which proved, upon judicial determination, not to be within the power of the city corporation, since the mistake of the vendor and vendee was with regard to the general law of the land. Carpentier v. Minturn, 6 Lans. 56.

So, the failure to insert the name of the trustee in a deed of trust, when in other respects the instrument is complete, although at law it makes the deed inoperative, does not wholly vitiate it; the deed will nevertheless be regarded as an equitable mortgage, and will create a lien for the benefit of the creditor, which may be enforced in equity. McQuie v. Peay, 58 Mo. 56.

And a deed of trust proper in form and acknowledged before the proper officer as the act and deed of the grantor, but lacking his signature, which was omitted by mistake, may be regarded as an equitable mortgage, and enforced accordingly against the lien of a judgment creditor, subsequently acquired. Martin v. Nixon, 92 Mo. 26, 4 S. W. 503.

And a deed, the execution of which was omitted by mistake, may be corrected in a court of equity; and it follows that the grantor can remedy the defect by a deed of correction filed for record before the levy of execution against him and a purchase thereunder, under which the creditor claims. Ibid.

So, where a bond executed by principal and sureties was intended by them to be a good and valid bond, but through a mistake it was rendered void at law, the bond may be set up by the court, and the sureties held liable under it on the ground that it was a clear mistake in a matter of fact. Butler v. Durham, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 589.

And where a guardian gave a bond with sureties, and he and his sureties intended to execute a guardian's bond in such form and substance as would be good at law, though this was denied by the sureties, and the bond drawn was, through mistake or ignorance of the clerk, a nullity, this is a mistake of fact, and not of law; and the ward, for whose benefit the bond was intended to be taken, has a right to call, in a court of equity, upon those who signed as sureties, as well as upon the principal, and make them answerable for whatever may appear to be due the ward on a settlement of the guardian's accounts, to the same extent to which they would have been liable at law if the bond had been good and available. Armistead v. Bozman, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 117.

So, a mistake as to the value or quantity of property sold, or other collateral attributes, as distinct from a mistake as to the existence or identity thereof, is not sufficient to warrant the correction of the contract, if the thing delivered is existent and the identical thing in kind is delivered. Hecht v. Batcheller, 147 Mass. 335, 9 Am. St. Rep. 708, 17 N. E. 651.

And a mistake as to the solvency of the maker of a note sold affects its value, and not its identity, and does not furnish ground for relief in equity; and though the maker has made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, the subject-matter remains the same as before, and the sale is valid. Ibid.

So, where a single woman as guardian had trust funds in possession, and afterwards conveyed her real estate to a trustee to manage for her use and benefit, paying over to her the net proceeds, who, after accepting the conveyance, died, and his sons as his administrators, in mistake of their duty as such, executed their bond to the ward for the amount due by the guardian, their mistake in the execution of the bond is relievable in equity, and the mistake may be proven, and the fact that the bond was given without consideration, and that there was nothing due to her on their individual account. Gross v. Leber, 47 Pa. 520.

And where the creditor of an individual partner appropriated in part payment of his claim a balance due from himself to that partner's firm, but by garnishment was compelled to pay the amount so appropriated to a creditor of the firm, a compromise settlement pending the garnishment, made in the belief that the appropriation was valid, will not be set aside on the ground of mistake, upon the appropriation being afterwards decided invalid, there being no element of deception by misrepresentation, or other fraud, or any mistake as to the facts. Allen v. Galloway, 30 Fed. 466.

So, an instrument may be reformed in equity, although the contract contained in it would be invalid if not in writing. Prior v. Williams, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 624.

2. Voluntary acts or instruments.

The absolute rule has been asserted and is well supported, that equity will not relieve against defects or mistakes in a voluntary conveyance or contract, or one made without consideration; to entitle a plaintiff to relief he must stand in the position of a purchaser for value. Doe v. Doe, 37 N. H. 268; Dickinson v. Glenney, 27 Conn. 104; Wyche v. Greene, 16 Ga. 57; Baker v. Pyatt, 108 Ind. 61, 9 N. E. 112; Anderson v. Green, 7 J. J. Marsh. 448, 23 Am. Dec. 417; Powell v. Morisey, 98 N. C. 426, 2 Am. St. Rep. 343, 4 S. E. 185; Dawson v. Dawson, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 93, 18 Am. Dec. 573; Stone v. King, 7 R. I. 358, 84 Am. Dec. 557; White v. Campbell, 80 Va. 180.

Within this rule to entitle a person to a decree reforming a contract for the conveyance of real estate, where the defect in the conveyance consisted in the want of a statutory requirement, which renders it wholly void, it must appear upon the bill and by the proof that there was an agreement to convey for a valuable consideration. Doe v. Doe, supra.

And equity will not correct a mistake in a voluntary deed by inserting therein the word "heirs," which was omitted by the inadvertence of the draftsman. Powell v. Morisey, supra.

Nor will a court of equity, in the correction of mistakes in written instruments, aid one volunteer against another. Wyche v. Greene, supra.

And equity will not relieve from a mistake when it was not one as to the party with whom the contract was made, but as to a third party not directly concerned with the making of the contract, but who was to be a beneficiary thereof, as a matter of gratuity on the part of the real purchaser. Langley v. Kesler (Or.) 110 Pac. 401.

And where land was purchased with the intent to take a deed to the grantee and his wife, making the wife a gratuitous beneficiary of the purchase by having the title conveyed so as to create an estate by the entirety, but the husband failed or neglected to carry out such proposition, and took title in his own name, the wife is not invested with an equitable right to enforce a reformation of the deed as against either the grantors or her husband. Ibid.

But on a transfer without consideration, if the legal conveyance be effectually made, the court will protect all equitable interests and enforce all equitable rights and duties under it as promptly and completely as if made with consideration. Stone v. King and Dawson v. Dawson, supra.

And on a bill filed to reform a voluntary deed on the ground of mistake, in which the dispute was between those claiming under the deed, the grantor being indifferent, the rule in equity that a deed will not be reformed at the instance of mere volunteers does not apply. Adair v. McDonald, 42 Ga. 506.

And a voluntary bond from a father to his son for the conveyance of land will in some instances be specifically enforced; and a bond given by a father to his son, who subsequently married, the assent to such marriage being induced by the fact that the bond had been given to the son, and which bond was, subsequent to the marriage, transferred to a vendee for value, is founded upon a valuable consideration, so that it cannot be avoided by a subsequent purchaser of the land from the father with notice of the bond. Anderson v. Green, supra.

So, a pre-existing debt is sufficient consideration for a mortgage to entitle the mortgagee to correction of a mutual mistake therein, as against the mortgagor and a subsequent purchaser with notice. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Judy, 146 Ind. 322, 43 N. E. 259.

And the existence of antecedent debts is a valuable consideration for the conveyance or assignment of property to secure the payment of the debts, and the trustee and creditors are purchasers for a valuable consideration; and in such case the trustee and creditors are not in any manner liable to the grantor in trust on account of mistake in quantity, and the grantor has no right as against them to rescission or compensation, to which his vendor may be substituted. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

So, a deed of conveyance founded upon a consideration to be paid to a third party therein named, and for labor expended on the premises conveyed, and for care and support of the grantor, is not an involuntary instrument, and mistakes in its execution may be corrected by a court of equity. Pinkham v. Pinkham, 60 Neb. 600, 83 N. W. 837.

Nor is a bond executed to the selectmen of a town and their successors in office, by a collector of town taxes, to secure the town from loss by any unfaithfulness in the official duty of the collector, regarded in chancery as a voluntary agreement not correctable in equity, but as founded upon a sufficient consideration, and not illegal or opposed to sound policy. Montville v. Haughton, 7 Conn. 543.

And a conveyance reciting a consideration of natural love and affection may be reformed so as to show a valuable consideration, such as the payment of an antecedent debt, on a cross bill in a cause instituted by creditors to cancel the conveyance as voluntary and fraudulent. Orr v. Echols, 119 Ala. 340, 24 So. 357.

So, a deed made by a father to his son in consideration of services rendered and love and affection is not purely voluntary, and may be reformed. Baker v. Pyatt, supra.

And a complaint to reform a deed made to the plaintiff by his father, which alleges that the consideration was love and affection and a specified sum of money, is sufficient on demurrer as showing a conveyance upon a valuable consideration. Ibid.

And a complaint to reform a deed made by a husband to his wife through a third person, for a past consideration of $1,000, is sufficient on demurrer as showing a conveyance upon a valuable consideration. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Comstock v. Coon, 135 Ind. 640, 35 N. E. 909.

The rule has been asserted and extensively acted upon, however, that a court of equity has jurisdiction in a proper case to reform or rectify a voluntary settlement, as well as a settlement for value. Bonhole v. Henderson [1895] 1 Ch. 742, appeal dismissed in [1895] 2 Ch. 202.

Under this rule, a deed of gift, when it is clearly shown that it does not conform to the intention of the donor, or was executed under a material misapprehension as to its effect, will be set aside in equity. Meeks v. Stillwell, 54 Ohio St. 541, 44 N. E. 267; Mulock v. Mulock, 31 N. J. Eq. 594; Matteson v. Johnston, 124 N. Y. Supp. 185.

And this is so, even in a case free from actual fraud. Mulock v. Mulock, supra.

And where a grantee is a volunteer, the donor who has conveyed a tract of land to her by deed may correct a mistake in such deed, if it be clearly shown, although the grantee may not have been cognizant of the mistake at the time of the conveyance. Crockett v. Crockett, 73 Ga. 647.

And where one person conveyed land to another for the purpose of opening a street in a city, and there was no other consideration for the conveyance but the benefit which the grantor was to derive from the opening of the street, and by subsequent events beyond the control of both parties the street could not be opened, a reconveyance of the land was decreed. Quick v. Stuyvesant, 2 Paige, 84.

So, the rule that a deed drawn by mistake for a different interest from that intended to be conveyed may be corrected applies to a deed of gift. Andrews v. Andrews, 12 Ind. 348.

And a voluntary deed of trust, executed under the supposition that it was revocable, and intended to be so, but reserving no power of revocation, and otherwise unadvised, improvident, and contrary to the intention of the parties, will be set aside in equity. Garnsey v. Mundy, 24 N. J. Eq. 243; Kleeman v. Peltzer, 17 Neb. 381, 22 N. W. 793.

And where a tenant in common of slaves voluntarily conveyed all of a particular kind which might fall to his share upon a division, and then fraudulently contrived that none of that kind should be allotted to him, a division made with this fraudulent intent is inconsistent with the rights vested in the donees, and will be remedied. Dawson v. Dawson, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 93, 18 Am. Dec. 573.

Nor is a mistake on the part of a donor in making a gift, in giving more than she intended at the time, insufficient to justify a decree of reformation. Schrieber v. Goldsmith, 39 Misc. 381, 79 N. Y. Supp. 846.

So, a son who occupies toward his mother a position of trust and confidence is bound, if his mother desires to make a deed of gift to him of a large part of her estate, to see that the deed in all substantial particulars conforms to her intention, and that she fully understands its nature and effect; otherwise the deed will be set aside. Mulock v. Mulock, supra.

And where a father makes a gratuitous distribution of some of his lands among his sons, and a mistake is made in the description of the land in the deed to one of them, on the question of correction of the mistake it is immaterial whether any consideration was paid to the father for the deed, or whether the conveyance was made in pursuance of a prior agreement; the case stands in this regard, at least so far as the other sons are concerned, who also received a portion of the father's estate at the same time, upon substantially the same principles as if the sons inherited the whole of the lands so distributed to them, and held them as tenants in common, and were undertaking to make amicable partition, and the same mistake had occurred. Cummings v. Freer, 26 Mich. 128.

And a deed from a husband to his wife is supported by a meritorious consideration, being a provision for her support, and not a gratuity, and is entitled to the protection of a court of equity; and where the land is susceptible of identification, the description will be so reformed as to convey the land actually intended to be conveyed by the deed. Partridge v. Partridge, 220 Mo. 321, 132 Am. St. Rep. 584, 119 S. W. 415.

So, where a woman to whom her mother owed no duty that she did not owe to her other children procured from her mother, without consideration, a deed alleged to have been intended as a conveyance of certain land owned by the mother, but which did not describe the land in question, and thus failed to operate as a legal conveyance of it, she was not, after the death of her mother, entitled to a decree in equity against the other heirs of her mother, reforming the deed so as to describe the land intended to be conveyed, but the other heirs were entitled to a decree quieting in them severally such interest in the land as they were entitled to by inheritance. Else v. Kennedy, 67 Iowa, 376, 25 N. W. 290.

And where in a deed given in consideration of love and affection only, a mistake in the description of the premises occurs, and the grantee, on the faith of such deed, has gone into possession, made improvements, and expended money on the lands, a mortgagee of such grantee, who has taken his mortgage in good faith after such possession and improvements, may maintain a bill for the correction of the mistake against the grantor or his heirs or purchasers from them without consideration; such mortgagee has the superior equity as against such grantor and his heirs, and especially as against parties who have assumed to take a conveyance from them without consideration and for the fraudulent purpose of defeating the mortgage. Cummings v. Freer, supra.

So, in a voluntary conveyance, courts will not distinguish between children and grandchildren, in the exercise of their equitable powers in correcting a plain mistake in a conveyance intended for their benefit; and this is especially so when the correction is made to render valid and effectual what would otherwise be void for informality. Huss v. Morris, 63 Pa. 367.

But a voluntary conveyance by a grandfather to a grandchild is not proof of his intention to place himself in loco parentis to the grantee, thus rendering the consideration a meritorious one and warranting a reformation of the deed. Powell v. Morisey, 98 N. C. 426, 2 Am. St. Rep. 343, 4 S. E. 185.

And a conveyance by an elderly man residing in the family of the grantee, by quitclaim deed, without valuable consideration, of his real estate, reserving to the grantor the use and improvement of the property during his natural life, and the right to dispose of any part thereof should it be necessary to his support, will not be reformed or set aside in equity on the ground of a mistake of the grantor as to its legal effect, without showing that he needs the avails of the property or some part of it for his support, since, until the exigency contemplated by the reservation has happened, the application for relief is premature. Coley v. Coley, 19 Conn. 114.

And where a father conveyed land to a married daughter in consideration of love and affection, and upon condition that, if she should die without children living at the time of her death, the land should revert to the grantor and his heirs as though no conveyance had been made; and the daughter died, leaving an infant child surviving her, who subsequently died, leaving his father heir to the property,—equity will not interfere, on a plea by the grandfather of the child against its father, that it was his intention in making the deed to his daughter that her husband should never in any event have any interest in or control over the property, and that the deed was executed by him with that understanding. Pierson v. Armstrong, 1 Iowa, 282, 63 Am. Dec. 440.

In the above case Evants v. Strode, 11 Ohio, 480, 38 Am. Dec. 744, supra, IV. c. 2, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the decree of the court below was that the conveyance should be by deed of warranty, and the purchaser had paid his money for the land, and there was a prior contract which was to be affected by the deed.

Equity will not reform a deed of gift, however, against the intention of the donor. Meeks v. Stillwell, 54 Ohio St. 541, 44 N. E. 267.

And a voluntary deed, without reservation or power to alter or revoke it, of either real or personal property, cannot be disturbed by the grantor, as against him it is valid and binding, both at law and in equity. Stone v. King, 7 R. I. 358, 84 Am. Dec. 557.

Nor will a court of equity set aside a voluntary conveyance on the application of the grantors, on the ground that they were ignorant as to what would be its legal effect and operation, and made a mistake in point of law. Dupre v. Thompson, 4 Barb. 279.

And as between a donor and one not sustaining to him any fiduciary or confidential relation, equity will not set aside a voluntary deed, however improvident its terms may be, if free from the imputation of fraud or undue influence, and if it was freely executed by the donor, with a knowledge of all the facts essential to a full and free exercise of his judgment. Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 665.

And a court of equity will hesitate to rectify a voluntary settlement at the instance of the settlor, merely on his own testimony as to his intention, unsupported by other evidence, such as written instructions, even though the rectification sought would bring the settlement more into harmony with recognized precedents and with what the settlor might reasonably have intended at the time. Bonhote v. Henderson [1895] 1 Ch. 742, appeal dismissed in [1895] 2 Ch. 202.

And a conveyance given for the purpose of putting property beyond the reach of creditors is fraudulent, and a court of equity will leave the parties where it finds them, and it will refuse the fraudulent grantor any relief founded on the idea that the grantee holds the property thus fraudulently conveyed in trust for his benefit; and no such trust will be recognized in equity for the purpose of working out a mistake to serve as the foundation for reforming a subsequent conveyance from the grantor to parties taking through the fraudulent grantee, without notice of the fraud, and holding the property fraudulently conveyed. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827.

So, a court of equity never lends its aid at the instance of the donee to reform a voluntary deed. Mulock v. Mulock, 31 N. J. Eq. 594; Gwyer v. Spaulding, 33 Neb. 573, 50 N. W. 681.

Courts of equity will not assist the grantee in an imperfect conveyance which is not supported by either a valuable or meritorious consideration, against either the grantor or his representatives. Else v. Kennedy, supra.

Nor will an error in the description of land in a voluntary conveyance be corrected in equity, unless all the parties consent. Shears v. Westover, 110 Mich. 505, 68 N. W. 266.

And it has been held that a voluntary deed cannot be corrected without the consent of all the parties to it. Redding v. Rozell, 59 Mich. 476, 26 N. W. 677.

And a voluntary settlement cannot be revoked or set aside, except upon proof of mental incapacity, mistake, fraud, or undue influence, unless it contains a power of revocation. Taylor v. Buttrick, 165 Mass. 547, 52 Am. St. Rep. 530, 43 N. E. 507.

Nor will equity correct a mistake in a voluntary deed, to the injury of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Kilpatrick v. Strozier, 67 Ga. 247.

So, on a bill to correct a mistake in a voluntary deed, the evidence must be clear, unequivocal, and decisive as to the mistake. Crockett v. Crockett, 73 Ga. 647.

But to warrant the correction of a mistake in a voluntary deed, it is not required that the evidence must be so strong as to leave no reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to whether or not it was a mistake. This is the rule in criminal cases, before a jury are authorized to convict. Ibid.

And it is sufficient to entitle a person claiming under a deed of gift to have it reformed, if he accepted it as it was understood and intended to be drawn at the time it was executed; it is not necessary that the donee should be cognizant of the instructions given to the scrivener by the donor. Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 159.

Where there is no actual fraud and no confidential or fiduciary relations between the parties to a contract, however, mere inadequacy of consideration is not sufficient to rescind a sale, unless it be so great as to shock the moral sense of mankind. Pennybacker v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 624, 11 S. E. 39.

And an inadequacy of consideration which will warrant the rescinding of a sale must be established as of the date of the contract; none can be considered which may arise from subsequent enhancement, depreciation, or change of circumstances. Ibid.

And with reference to contracts of hazard, the factor of risk and hazard is such a disturbing element in the estimation of value that courts of equity, when inadequacy alone is in question, will refuse to interfere. Ibid.

3. Wills.

The broad rule has been asserted that equity has jurisdiction as to mistakes, as well in regard to wills as other matters. Wood v. White, 32 Me. 340, 52 Am. Dec. 654.

Within this rule, equity has power to correct, and will correct, a mistake in the name of a legatee in a will. Ibid.

And equity has jurisdiction to correct a mistake in the description of land devised by will. Thomson v. Thomson, 115 Mo. 56, 21 S. W. 1085, 1128.

And where a testator devised lot 6 in a certain block to a brother, and disposed of the remainder of his estate to others, and it appeared that he did not own lot 6, but did own lot 3 in said block, and that lot 3 was otherwise properly described in the will, it was held to have been a lawful devise of lot 3. Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 210, 29 L. ed. 860, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617, 810.

So, devises concerning land must be in writing, but in case of a surrender made by a steward of a copyhold, if there be any mistake there, that is only matter of fact; and the courts at law will in that case admit an averment that there was a mistake either in the lands or uses. Towers v. Moor, 2 Vern. 98.

So, relief may, in a plain case of mistake in the description of land devised by will, be obtained without resort to equity. Thomson v. Thomson, supra.

And where a paper was executed by a person who had a perfect legal right to dispose of her property, and intended to do so, but by a mistake of the scrivener it was drawn in the form of a will, when it ought to have been a deed or declaration of trust, a court of equity has power to correct the mistake, reform the instrument, and decree it to be made such as it ought to have been made, so as effectually to carry out the intention of the parties. Lant's Appeal, 95 Pa. 279, 40 Am. Rep. 646.

But to authorize a correction of a mistake in the description of land devised by will in equity, the mistake must have been a clear one, or a clear omission, demonstrable from the structure and scope of the will itself. Ibid.

And where legacies are given upon trust to accumulate the interest and dividends, such accumulated interest and dividends will not pass by a gift over of the principal sums, unless the court is satisfied, by a reference to other clauses of the will, that the interest and dividends were omitted in the gift by a clerical mistake. Harvey v. Cooke, 4 Russ. Ch. 34.

The prevailing rule would seem to be, however, that a will cannot be corrected because the testator misapprehended its effect. Arthur v. Arthur, 10 Barb. 9.

And that equity will not entertain a bill to reform a will. Bingel v. Volz, 142 Ill. 214, 16 L.R.A. 321, 34 Am. St. Rep. 64, 31 N. E. 13; Goode v. Goode, 22 Mo. 518, 66 Am. Dec. 630; Box v. Barrett, L. R. 3 Eq. 244; Newburgh v. Newburgh, 5 Madd. Ch. 364.

No court can decree the reformation and correction of a will to make it conform to the purpose and intention of the testator not expressed in the instrument as executed by him, after the statutory limitation for the probate of a will has expired, thereby barring a contest; the only question remaining open is that of the true construction of the instrument. Schlottman v. Hoffman, 73 Miss. 188, 55 Am. St. Rep. 527, 18 So. 893.

And where there is no latent ambiguity in wills, extrinsic evidence cannot be received to show intentions not expressed in them. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 20 S. C. 317; Meckley's Estate, 20 Pa. 478.

Nor, as a general rule, is parol evidence admissible to supply omissions, or to control or explain the intention, or to vary the legal construction. Arthur v. Arthur, supra.

Within this rule, a court of equity has no power to reform a will devising real estate. Chambers v. Watson, 56 Iowa, 676, 10 N. W. 239.

And when a testator devises land which he does not own, accurately describing it, a bill in equity will not lie to construe the will on the ground of mistake, and to substitute another tract of land owned by the testator, in place of the one devised. Bingel v. Volz, supra.

Nor can a devise of land be explained by parol proof touching the declarations of the testator, or instructions given by him for the making of his will; and parol proof cannot be admitted to explain a surrender of copyhold land, to show a mistake either in the land or the uses. Towers v. Moor, supra.

And canceling a former will by mistake, or on a presumption that a later will is good which proves void, will not let in the heir. Onions v. Tyrer, 1 P. Wms. 343.

And when an election is once made under a will, by a party bound to elect either expressly or impliedly, with full knowledge of all the facts, it binds him and those who claim under him, though made in ignorance of law. Waggoner v. Waggoner (Va.) 68 S. E. 990.

So, where a testator devised certain lands to his widow for her own use during her natural life, and on her death to be divided, share and share alike, between his surviving children, and a son of the testator died only a few months before him, leaving children surviving him, the testator being then too ill to change his will, the court is not authorized to let in such children on the ground of mistake. Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450, 2 S. E. 474.

But when one is required to make an election between the provision of a will and the provision made by the law of descent, he is entitled to know all the facts and circumstances affecting his choice, and to inquire into and ascertain all the circumstances; and if the election is made in ignorance, or under a mistake as to the real nature of the properties, or as to the nature of his own rights, such a mistake is regarded as one of fact, rather than of law; and a court of equity will permit the election to be revoked, unless rights of third persons have intervened, which would be interfered with by the revocation. Tolley v. Poteet, 62 W. Va. 231, 57 S. E. 811.

And where a testator directed that out of a certain portion of his real estate absolutely devised to his three children, his widow's life estate of one third of his whole property should be allotted by certain commissioners to be appointed by the orphans' court, and the other portion so devised to be divided among his said children; and the commissioners, intending under their apportionment to carry into effect the directions and wishes of the widow and children, erroneously and contrary to the directions of the will, made one lot subject to the widow's life estate, and assigned a lot intended by the parties for one to another of the devisees, a court of chancery may correct the error, reform the award, and make it conform to the direction of the parties, and decree that the parties shall account for rents and profits received under the erroneous award. Baynard v. Norris, 5 Gill, 468, 46 Am. Dec. 647.

So, where one elects to take under a will, under a misconception of fact as to his rights under the will, the election will be disregarded, when the other parties affected by such election can be placed substantially in the same situation as if there had been no election. Waggoner v. Waggoner, supra.

And where a testator and his wife each owned an undivided half interest in the homestead property, and he devised the whole to her, she made no irrevocable election to take under the will, where there was no express election, and it did not appear that she knew that, in claiming the devise, she might surrender her own interest in the property, or that she intended to do so. Ibid.

4. Contracts with reference to homesteads.

A contract for the sale of a homestead, not containing a release of the right of homestead and the acknowledgment required by law for the transfer of a homestead, has no validity; and a court of equity has no power to reform such a contract by the insertion therein of a release of that right and an acknowledgment; it cannot give life to an instrument having no validity in itself. Stodalka v. Novotny, 144 Ill. 125, 33 N. E. 534.

Nor can the court specifically enforce such a contract by reforming it in accordance with the verbal contract, although the omission of such release and acknowledgment may be the result of mistake or ignorance of the officer drafting the same. Ibid.

And a conveyance of the homestead by a husband and wife, the certificate of acknowledgment to which is substantially defective, will not be reformed in equity on the ground that the examination and acknowledgment of the wife were in fact properly made, but that this fact was not shown by the officer's certificate, owing to ignorance or mistake on his part; nor will it be specifically enforced as an executory agreement to convey. Cox v. Holcomb, 87 Ala. 589, 13 Am. St. Rep. 79, 6 So. 309.

Nor will a court of equity reform a deed purporting to convey all of a wife's interest in a homestead estate, so that it will convey her life interest therein, where she fails to show by unequivocal evidence that she intended to convey only her life interest. Frederick v. Henderson, 94 Mo. 98, 7 S. W. 186.

And since the Georgia act of December 12, 1871, to provide for sales of property in the state to secure liens and other debts, a court of equity cannot reform an absolute deed executed under that act into a mortgage, for the purpose of protecting the wife's homestead, upon the allegation that such instrument was intended as a mortgage, was so understood by her and her husband, and that upon this understanding she gave her consent to its execution. Barnett v. People's Bank, 65 Ga. 51.

So, a mortgage will not be reformed so as to include the homestead of the mortgagors, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

though such homestead was intended to be embraced in it, if the statute of the state declares that no mortgage of a homestead by a married man shall be valid or of any effect without the signature of his wife to the same, though before suit was brought the husband had died, and the widow by her answer assented to such reformation. O'Malley v. Ruddy, 79 Wis. 147, 24 Am. St. Rep. 702, 48 N. W. 116.

And equity will not reform a mortgage on community property executed by a husband, in an action by the mortgagee against the wife, who has filed a declaration of homestead on such property, where the wife had no notice of the defective mortgage at the time of the filing of such declaration of homestead. Adams v. Baker, 24 Nev. 162, 77 Am. St. Rep. 799, 51 Pac. 252.

And where a mortgage on land of a married man, executed by him and his wife, and taken by the mortgagee as security for moneys loaned to the husband, with the understanding and belief of all parties that it was a mortgage of the homestead, was found to be of other lands only, the instrument could not be reformed as against the wife after the husband's death, when the homestead had descended or been devised to her, and it would not have been reformed, even as against the husband in his lifetime, since by the statute it would have been void without the wife's signature. Petesich v. Hambach, 48 Wis. 443, 4 N. W. 565.

So, if a mortgagor and mortgagee of a homestead mortgaged for money with which to pay off a prior mortgage labored under a mutual mistake in supposing that the homestead belonged to the mortgagor in fee under her husband's will, to the exclusion of the minor children, equity will not grant relief by subrogating such mortgagee to the rights of the prior mortgagee. Kleimann v. Gieselmann, 114 Mo. 437, 35 Am. St. Rep. 761, 21 S. W. 796.

And where a widow gave a deed of trust on premises she was occupying, to secure a debt due from her brother and son-in-law, and the lot was sold for the debt, she is entitled to show, in an action against her to try title, that she was induced to make the deed by the fraudulent representations of the agent of the creditors, who was an attorney, and that he assured her that the deed was a mere matter of form, and that she incurred no risk, since the lot was protected as her homestead, and that the creditors could not, if they would, sell it for the debt; and this would be sufficient to support a prayer for relief. Ramey v. Allison, 64 Tex. 697.

Where a husband and wife own land in common constituting their homestead, however, the fact that the wife was ignorant of her interest as part owner is immaterial as respects the right of a purchaser to reform a conveyance from them, where it appears that full value was paid by the purchaser, and the conveyance was executed with proper formalities to pass her interest. Parker v. Parker, 88 Ala. 362, 16 Am. St. Rep. 52, 6 So. 740.

And equity will correct a mutual mistake in the description in a written instrument by which a man and wife have sought to encumber their homestead. Silliman v. Taylor, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 490, 80 S. W. 651; Parker v. Parker, supra; Conrad v. Schwamb, 53 Wis. 372, 10 N. W. 395.

If the quantity of land conveyed is not thereby increased. Witherington v. Mason, 86 Ala. 345, 11 Am. St. Rep. 41, 5 So. 679; Gardner v. Moore, 75 Ala. 394, 51 Am. Rep. 454; Snell v. Snell, 123 Ill. 403, 5 Am. St. Rep. 526, 14 N. E. 684.

And this is so, although the homestead belonged to them as tenants in common. Parker v. Parker, supra.

In such case the deed will be treated as an executory contract by the husband to convey, which equity will enforce, after the homestead right ceases, against the husband, or against his heirs after his death intestate, though not against his widow. Conrad v. Schwamb, supra.

And a parol contract that a son who was the grantee in a deed of a homestead conveyed by his father alone was to support his parents during their life, and at their death become the owner of the land in fee, if fully performed by such son, may be specifically enforced by him against the heirs at law of the grantor. Whitmore v. Hay, 85 Wis. 240, 39 Am. St. Rep. 838, 55 N. W. 708.

And this is so, though a deed of a homestead made by a father alone to his son is void as a conveyance. Ibid.

So, where the purpose of an action and the effect of a judgment was merely to reform a deed from the defendant to the plaintiff, so as to convey an undivided half interest, instead of the whole, the effect of a decree of divorce between the plaintiff and defendant, regulating the rights of the parties in a homestead, and providing for a conveyance from the divorced husband to the divorced wife of an undivided half thereof, is not involved, and none of the rights of the parties under such decree of divorce are determined or affected by the judgment reforming the deed; and where the defendant in her answer claimed the whole of the property, she cannot complain of a judgment giving her an undivided half thereof. Holt v. Holt, 120 Cal. 67, 52 Pac. 119.

And if a husband and wife agreed to mortgage their homestead, and executed a mortgage which they knew did not include the whole thereof, but which they knew was accepted by the mortgagee in the belief that it included all such homestead, the mortgage may be reformed in equity so as to include all the land which was agreed to be mortgaged. Stevens v. Holman, 112 Cal. 345, 53 Am. St. Rep. 216, 44 Pac. 670.

And to entitle a mortgagee to relief, where the mortgagor has exempted a homestead from the mortgage, which was supposed by mistake to be his legal right, when in fact he was not entitled to it, he must allege and prove that all the land that was subject to the mortgage was intended to be mortgaged, and that, but for the mistaken belief that the homestead was not subject to the mortgage, it would have been included. Lear v. Prather, 89 Ky. 501, 12 S. W. 946.

So, where a man deeded his homestead farm, neither he nor the purchaser knowing its actual external limits, and the deed, through ignorance and misapprehension, included other small parcels of adjoining land, which, many years before, one of the owner's early predecessors in title had sold and conveyed, the mistake is one of fact, and, being mutual, the deed should be reformed. Andrews v. Andrews, 81 Me. 338, 17 Atl. 166.

And where a husband and wife executed a mortgage intending to cover 160 acres, but by mistake it was drawn to cover only 40 acres, and third persons purchased the land subject to the mortgage, understanding that it covered the whole 160 acres, and subsequently another person discovered the mistake, and procured a conveyance of a part of the land from the previous purchasers, the portion so conveyed including 40 acres which, when the mortgage was executed, was occupied by the mortgagors as a homestead, the last purchaser, who purchased with knowledge of the mistake and with intent to defraud, could not make the defense that the mortgage could not be so reformed as to cover the homestead, the wife not having actually signed the mortgage of it. Ford v. Daniells, 71 Mich. 77, 38 N. W. 708.

5. Contracts of married women.

The rule which, by creating an arbitrary disability, protects married women from the alienation of their real estate through the acts of coercion of their husbands, is founded on a policy which is respected by courts of chancery, and they refuse their aid when the defective deed sought to be reformed is that of a married woman and the defect arises from the omission of some statutory requisite. Dickinson v. Glenney, 27 Conn. 104; Holland v. Moon, 39 Ark. 120.

Contracts of married women, not made in the form prescribed by law, are absolutely void. Dickinson v. Glenney, supra; Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 13; Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 507; Williams v. Cudd, 26 S. C. 213, 4 Am. St. Rep. 714, 2 S. E. 14.

And where there is an omission of some statutory requirement in the deed of a married woman, essential to its validity, the mistake cannot be corrected by a court of equity. Gebb v. Rose, 40 Md. 387; Bowden v. Bland, 53 Ark. 53, 22 Am. St. Rep. 179, 13 S. W. 420; Barrett v. Tewksbury and Wedel v. Herman, supra; Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52; Moulton v. Hurd, 20 Ill. 137, 71 Am. Dec. 257; Hamar v. Medsker, 60 Ind. 413; Grapengether v. Fejervary, 9 Iowa, 163, 74 Am. Dec. 336; Townsley v. Chapin, 12 Allen, 476; Montana Nat. Bank v. Schmidt, 6 Mont. 609, 13 Pac. 382; Davenport v. Sovil, 6 Ohio

St. 459; Spencer v. Reese, 165 Pa. 158, 30 Atl. 722.

And chancery will not regard a defective deed of a married woman as an executory contract, and look through it at the contract behind it. Dickinson v. Glenney, supra.

And this is so, although the woman's husband orally assented to the original deed. Townsley v. Chapin, supra.

Thus, the omission of a wife's name in the body of a deed is fatal to it as a conveyance of her estate, and equity will not correct the instrument or grant any relief as against her. Heaton v. Fryberger, 38 Iowa, 185.

And the clerk's certificate to a deed or mortgage by a married woman cannot, even under an allegation of mistake, be contradicted by showing that the instrument was not voluntarily acknowledged by the wife, or that her husband was present. Tichenor v. Yankey, 89 Ky. 508, 12 S. W. 947.

Nor, if the deed of a married woman has been defectively executed in that her husband did not join, will equity decree the execution of a new conveyance to protect the title; nor, if the deed be a mortgage, treat it as valid and decree foreclosure, since the deed, thus defective, is absolutely void. Chapman v. Long, 66 Vt. 656, 30 Atl. 3.

And where in the relinquishment of a married woman the word "inheritance" is omitted from the prescribed formula, "all her estate, interest, and inheritance," the deed does not convey her interest in the land; and upon her death intestate, her husband surviving, her children become entitled to two thirds of this land, and a court of equity cannot supply the omitted word, since that court cannot aid the defective execution of a power, where the power is created by statute,—especially where the statute power is given to married women. Williams v. Cudd, 26 S. C. 213, 4 Am. St. Rep. 714, 2 S. E. 14.

And where a wife, for the purpose of conveying her real estate to her husband, had executed a voluntary deed which was defective in a statutory requisite, and, after the death of both, the devisee of the husband brought a petition in chancery against the heir of the wife to compel him to convey, the petitioner's equity was not aided by the fact that the husband had expended money in repairs and improvements on the land, nor by the fact that the respondent was a mere volunteer, as he himself stood in the same position. Dickinson v. Glenney, supra.

So, a mortgage executed prior to the taking effect of the Ohio act of March 22, 1849, to give additional security to land titles in that state, cannot be reformed as against a widow. Davenport v. Sovil, supra.

And a defect in a deed of a husband and wife cannot be rectified as against the wife. Carr v. Williams, 10 Ohio, 305, 38 Am. Dec. 87.

And where a husband and wife joined in the execution of a mortgage which by mistake described the wrong tract of land, a court of chancery has no power to correct the mistake so that the relinquishment of dower upon the part of the wife shall apply to land not described in the mortgage, although such land was intended by all the parties to be described therein. Martin v. Hargardine, 46 Ill. 322.

And where husband and wife join in a conveyance of the wife's land, which by mistake conveys only a dower interest on the wife's part, although she intended to convey her entire estate, it cannot be made to so operate. Bowden v. Bland, supra.

And where the statute authorizes a husband and wife to convey the wife's realty by their joint deed, a deed purporting to convey the real estate of three married women, which was signed, sealed, and acknowledged by them and their husbands, but in which the husbands were not named as grantors of the premises, is a nullity, and cannot be validated by reformation in equity; equity will not interfere in a case of nonexecution of statutory powers. Cannon v. Beatty, 19 R. I. 524, 34 Atl. 1111.

So, a conveyance of a wife's land, jointly executed by her and her husband in consideration of the husband's debt, is void, and a court of equity will not reform it on account of a mistake. Connor v. Armstrong, 86 Ala. 262, 5 So. 449.

And where ejectment was brought by a widow to recover certain land held by a person under a defective conveyance made by her and her husband, and such person by his answer prayed for a decree reforming the deed and for specific performance, as the property at the time of the defective deed was not the plaintiff's separate property, and had not been conveyed to her in form and manner required by the statute, the deed as to her was null and void and could not be reformed, but the court should, while rendering judgment for plaintiff for possession of the premises, also award the defendant the value of permanent improvements on the land, together with the purchase money paid for it by plaintiff's grantee, minus the value of the rents and profits collected by the defendant while in possession. Shroyer v. Nickell, 55 Mo. 264.

Under statutes doing away with a wife's disability to contract, however, a deed or contract of a married woman may be reformed in equity, the same as those of unmarried women. Murdoch v. Leonard, 15 Wash. 142, 45 Pac. 751; Stevens v. Holman, 112 Cal. 345, 53 Am. St. Rep. 216, 44 Pac. 670; Bradshaw v. Atkins, 110 Ill. 323.

But where a deed was inoperative when executed, for want of power on the part of the grantor because of coverture, the removal of the disability cannot render such deed effectual and binding, as it was a mere nullity. Townsley v. Chapin, 12 Allen, 476; Heaton v. Fryberger, supra.

Under statutes of this class, a mistake in the description of property in a deed executed by a married woman may be corrected in equity. Styers v. Robbins, 76 Ind. 547; Hamar v. Medsker, 60 Ind. 413; Mer- chants' & L. Bldg. Asso. v. Scanlan, 144 Ind. 11, 42 N. E. 1008.

And the correction may be either against her, or, after her decease, against her heirs. Hamar v. Medsker, supra.

And a mistake of law in thinking that a deed signed and acknowledged by the owner of land and his wife, without the wife's name appearing in the body of the deed, was sufficient to convey all their title and estate, authorizes a correction in equity, as would a mistake of fact arising from the supposition that the name did appear therein. Radebaugh v. Scanlan, 41 Ind. App. 109, 82 N. E. 544.

So, where a husband joins his wife in signing and acknowledging a mortgage on the wife's real estate, and by mutual mistake the husband's name is omitted from the conveying clause, the mortgagee is entitled to have the mortgage reformed. Collins v. Cornwell, 131 Ind. 20, 30 N. E. 796.

And the rule is the same where the names of the parties appeared only where they signed and in the certificate of acknowledgment by the notary; and in such case a deed should be reformed so as to express the mutual intention of all the parties. Parish v. Camplin, 139 Ind. 1, 37 N. E. 607.

And a clerical mistake in the description of land intended to be deeded or mortgaged by a married woman may be corrected in equity upon a proper showing. Christensen v. Hollingsworth, 6 Idaho, 87, 96 Am. St. Rep. 256, 53 Pac. 211; Savings & L. Soc. v. Meeks, 66 Cal. 371, 5 Pac. 624; Carper v. Munger, 62 Ind. 481.

In Savings & L. Soc. v. Meeks, supra, Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that that case was an attempt to reform a deed of a married woman by making it include other lands than those conveyed by it, which was beyond the power of the court, and Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 14, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that that was an action to compel a married woman to acknowledge a conveyance of her separate property, which was beyond the power of the court.

So, where a mortgage executed by a married woman has by mistake described a tract of land not owned by the mortgagor, instead of the land intended to be mortgaged, the mistake may be corrected and the mortgage enforced as to the land intended to be embraced. Tichenor v. Yankey, 89 Ky. 508, 12 S. W. 947.

And where, by the inadvertence of the scrivener in the preparation of a deed, and by mutual mistake of all the parties thereto at the time of the execution thereof, the description of the premises conveyed was erroneously stated as an undivided three fifths, while it was intended to convey an undivided four fifths, the deed may be reformed so as to express the mutual intentions of the parties, even though such relief be sought against a married woman. Parish v. Camplin, supra.

void, and equity will not reform it on account of a mistake in the prescription of the land, if the sole consideration is the payment of a debt for necessary family supplies, for which the wife's statutory estate is liable, it may be reformed in equity so that the grantee may prosecute or defend his rights under it in a court of law; and if the consideration is partly a debt of the husband and partly a debt for which the wife's statutory estate is liable, the court will decree a reformation, but on condition that the grantee pay to the wife the amount of the husband's debt which formed part of the consideration, with interest thereon. Connor v. Armstrong, 86 Ala. 262, 5 So. 449.

So, where an acknowledgment of a written instrument by a married woman is properly made, but defectively certified, a party interested may have an action to correct the certificate. Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 63 Cal. 286; Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 507; Bunnell & E. Invest. Co. v. Curtis, 5 Idaho, 652, 51 Pac. 767.

And the notary before whom a mortgage was acknowledged is not a necessary party defendant in an action to foreclose the mortgage executed by a married woman and to reform the certificate of the notary. Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 73 Cal. 452, 2 Am. St. Rep. 823, 15 Pac. 82.

But if the defect in the certificate was such that it did not show that the instrument was read or otherwise made known to the married woman, and the evidence as to whether it was read to her or not is conflicting, reformation of the certificate will be refused. Spencer v. Reese, 165 Pa. 158, 30 Atl. 722.

So, where a married woman agrees to reconvey property to her husband upon his request, in consideration of a conveyance of the same to her, but the husband fails to join the wife in such reconveyance, owing to the erroneous advice of counsel, equity will relieve against the legal mistake, and order a reconveyance, unless there are substantial reasons to the contrary. Haussman v. Burnham, 59 Conn. 117, 21 Am. St. Rep. 74, 22 Atl. 1065.

Such a reconveyance is not voluntary so as to prevent equity from enforcing it, in the absence of proof of her indebtedness, or that creditors were defrauded or prejudiced. Ibid.

And equity will enforce such promise, although she had made an ineffectual attempt to reconvey. Ibid.

So, a bond given to a woman before marriage, by her proposed husband, to leave her a sum of money, though extinguished at law by the marriage, is good in equity and binds the real assets; and it will be decreed that the wife, after her husband's death, may redeem a mortgage and hold over, though copyhold as well as freehold was included in the security. Acton v. Peirce, 2 Vern. 480.

And where land was conveyed to a husband and wife in such terms as to vest in them a tenancy by the entirety, but their intention was to hold as tenants in common, and they believed the legal effect of the deed was to make them hold as tenants in common, a court of equity will, after the death of the husband, reform the deed on the ground of mistake, and vest the title to half of the land in the heirs of the husband. Marshall v. Lane, 27 App. D. C. 276.

But the erroneous belief of both a husband and wife on their marriage, that a particular property already stood settled, is no ground for reforming a settlement so as to make it include it. Barrow v. Barrow, 18 Beav. 529.

And where a marriage settlement was drawn, as the intended husband alleged, in a manner contrary to the agreement, but before the marriage he knew its contents, and executed it under protest, reserving his right to set it aside, he cannot, after the marriage, sustain a suit to rectify it. Eaton v. Bennett, 34 Beav. 196.

And the fact that a contract between a husband and wife for the release and relinquishment by each of all interest, present and contingent, in the real and personal estate of the other, was entered into by the wife in ignorance of a law revoking her will by her marriage, will not authorize either party to have such contract canceled; the contract will be enforced precisely as though she knew her will was revoked, or as though no will had been made. Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 443, 24 N. E. 956.

V. Statutes of frauds as affecting parol variation.

a. The general rule.

The general rule both at law and in equity is that parol evidence is not admissible to vary a written instrument. Wheaton v. Wheaton, 9 Conn. 96; Schwass v. Hershey, 125 Ill. 653, 18 N. E. 272; Broadwell v. Broadwell, 6 Ill. 599; Wolsey v. Neeley, 46 Ill. App. 387; Murphy v. Trigg, 1 T. B. Mon. 73; Watkins v. Stockett, 6 Harr. & J. 435; Wesley v. Thomas, 6 Harr. & J. 24; Kidd v. Carson, 33 Md. 37; Macomber v. Peckham, 16 R. I. 485, 17 Atl. 910; Ordeman v. Lawson, 49 Md. 135; Shirley v. Rice, 79 Va. 442; Baltzer v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 115 U. S. 634, 29 L. ed. 505, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 216; Clinan v. Cooke, 1 Sch. & Lef. 22, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 721; Price v. Dyer, 17 Ves. Jr. 356.

Except where fraud is charged, or in cases of trust. Watkins v. Stockett, supra.

The writing, in contemplation of law, contains the true agreement of the parties. Schwass v. Hershey and Ordeman v. Lawson, supra.

And a writing solemnly signed, sealed, acknowledged before a magistrate, and delivered by a person, is evidence of his intent so convincing and conclusive that generally no evidence will be received to contradict it. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

In the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, the terms of a deed cannot be varied 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

by parol evidence of what occurred between the parties, either before or during its execution; all prior contracts, written or oral, between them, being merged in the subsequent deed. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 346, 10 S. E. 239.

And if the instrument in question is clear and unambiguous in its terms and certain in its legal effect, parol evidence is not admissible to change or vary it, and it is immaterial what the parties to it believed as to the legal effect of the form in which they contracted. Prescott v. Hixon, 22 Ind. App. 139, 72 Am. St. Rep. 291, 53 N. E. 391.

And it is not competent in an action against an indorser by his immediate indorsee, upon an indorsement of a negotiable promissory note made in blank, to prove as a defense that, as part of the transaction, it was agreed between the parties, but not in writing, that the indorsement should merely have the legal effect of one expressed to be without recourse. Martin v. Cole, 104 U. S. 30, 26 L. ed. 647.

And a promissory note reading, "I promise to pay," and signed by an individual with the designation of "pres. and treas." of a named corporation added to his name, is the individual obligation of the person signing, and not the obligation of the corporation, and oral testimony to show that at the time the note was given and afterwards it was understood and agreed by the parties that the note was the note of the corporation is inadmissible in an action on the note. Davis v. England, 141 Mass. 587, 6 N. E. 731.

So, under the English statute of frauds and those statutes of the American states copied from it, parol evidence is not admissible to show that an absolute deed was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance has been omitted or destroyed by fraud or mistake, or omitted by design, upon mutual confidence between the parties. Taylor v. Luther, 2 Summ. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 13,796.

And where it was a part of a grant of annuity that it should be redeemable, but the grant left out the agreement that it should be redeemable on the idea that, if inserted, the transaction would be usurious, parol evidence to this effect cannot be given, as it would contradict the deed, it not being charged that the agreement was omitted by fraud. Irnham v. Child, 1 Bro. Ch. 92; Hare v. Shearwood, 3 Bro. Ch. 168; Portmore v. Morris, 2 Bro. Ch. 219.

And a representation that the agreement would be void unless all the creditors signed it, upon which the signature of a written instrument was obtained, is not admissible in evidence, in an action to reform the agreement, since it would give the agreement a meaning different from that which appeared upon the face of it. Lewis v. Jones, 4 Barn. & C. 512.

Nor are statements of a grantor in an absolute deed, in the absence of the grantee, admissible in evidence to show that a life estate only was intended to be conveyed. Ryder v. Ryder, 244 Ill. 297, 91 N. E. 451.

And it cannot be shown by parol evidence that the object or purpose of a deed duly delivered to the grantee was different from that implied by its terms unless executed to secure the payment of a debt or the performance of some other act. Finlayson v. Finlayson, 17 Or. 347, 3 L.R.A. 801, 11 Am. St. Rep. 836, 21 Pac. 57.

And oral testimony cannot be received in equity to reform a written executory contract for the sale of land on account of a mutual mistake, and to specifically enforce it as reformed. Macomber v. Peckham, 16 R. I. 485, 17 Atl. 910; Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63, 48 Am. Dec. 133; Elder v. Elder, 10 Me. 80, 25 Am. Dec. 205.

Nor is parol evidence tendered not to enforce a collateral stipulation, but to show that the transaction was conducted on a different basis from that shown on the face of the instrument, admissible. Croome v. Le-diard, 2 Myl. & K. 251.

So, under a statute of frauds requiring all declarations for the creation of trusts or confidences in land, except resulting trusts, to be in writing, the effect of an absolute deed cannot be changed by showing a parol agreement of the grantee to hold a life estate only, with remainder to specified persons. Ryder v. Ryder, supra.

And a statute like Cal. Civ. Code, § 3402, providing that a contract may be first revised and then specifically enforced, does not apply to an action on a contract for a sale of land, insufficient under a statute of frauds. Baume v. Morse (Cal. App.) 110 Pac. 350.

And under a statute like Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, providing that when an agreement is reduced to writing, no other evidence of the terms thereof can be shown, with immaterial exceptions, no new terms can be introduced by parol into a written contract for the sale of land, insufficient under a statute of frauds. Ibid.

So, evidence designed to change or vary the written contract expressed in a title bond is inadmissible. Hancock v. Cossett, 45 Fed. 754.

And where a vendor stipulates with the vendee that his deed shall save the rights of a tenant in possession, but the stipulation, through the fraud or mistake of the vendee, is not carried into the deed, the tenant can claim no relief in equity against the vendee, since he claims under a contract void by the statute of frauds. Young v. Miller, 10 Ohio, 85.

And parol evidence is not admissible to prove from conversations before and at the time of signing an agreement for a lease, that the intent of the parties was different from a memorandum, though the same was written by the lessee, and the words which were omitted in the memorandum constituted the purport of the conversation. Rich v. Jackson, 4 Bro. Ch. 514.

And where a mortgage is satisfied by payment and receipt indorsed, parol evidence of any agreement contradicting the receipt is not admissible. Re Dunham, 9 Phila. 471, Fed. Cas. No. 4146.

There is no objection to correcting a deed by parol evidence, however, where there is anything in writing beyond the parol evidence to go by. Mortimer v. Shortall, 2 Drury & War. 363.

And a mistake in a written instrument may be corrected upon parol evidence, where the parol evidence was corroborated by the documents and subsequent transactions in the case. Ibid.

And equity will reform a deed the sole purpose of which was to effectuate the award of arbitrators, which purpose it did not accomplish, since it can reform the deed by having the award before it, without resorting to parol evidence. Green v. Morris & E. R. Co. 12 N. J. Eq. 165.

So, while on the question of construction of a written instrument no evidence of the intention of the parties is admissible, extrinsic evidence may be adduced to show the position of the parties, the state of the funds, and the rights and interests of the parties in them. Bradford v. Romney, 30 Beav. 431.

b. Rule that mistake and fraud create admissibility.

1. Generally.

The general rule that excludes parol evidence when offered to vary or control written contracts does not apply to cases where the written contract was obtained by fraud, mistake, or imposition, and the object of the evidence is to correct it. Ring v. Aslforth, 3 Iowa, 458; Pierson v. McCahill, 21 Cal. 123; Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 644.

Fraud or mistake always constitutes an exception to the general rule that parol evidence is inadmissible for the purpose of contradicting, adding to, or varying the language of a written instrument. Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, 59 Cal. 630; Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. ed. 580.

And parol evidence is admissible in a cause in equity for relief from mistake in a written contract or other instrument to show the mistake and what the real contract was, as well as to show fraud. Wagenblast v. Washburn, 12 Cal. 208; Hathaway v. Brady, 23 Cal. 121; Pierson v. McCahill, supra; Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 644; Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, supra; Blackburn v. Randolph, 33 Ark. 119; Chapman v. Allen, Kirby, 399, 1 Am. Dec. 24; Trout v. Goodman, 7 Ga. 383; Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Hunter v. Bilyeu, 30 Ill. 228; Schwass v. Hershey, 125 Ill. 653, 18 N. E. 272; Gray v. Woods, 4 Blackf. 432; Hileman v. Wright, 9 Ind. 126; Lee v. Percival, 85 Iowa, 639, 52 N. W. 543; Hausbrandt v. Hofer, 117 Iowa, 103, 94 Am. St. Rep. 289, 90 N. W. 494; Anderson v. Bacon, 1 A. K. Marsh. 48; Murphy v. Trigg, 1 T. B. Mon. 76; Nutall v. Nutall, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 671, 82 S. W. 377; Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 474; Moale v. Buchanan, 11 Gill & J. 314; Ordeman v. Lawson, 49 Md. 135; Popplein v. Foley, 61 Md. 381; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 596, 7 Am. Dec. 559; Pennell v. Wilson, 2 Robt. 505; Forester v. Van Aiken, 12 N. D. 175, 96 N. W. 301; Gow- er v. Sterner, 2 Whart. 75; Christ v. Diefenbach, 1 Serg. & R. 464, 7 Am. Dec. 624; Zensmyer v. Mittower, 5 Pa. 403; Gump's Appeal, 65 Pa. 476; Huss v. Morris, 63 Pa. 367; Goodell v. Field, 15 Vt. 448; Barry v. Harris, 49 Vt. 392; Tabor v. Cilley, 53 Vt. 487; Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406; Townshend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. Jr. 329, 22 Eng. Rul. Cas. 843.

And a court of chancery, in the exercise of its moral jurisdiction, will, upon proof of fraud, mistake, or surprise, raise an equity by which the written agreement of the parties may be rectified. Wesley v. Thomas, 6 Harr. & J. 24; Chapman v. Allen; Hilman v. Wright; and Popplein v. Foley,—supra.

The statute of frauds does not interfere with the power of courts of equity to reform deeds or other instruments in which the parties intended to comply with the statute, and were prevented by fraud, accident, or mistake. Blackburn v. Randolph and Schwass v. Hershey, supra; Noel v. Gill, 84 Ky. 241, 1 S. W. 428; Bradford v. Romney, 30 Beav. 431.

And parol evidence is always admissible in case of mistake or fraud in actions in equity to rescind a contract or to reform an agreement so as to make it speak the real intentions of the parties. Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, supra; Park Bros. v. Blodgett & C. Co. 64 Conn. 28, 29 Atl. 133; Hausbrandt v. Hofer and Anderson v. Bacon, supra; Cogger v. M'Gee, 2 Bibb, 321, 5 Am. Dec. 610; Farley v. Bryant and Forester v. Van Auken, supra.

And it is admissible in a suit to reform a deed to show that, by reason of a mistake of the draftsman, the original deed did not convey the estate intended. Nutall v. Nutall, and Huss v. Morris, supra.

And that in fact the instrument embodies provisions different from those which the parties intended it to embody. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. supra.

So, parol evidence is admissible in equity to show mistake in a written contract as well where the party seeks affirmative relief on the ground of mistake, as where the opposing party sets it up as a defense or to rebut an equity. Barry v. Harris, supra; Belows v. Stone, 14 N. H. 175.

And equity will let in parol evidence of mistakes and omissions to rebut an equity, or by way of objection to a specific performance. Chapman v. Allen and Popplein v. Foley, supra; Berry v. Whitney, 40 Mich. 72; Townshend v. Stangroom, supra.

And a court of equity will receive parol evidence at the instance of a complainant to rectify a written contract, and execute it specifically as rectified, even in cases arising under the statute of frauds. Moale v. Buchanan, supra.

And to justify the reformation of a contract or deed on the ground of mutual mistake, it is not necessary to show the existence of a prior parol contract, and such part performance as would, in the absence of a 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

written contract, take the case out of the statute of frauds. Conaway v. Gore, 24 Kan. 389; Moale v. Buchanan, supra.

Nor is there any difference in respect to the power and right of equity to relieve against mistake or fraud in a deed in writing between that class of cases required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, and those not within the statute. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88.

While the rule is inflexible that a written instrument cannot be altered by parol proof, yet a court of chancery will rectify mistakes in fact which have occurred in drawing up the paper, when a proper case is presented and clearly proved, and then carry into effect the instrument thus corrected as if it had been written as the parties supposed it was at the time. Broadwell v. Broadwell, 6 Ill. 599.

When the question at issue is not what the terms of a written contract are, but whether the contract as written was entered into, or whether it was obtained by fraud, or is founded in surprise, accident, or mistake, these subjects of inquiry are open to parol testimony irrespective of what the writing contains, and the rules of evidence are the same in equity as law. Bush v. Merriman, 87 Mich. 260, 49 N. W. 567.

So, parol evidence is admissible to prove the mistake in an action to reform a written instrument, though it be denied in the answer. Wall v. Arrington, supra; Gray v. Woods, 4 Blackf. 432; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 596, 7 Am. Dec. 559.

Parol evidence will not be admitted, however, to prove a contract entirely different from that expressed in a writing, except for fraud, mutual mistake, etc. Dellinger v. Gillespie, 118 N. C. 737, 24 S. E. 538.

And under a pleading which simply states the terms of a contract, the introduction of a written agreement respecting the subject-matter cannot be followed by oral proof of a material clause alleged to have been omitted by mistake from the writing. Pier-son v. McCahill, 21 Cal. 123.

And where the object of a suit is both the construction of a written instrument and its reformation, evidence of intention will be received on the one point and rejected when considering the other. Bradford v. Romney, supra.

Nor will a court of equity admit parol evidence to show that a renunciation of dower before a magistrate was intended as a release of inheritance. Westbrook v. Harbeson, 2 M'Cord, Eq. 112.

And a contract for the exchange of described property, a stated number of acres of land in a named county and state, is too vague and uncertain as to the description of the property proposed to be exchanged to be aided and the property identified by parol evidence in equity. Baldwin v. Kerlin, 46 Ind. 426.

And where an agreement for an exchange of lands and other property describes the land as 640 acres of land in Anderson county, Kansas, parol evidence cannot be given to show what land was intended, or to permit the purchaser to select what land he pleased, since this would be to make a new and different contract for the parties. Ibid.

2. Application to particular cases.

While parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written contract, it is admissible to prove a vice or mistake in it, and may be used to prove that a bill of sale, absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage to secure an usurious loan. Murphy v. Trigg, 1 T. B. Mon. 73; Lindley v. Sharp, 7 T. B. Mon. 249.

And parol evidence may be introduced in an action on a written contract for the purpose of showing what were the words omitted, and that they were omitted by mistake. Hathaway v. Brady, 23 Cal. 121.

And a court of equity will, upon parol proof of fraud, mistake, or surprise, rectify and reform the written agreement of the parties, and it may consider an absolute deed as a mortgage, the statute of frauds being no defense to such an equity. Farrell v. Bean, 10 Md. 217.

And that an agreement by several persons to give a bond was to give a joint bond, and not a several one, may be shown by parol evidence on a bill for a specific performance of the agreement, alleging it to have been to give a several bond. Gordon v. Hertford, 2 Madd. Ch. 106.

So, a court of equity has power, in the absence of any statutory prohibition, to rectify a deed or written contract upon clear and satisfactory proof, by parol evidence, that it fails, either on account of fraud or mistake of fact, to express the agreement or intention of the parties. Smith v. Jordan, 13 Minn. 264, Gil. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 232; Morris v. Stern, 80 Ind. 227.

And a mistake in a deed or contract in writing may be shown, for the purposes of correction in equity, by parol proof of the declarations of the vendor, made subsequent to the sale. Trout v. Goodman, 7 Ga. 383.

And the mistake of a scrivener in drawing a deed, whether it be a mistake of law or of fact, whereby he fails to carry out the previous agreement of the parties, may be corrected in equity, and oral evidence is admissible to prove the intention of the parties. Sampson v. Mudge, 13 Fed. 260.

So, equity has jurisdiction to correct a mistake in the description of land in a conveyance, irrespective of the statute of frauds. Judson v. Miller, 106 Mich. 140, 63 N. W. 965.

And where a vendor by mistake conveys to a purchaser a lot of a different number from the one actually sold to him, the statute of frauds does not intervene to bar relief in equity by way of making the deed embrace the lot actually sold. Johnson v. Johnson, 8 Baxt. 261.

And parol evidence is admissible to show that a sheriff expressly excepted certain land from the sale of a larger tract, made by him under execution in an action of ejectment brought by the purchaser at such sale. Bartlett v. Judd, 21 N. Y. 200, 78 Am. Dec. 131.

So, a mistake in a written lease under seal, in stating that a semi-annual rent of $300 was to be paid instead of an annual rent of $300 per year, payable semi-annually, may be shown by parol evidence. Snyder v. May, 19 Pa. 235.

But while a contemporaneous parol agreement that a certain debt secured by a written lease should be indulged, and that otherwise the lease should be void, might be a defense to an independent action to collect the debt, evidence of such agreement is inadmissible to avoid the lease, in the absence of anything to indicate that such stipulation was omitted by fraud, mutual mistake, or accident. Taylor v. Hunt, 118 N. C. 168, 24 S. E. 359.

c. Rule permitting taking from but not adding to contract.

1. Generally.

The rule has been asserted and is ably supported that, to a bill in equity to reform an instrument in writing, if the proposed reformation involves the specific enforcement of an oral agreement within the statute of frauds, or the terms sought to be added will so modify the instrument as to make it operate to convey an interest or secure a right which can only be conveyed or secured through an instrument in writing, and for which no writing has ever existed, the statute of frauds is a sufficient answer unless the defendant is estopped to plead it. Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 3 Am. Rep. 418.

That courts of equity have no power or jurisdiction to construct or reconstruct an executory contract for the parties thereto, or to insert therein a new and essential element or matter that is required by the statute to be reduced to writing in order to make the contract valid and binding. Allen v. Kitchen, 16 Idaho, 133, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 100 Pac. 1052.

And that a court of equity has no power or jurisdiction, under the pretense of reformation or otherwise, so to construct or reconstruct an agreement for the sale of real estate as to add to the description or make a complete contract out of one which, on its face, was incomplete or insufficient to meet the requirements of the statute of frauds. Ibid.

And that while a deed may be set aside for fraud or duress, and a trust may arise out of a transaction which will be enforced in face of the express terms of a deed, it must be a trust arising by operation of law; the parties to a deed cannot create a trust in favor of the grantor, except by an instrument in writing, declaring the same. Finlayson v. Finlayson, 17 Or. 347, 3 L.R.A. 801, 11 Am. St. Rep. 836, 21 Pac. 57.

Within this rule, the fact that the failure of an instrument to convey the estate or express the obligation which it is sought to make it convey or express was occasioned by mistake or by deceit and fraud does not alone constitute an estoppel against the other party to the contract to set up that the proposed correction will operate to convey an interest or secure a right which can only be conveyed or secured through an instrument in writing; where there was no such writing, there must occur some change in the situation of the other party by reason of having been induced to enter on the execution of the agreement, or to do acts on the faith of it as if it was executed, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the other contractor, either express or implied, for which he will be left without redress if the oral agreement shall be defeated. Glass v. Hulbert, supra.

And where all the members of a family intended that title to a burial lot should be taken in the name of the father, but by mistake the deed was taken in the name of a son, who, after the death of the father, without knowledge of the mistake, orally promised to hold the lot for the benefit of the rest of the family, under a statute providing that no trust in land shall be created unless by an instrument in writing, equity cannot enforce the trust against the son holding the title, based on his oral declaration, though the mistake in the deed was mutual, so that it might have been corrected. Tourtillote v. Tourtillote, 205 Mass. 547, 91 N. E. 909.

Nor is oral testimony admissible either to expunge words from a contract or add words to it, if the effect would be to widen the scope of the written contract. Macomber v. Peckham, 16 R. I. 485, 17 Atl. 910; Elder v. Elder, 10 Me. 80, 25 Am. Dec. 205; Webster v. Gray, 37 Mich. 37; Climer v. Hovey, 15 Mich. 18.

And parol evidence will not be admitted on a bill to correct a mistake in a deed, where the design is to give it a more extended operation than that which it purports on its face to have, or where it carries a different and larger estate than the original purports to convey. Westbrook v. Harbeson, 2 M'Cord, Eq. 112.

But even under this rule, courts of equity have power and jurisdiction so to reform an executory contract that is valid and binding on its face as to relieve it from any statement, declaration, or description that has been inserted therein through deception, fraud, or mutual mistake, and to make its statements speak the truth, as it was intended to insert it in the instrument. Allen v. Kitchen, supra.

The great majority of the cases, however, go on the theory that when, because of mistake or fraud, the intention of the parties will not be carried out until there is a reformation, there either is no contract to be contradicted or modified, or, if there is one, its scope and limits are unascertained, and parol evidence is admissible and necessary, not to contradict or modify the contract, but to show what it really is; equity, in such case not denying or overruling the statute, but declaring that fraud or mistake creates obligations and confers remedial rights which are not within the statutory prohibition. This would appear to be the foundation theory of the large class of cases which base the right of reformation of contracts upon the giving of effect to the real intention of the parties to them.

Thus, in Zentmyer v. Mittower, 5 Pa. 403, which seems to have furnished the foundation for the prevailing rule, in America, at least, it was held that, as an exception to the general rule, parol evidence is, under certain restrictions, admissible to control a written instrument, where either more or less has been expressed than the parties intended, or where one of them, relying upon a misrepresentation of a material fact by another interested in the transaction, has been induced to do something he otherwise would not have done, and this, whether the misrepresentation was wilful or unintentional, if, under the circumstances, it would be unconscionable in the person making it to take advantage of ignorance abused by his own mistake or falsehood.

Within this theory, where there has been a mistake or omission in a written contract, parol evidence of the agreement or intent of the parties is admissible to prove that, by mistake, something material has been omitted in the written contract, or that it contains more than was intended, or that it varies from the common intent of the parties by expressing something different in substance from what was intended by both. Pennell v. Wilson, 2 Robt. 505; Gillespie v. Moore, 2 Johns. Ch. 585, 7 Am. Dec. 559; Caley v. Philadelphia & C. County R. Co. 80 Pa. 370.

On the theory that equity regards that as done which is agreed to be done, a court of equity will correct mistakes in conveyances when clearly proved, though by oral evidence only; and will make the instrument such, both in form and effect, as will fulfil the intention of the parties. Kennard v. George, 44 N. H. 440.

No one can be compelled to convey lands unless the sale be attested by a writing: but when a contract of sale is so attested, and through fraud, omission, or mistake, the real sale, as made, is not set forth, the chancellor has power to reform the writing and enforce it, though coming within the provisions of the statute of frauds. Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 168.

A written agreement, while it exists, must control as to all the terms expressed in it, although those terms differ from the prior oral agreement; but if the difference was caused by mutual mistake, it is necessary to reform the contract so as to express the true agreement. Linton v. Unexcelled Fireworks Co. 128 N. Y. 672, 28 N. E. 580, reversing 37 N. Y. S. R. 173, 13 N. Y. Supp. 495; Rogers v. Atkinson, 1 Ga. 24; Philpott v. Elliott, 4 Md. Ch. 273.

The rule that a written instrument will be reformed for fraud or mistake only so as to give effect to a previous binding contract of the parties is not inconsistent with such reformation of an instrument, where the executory agreement was oral and within the statute of frauds. Petes v. Hambach, 48 Wis. 443, 4 N. W. 565.

So, to insist upon the legal effect of a written agreement when an exception was not inserted, on the express understanding of the parties that such excepted matter was not to be embraced in the agreement, is such a fraud as will admit parol testimony to reform the deed accordingly. Renshaw v. Gans, 7 Pa. 117.

And the fact that a contract in writing, signed by only one of the parties, contained stipulations to be performed by the other which are within the statute of frauds, will not prevent a reformation of the instrument in equity at the suit of the latter. Thompson v. Marshall, 36 Ala. 504, 76 Am. Dec. 328.

So, whatever may be the rule of law on the question of the jurisdiction of courts of equity to reform instruments made in pursuance of oral agreements, when the correction sought is the addition of lands to those described, nothing having been done under the oral agreement, the jurisdiction where part performance is shown sufficient to warrant a specific performance under the oral contract is unquestioned. Metropolitan Lumber Co. v. Lake Superior Ship Canal R. & Iron Co. 101 Mich. 577, 60 N. W. 278.

But one of the conditions of the admissibility of parol evidence for the control of a written instrument is that the evidence of fraud must be of such a nature as distinctly to establish the fact that the action of the injured party was simply the result of the mistake or misrepresentation of one who seeks unfairly to avail himself of it. Zentmyer v. Mittower, supra.

And the fraud which will let in parol evidence to reform a written instrument must be fraud in the procurement of the instrument which goes to its validity, or some breach of confidence in using a paper delivered for one purpose, and fraudulently perverted to another purpose. Towner v. Lucas, 13 Gratt. 705.

2. Application to particular cases.

Parol evidence of mistake is admissible to qualify or contradict a written instrument. Gump's Appeal, 65 Pa. 476.

And it is admissible to prove that through the mistake of the scrivener a clause intended by the parties to an agreement for the sale of land was omitted. Gower v. Sterner, 2 Whart. 75.

So, where a deed conveyed lands particularly described, but did not convey an ore bed belonging to the grantor in the same town, proof, in an action for the reformation of the deed, of the grantor's declaration at the time, that he intended to convey his interest in the ore bed, and desired the deed to be so drawn as to convey it, is competent. Cake v. Peet, 49 Conn. 501.

And a vendor of lands having executed a conveyance to the purchaser, and taken his notes for the purchase money, may maintain a bill in equity to reform and correct them by inserting an express provision for the retention of a vendor's lien, on averment and proof that such provision was omitted by mistake, without fault on his part. Kinney v. Ensminger, 87 Ala. 340, 6 So. 72.

And where one who has agreed to sell certain land receives the full consideration therefor, and then fraudulently gives a deed conveying only part of the land, a specific enforcement of the contract may be had in equity, even though the contract was oral. McDonald v. Yungbluth, 46 Fed. 836.

So, parol evidence may be adduced to show that a lease was taken with the understanding on the part of both the lessor and the lessee that the premises were to be used for a certain purpose, and that this understanding was based on a mistake as to the true facts of the case,—not to vary the effect of the contract, but to show that it never had any valid existence. Bedell v. Wilder, 65 Vt. 406, 36 Am. St. Rep. 871, 26 Atl. 589; Christ v. Dffenbach, 1 Serg. & R. 464, 7 Am. Dec. 624.

And where persons agreed in writing to grant another a lease at a specified rent for a specified term, subject to the same covenants, clauses, and agreements as were contained in an expiring lease, under which he then held the property, a claim of an additional term to the lease, that the lessee should pay a premium of £200, which, by his claim, he offered to do, does not render the statute of frauds a valid defense to the claim. Martin v. Pycroft, 2 De G. M. & G. 785, 22 Eng. Rul. Cas. 852.

And the power of a court of equity to correct a lease by including an option by the lessee to buy, which was omitted by mutual mistake, and then enforce the contract as reformed, is not affected by a statute which provides that oral evidence is not competent to establish contracts for the creation or transfer of any interest in lands except leases for a term not exceeding one year. Butler v. Threlkeld, 117 Iowa, 116, 90 N. W. 584.

So, the rule that parol evidence is not admissible to show that an individual signature was designed to bind a corporation of which the person signing was an officer has no application to actions in equity, where the signature is alleged to be the result of a mistake, the correction of which is asked. Lee v. Percival, 85 Iowa, 639, 52 N. W. 543.

And where by mistake a note intended to bind a corporation is so drawn as to bind the signers only, who are officers of the corporation, parol evidence is admissible in proof of the alleged mistake in an action to reform the note. Ibid.

And where a person sought to reform notes on the ground that they were incorrectly put into writing by the mutual mistake of himself and the other party, who drew them, he being unable to read and write, and unable to correct the error, they not having been read over to him, it cannot be objected to as an attempt to vary or contradict a written instrument by a contemporaneous parol agreement. Jones v. Warren, 134 N. C. 390, 46 S. E. 740.

d. Collateral oral contracts.

Parol evidence may be used with reference to an alleged mistake in a contract, when it is not introduced to contradict a writing or control its legal effect, but is a matter collateral to the writing, the contract remaining untouched and in full force, the court in such case receiving the parol evidence not to contradict the written instrument, but to show its application and existing rights under it. Webster v. Webster, 33 N. H. 18, 66 Am. Dec. 705; Redfield v. Gleason, 61 Vt. 220, 15 Am. St. Rep. 889, 17 Atl. 1075.

And where a writing does not purport to contain all the stipulations of a contract, parol evidence is admissible to prove other portions thereof, not inconsistent with the writing. Hendrix v. Academy of Music, 73 Ga. 437.

And a subscription for the amount of stock opposite the subscriber's name, with an agreement to pay the same in quarterly instalments, naming the date of payment, for the purpose of forming a company to erect an academy of music, is on its face an incomplete agreement, being silent as to the location and nature of the structure, whether the company was to be a joint stock company or an incorporation, what amount was necessary to accomplish the object sought, and as to the mode and method of raising the necessary funds to complete and equip the buildings, and the specific purpose for which it was to be used, and the way in which its business was to be conducted. Ibid.

So, that a deed of conveyance different in its terms from that required by a written contract was received in full satisfaction of, or as total discharge of, such contract, may be shown by parol evidence. Roberts v. Elmore, 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 208.

And where a mistake was made not in reducing the contract to writing, but in the supposition of both parties that the boundaries of the land named in the contract would include a certain mill site, and, on discovering that it did not, the parties agreed by parol so to change the boundaries as to include the mill site, and under their direction a surveyor made a plat and report of the land, fixing new boundaries, and the purchaser objected to a conveyance according to the new boundaries, relying on the statute of frauds, the court will nevertheless specifically enforce such written contract as modified by the parties to correct the mistake. Creigs v. Boggs, 19 W. Va. 240.

Nor is it dangerous to the stability of titles to real property to correct deeds upon parol evidence after the lapse of many years, when such evidence, taken in connection with the subsequent deeds, tends to sustain a title, or, at least, the equitable right to it, which all parties have recognized and acted upon for many years. Kyner v. Boll, 182 Ill. 171, 54 N. E. 925.

If a written subscription for stock was or appeared to be complete within itself, however, the subscriber cannot go outside of it, so far as concerns the conditions upon which the subscription was made. Hendrix v. Academy of Music, supra.

And a verbal agreement contemporaneous with the execution of a deed and notes and mortgage on consummation of a sale of land, that, if the land, on being surveyed by the grantee, fell short of the quantity which the grantor warranted, a sum proportioned to such deficiency should be indorsed on the mortgage, is merged in the deed and other writings, which must, in the absence of fraud or mistake, be conclusively presumed to contain the whole contract. Martin v. Hamlin, 18 Mich. 355, 100 Am. Dec. 181.

So, either at equity or at common law, in the absence of proof of fraud or mistake, a contract cannot be controlled by evidence that it was executed on the faith of a contemporaneous or preceding oral stipulation not embraced in it, and it cannot be set aside on the ground that such oral stipulations have not been performed. Wilson v. Deen, 74 N. Y. 531.

And if an oral agreement accompanying a lease by which the lessor agreed to furnish the lessee with certain furniture can be held to be collateral to the lease, and not merged in it, the lessee's remedy for a breach of such agreement would be simply an action for damages for the breach; the validity and effect of the lease could not be made to depend upon its performance. Ibid.

Nor will parol evidence be received to engraft upon or incorporate with a valid written contract an incident occurring contemporaneously therewith, and inconsistent with its terms. Towner v. Lucas, 13 Gratt. 705.

And on a parol contract for the sale of land, on which the vendor executed a deed by which he conveyed a part of the land purchased to the vendee, it is not competent for the vendee to prove by parol evidence that the deed was only a part execution of the contract, and that the vendor had agreed at the time the deed was executed that he would convey the remainder at another time; such an agreement could only be relied on as an independent contract, and must either have been in writing, or there must have been a part performance. Broughton v. Coffey, 18 Gratt. 184.

VI. Effect of negligence accompanying mistake.

a. General rules.

Relief by way of reformation of a contract will be extended to those only who have not by their conduct, as by laches, negligence, or otherwise, put themselves in such a position as to render it unjust to change the situation. Fritz v. Fritz, 94 Minn. 264, 102 N. W. 705; Ætna Indemnity Co. v. Baltimore,

S. P. & C. R. Co. 112 Md. 389, 76 Atl. 251; Marshall v. Homier, 13 Okla. 264, 74 Pac. 268.

And relief will not be afforded in equity on the ground of mistake, where the defendant's liability or other trouble is the result of his want of proper diligence. ~~Voorhis v. Murphy~~, 26 N. J. Eq. 434; Serrell v. Rothstein, 49 N. J. Eq. 385, 24 Atl. 369; Mitchell v. Holman, 30 Or. 280, 47 Pac. 616; Grant Marble Co. v. Abbot, 142 Wis. 279, 124 N. W. 264; Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. ed. 798; Pope v. Hoopes, 84 Fed. 927; Great Western Mfg. Co. v. Adams, 99 C. C. A. 615, 176 Fed. 325.

If a mistake in a contract is the result of a party's own carelessness or inattention, a court of equity will not interfere in his behalf, its policy being to grant relief to the vigilant, and to put all parties upon the exercise of a reasonable degree of diligence. Wood v. Patterson, 4 Md. Ch. 335.

In the absence of fraud the law does not relieve persons fully able and competent to protect themselves, against their contracts. Gougenheim v. Ermann, 118 La. 577, 43 So. 170.

While a court of equity may rescind and cancel a contract upon the ground of a mistake of facts material to the contract of one party only, where there has been no fraud or surprise to put the applicant for such relief off his guard, it must appear that the mistake was not in consequence of his own want of recollection, from inattention, or of his own carelessness, and that by granting him the relief no injustice will be done. Diman v. Providence, W. & B. R. Co. 5 R. I. 130.

A party coming into a court of equity and asking relief upon the ground of mistake must show that he has used due diligence and good faith to avoid the consequences of the mistake. Thomas v. Bartow, 48 N. Y. 193.

And the party complaining must have exercised at least the degree of diligence which may be fairly expected from a reasonable person. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7827.

One who signs a written instrument in ignorance of its contents is presumptively guilty of gross negligence, and the burden of proof rests upon him to rebut the presumption. Albrecht v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co. 87 Wis. 105, 41 Am. St. Rep. 30, 58 N. W. 72; Bishop v. Allen, 55 Vt. 423.

And ignorance, upon the part of a party to a contract, of a stipulation in it, is no ground for relief against such stipulation, where there is no evidence that he was deceived or misled by any misrepresentation or concealment of the fact, and his mistake must be ascribed solely to his own carelessness or inattention. Robertson v. Smith, 11 Tex. 211, 60 Am. Dec. 234.

And a sale by one partner of his interest in the firm business and assets to his copartner will not, in the absence of proof of fraud, be set aside on account of mere mistakes, however serious and important, if 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

such mistakes are wholly the result of a want of reasonable care and diligence on the part of the complaining party. Pearce v. Suggs, 85 Tenn. 724, 4 S. W. 526.

Nor will equity grant relief for a mistake in a contract, though it is probable that all concerned in the concoction and execution of the deed mistook the legal effect of the words of limitation employed, where the mistake arose altogether from overweening conceit of themselves, or rash neglect in advising with skilful persons. Those who will ignorantly and rashly employ technical terms of the law must submit to the consequences of having the terms technically construed. Dennis v. Dennis, 4 Rich. Eq. 307.

And where a change of securities was voluntary, and it does not appear that any artifice was made use of to induce the party making the change to take a second mortgage, but he does so, permitting an outstanding mortgage to go in ahead, he cannot be permitted to disavow or avoid the operation, where he entered into the agreement with a full knowledge of the facts, on the ground of his ignorance of the legal consequences flowing from such facts. Hinchman v. Emans, 1 N. J. Eq. 100.

The rule that the carelessness or negligence of a person in signing a written contract estops him from afterwards asserting that the writing does not truly express the agreement of the parties, however, does not apply in an action for relief on the ground that the contract was obtained by fraud, or entered into by mutual mistake. Story v. Gammell, 68 Neb. 709, 94 N. W. 982; Colorado Invest. Loan Co. v. Beuchat (Colo.) 111 Pac. 61.

And the mere fact that a party to a contract was negligent in not making an examination of it to see if there were omissions, will not prevent relief in equity; whether or not the court will or will not correct a mistake must depend upon the circumstances of each case. Boulden v. Wood, 96 Md. 332, 53 Atl. 911; Schautz v. Keener, 87 Ind. 258.

b. Necessity that negligence be detrimental to other party.

Relief by way of reformation of a contract will not be granted where there was negligence or laches on the part of the person seeking relief, especially when the change might injuriously affect the rights or status of the other party or of innocent third persons. Fritz v. Fritz, 94 Minn. 264, 102 N. W. 705; Thomas v. Bartow, 48 N. Y. 195; Diman v. Providence, W. & B. R. Co. 5 R. I. 130.

And where money is paid under a mistake either of law or of fact, it is no defense to an action brought to recover it that the mistake arose through the plaintiff's negligence, if such negligence caused the defendant no harm. Mansfield v. Lynch, 59 Conn. 320, 12 L.R.A. 285, 22 Atl. 313.

And where the legal title to property involved in a contract has become vested in a bona fide purchaser for value while a party to the contract claiming thereunder is sleeping on his rights, the court will not interfere to reform the contract. Trusdell v. Lehman, 47 N. J. Eq. 218, 20 Atl. 391.

Where a person seeks to avoid or rescind a contract on the ground of bona fide mistake, ignorance, or forgetfulness of facts material thereto, however, relief may be given him provided the rights of innocent third persons will not be prejudiced; and in such case it is not material to inquire whether he might not, by reasonable diligence, have ascertained the facts which he had forgotten, or in regard to which he was mistaken, or of which he was ignorant. Johnson v. Parker, 34 Wis. 596.

And where a written contract for the sale of an engine contained a clause guarantying that the engine should develop a certain horse power at a boiler pressure of 100 pounds, the fact that the seller has brought an action at law to recover the balance of the purchase price, stating the warranty as it appears in the written contract, does not preclude him from maintaining a suit in equity to reform the contract upon the ground that the pressure at which the required horse power was to be developed was by mistake stated at 100, instead of 130 pounds, since the effect of such change would not be to increase the complainant's own right, but merely to deprive the defendant of the right to maintain a cross action brought by him upon the guaranty as stated by plaintiff in his action at law. Providence Steam-Engine Co. v. Hathaway Mfg. Co. 79 Fed. 512.

c. Ability to ascertain real facts.

Mistake, to be available in equity for reformation of a contract or other written instrument, must not have arisen from negligence, where the means of knowledge were easily accessible. Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. ed. 798; Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827; Wooden v. Haviland, 18 Conn. 101; Davenport v. Lowry, 78 Ga. 89; Fitzpatrick v. Ringo, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 503, 5 S. W. 431; Haggerty v. McCanna, 25 N. J. Eq. 48; Fahie v. Pressey, 2 Or. 23, 80 Am. Dec. 401; Emerson v. Navarro, 31 Tex. 334, 98 Am. Dec. 534.

Unless there has been some accident or fraud. Fahie v. Pressey, supra.

The mistake or ignorance with reference to a contract, from which equity will relieve, must have been such that the party concerned could not, by reasonable diligence, have gotten knowledge of it when he was put upon inquiry. Deare v. Carr, 3 N. J. Eq. 513.

Contra, Monroe v. Skelton, 36 Ind. 302.

If the fact in reference to which a party alleges he was mistaken is one of which he might have obtained knowledge by reasonable diligence, equity will suppose that he must have had knowledge; it will be imputed to him. Taylor v. Fleet, 4 Barb. 95.

And where a party to a contract, through his own negligence, signs it without knowing or understanding its contents and when he has an opportunity to do so, a court of 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

equity will not reform it so as to make it express the alleged understanding of what it was to contain. Roundy v. Kent, 75 Iowa 662, 37 N. W. 146; Jenkins v. Clyde Coal Co. 82 Iowa, 618, 48 N. W. 970; Brown v. Fagan, 71 Mo. 563; Banta v. Garma, 1 Sandf. Ch. 383.

A party who is sui juris cannot, in the absence of fraud or imposition, deliberately sign a written contract, and then escape its obligation on the ground that he did not know its contents. Campbell v. Van Houten, 44 Mo. App. 231.

And a settlement of a claim for injuries to person and loss of property will not be rescinded on the ground that it was intended only to cover the loss of property, where there was no fraud, simply because the party seeking to set it aside failed to inform herself of what was contained in the agreement. Barker v. Northern P. R. Co. 65 Fed. 460.

And if a person enters into a contract with another between whom and himself no relation of especial trust or confidence exists, and it is reduced to writing by such other person, and the means of knowledge of the terms of the writing are equally open to both, and he signs it without reading or having it read by someone for him, he cannot avoid a liability created by the writing, even though its terms differ from the contract as agreed on verbally; and the fact that he is illiterate does not change the rule. Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558.

So, if a party can read, it is not open to him, after executing a deed or contract, to insist that the terms of it were different from what he supposed them to be when he signed it. Eldridge v. Dexter & P. R. Co. 88 Me. 191, 33 Atl. 974; Mitchell Mfg. Co. v. Kempner, 84 Ark. 349, 105 S. W. 880; Delinger v. Gillespie, 118 N. C. 731, 24 S. E. 538; Albrecht v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co. 87 Wis. 105, 41 Am. St. Rep. 30, 58 N. W. 72.

And where a person has the capacity to read a release signed by him, and an opportunity to do so, and no fraud was practised upon him to prevent him from reading it, but he chose to rely upon what another said about it, he is estopped by his own negligence from claiming that it is not legal and binding upon him according to its terms. Wallace v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 547, 25 N. W. 772; Spitze v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 75 Md. 162, 32 Am. St. Rep. 378, 23 Atl. 307.

And where a chattel mortgage not containing any power of sale was executed in the presence of the mortgagee, and he took possession of it without examining it, he cannot, in the absence of fraud or accident, introduce parol evidence to show that it was agreed by the parties that the mortgagor should execute an instrument under which the mortgagee could make his money out of the property without going into court, and thus authorize and confirm a sale of property which had already been made by the mortgagee without authority. Clack v. Wood, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 400, 37 S. W. 188.

And it has been held that the fact that the person seeking reformation could not read English, or understand the contents of the paper, is no excuse. Albrecht v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co. supra.

But the act, of a junior partner, of signing a contract without carefully reading it, upon the assertion of a self-constituted agent that the managing partner had read it and approved of it, which was false, the contract as signed not expressing the actual agreement between the parties, is not such gross negligence as to bar the right of reformation of the contract on the ground of fraud and mistake. Sutton v. Risser, 104 Iowa, 631, 74 N. W. 23.

Nor is a party to a contract, to whom it was read over before it was signed, entitled to a reformation thereof. Wolsey v. Neeley, 46 Ill. App. 387.

And where it was alleged that a party procured to be inserted in a deed a wrong description, by retaining the deed proffered by the other party and tendering to him a deed prepared by himself, and by representing that the descriptions in the two deeds were the same, no fiduciary relation or mutual mistake being charged, it was the party's own fault if he was imposed upon, no fraud being shown. Rushton v. Hallett, 8 Utah, 277, 30 Pac. 1014.

Nor will relief be granted on a claim of mistake in respect to the quantity in the conveyance of land, if the purchaser, with ordinary vigilance before the completion of the contract, by viewing the premises or properly settling the terms of the description, might have guarded against the alleged mistake. Marvin v. Bennett, 26 Wend. 169, affirming 8 Paige, 312.

And the fact that a person who signed a bond was an illiterate German and understood English imperfectly is immaterial as to his liability, where he was not obliged to sign the instrument unless he understood it, but, having signed without asking to have it read to him, he is bound by it. Weller's Appeal, 103 Pa. 594.

And where a written contract for the sale of machinery contained no provision requiring the seller to set up the machinery, and the purchaser claimed that there had been such an agreement between him and the seller's representative, and testified that the contract was completed when the representative prepared the written contract and the purchaser signed it, and that he did not have his spectacles with him, and could not read the fine print, the facts do not show such fault or mistake in the making of the contract as would authorize the purchaser to vary it by parol evidence, where it appears that at the time of the execution the purchaser's son was present, who could have read it, and the purchaser held the contract for several weeks without reading it or taking steps to repudiate it. Murray Co. v. Putman (Tex. Civ. App.) 130 S. W. 631.

And where a person purchased from another a bond for a deed of land, and at the time of the sale the vendor, who had the bond in his possession, stated that there was $600, maybe a little more or a little less, due thereon, and for several months afterwards the purchaser had the bond in his possession, but made no attempt to ascertain the actual amount due thereon, though he had the data necessary to the calculation, he is not entitled to a reformation of a note given therefor, though the amount due on the bond was $300 more than the amount stated by the vendor. Banfield v. Banfield, 24 Or. 571, 34 Pac. 659.

Where a man executes a contract, however, the bare fact that he did not read it or know its contents will not relieve him from it. Quimby v. Shearer, 56 Minn. 534, 58 N. W. 155.

And the rule that equity will not aid the negligent does not apply in its fullest sense to the correction of mistakes merely in the description of the property contracted about and as between the immediate parties to a deed; a description may be corrected though the mistake arose from negligence. Morrison v. Collier, 79 Ind. 417.

And a contract may be reformed for mutual mistake, though a party neglected to read it. Smelser v. Pugh, 29 Ind. App. 614, 64 N. E. 943.

So, where the evidence in an action to reform a deed was sufficient to satisfy the court that the deed did not express the intention of the parties and the plaintiff had been mistaken in supposing that it did, the fact of his having read the instrument would not prevent the court from finding that it was made under a mistake. Sullivan v. Moorhead, 99 Cal. 157, 33 Pac. 796.

And a contract for sale of land having provided that it should be subject to the operation of a mortgage, and the scrivener whom the grantee instructed to prepare the deed in conformity with the agreement having omitted reference to the mortgage, the deed will be reformed in equity notwithstanding the fact that the grantor merely asked, without looking to see, if the conveyance was made subject to the mortgage. Boulden v. Wood, 96 Md. 332, 53 Atl. 911.

So, the mistake of a lessee who could read English very imperfectly, and who relied upon the scrivener to read a lease given him before executing it, will not defeat his right to a reformation. Silbar v. Ryder, 63 Wis. 106, 23 N. W. 106.

And where a person buys premises subject to a mortgage and trusts the grantor to draw the conveyance, which he does, inserting a clause by which the purchaser assumes payment of the mortgage without the knowledge of the purchaser, the failure of the purchaser to examine her deed is not such negligence as to deprive her of her right to have the deed reformed by striking out the clause by which liability for the mortgage was assumed. Albany City Sav. Inst. v. Burdick, 87 N. Y. 40.

Nor does the failure of a party to a written contract to read it over a second time before execution, in order to verify erasures made in his presence and at his dictation, as matter of law, preclude him from obtaining a reformation of the contract, if it is found that the mistake was not due to his negligence, but to the error of the scrivener in making the erasures. West v. Suda, 69 Conn. 60, 36 Atl. 1015.

And if a lease was executed under a mistake of the lessor as to its contents, known or suspected by the lessee, the lessor will not be precluded from obtaining a reformation of the lease because of inattention to the writing of the lease by the notary who took the acknowledgment of the lessor. Wilson v. Moriarty, 88 Cal. 207, 26 Pac. 85.

And where both parties are mistaken as to the effect of a writing, and ignorant of its misstatement of the agreement between them, the failure of one to understand, through omission to read or give sufficient attention to its contents, cannot avail as a defense to the other, equally in fault, against a suit to correct such mistake. Kelley v. Ward, 94 Tex. 289, 60 S. W. 311.

Nor does it lie with the grantor or his heirs, or a purchaser from them without consideration, to insist that a mortgage placed by an heir upon his share of the property in the deed, in which a mistake was made, was not taken in good faith, on the ground that the mistake was such that it might have been discovered by a careful inspection of the record, where it does not appear that any of the parties did in fact discover it until after the mortgage was given. Cummings v. Freer, 26 Mich. 128.

d. Obligation to disclose.

If one party to a contract is under some moral or legal duty to make disclosures to the other, and fails to do so, the misconception by the other of the facts which should have been disclosed is not such negligence as will bar the injured party from equitable relief from this mistake.

Thus, the fact that a wife relied upon her husband to prepare a deed according to their mutual understanding, and rested in the belief that it was so made, and did not ascertain or know that it did not express their intentions, does not necessarily constitute laches on her part, nor deny to her or her heirs the right to make mistake and misapprehension a ground for reformatory relief. Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652.

And where a husband, after deserting his wife, proposed to her to join him in conveying a tract of land to their children, reserving to her the rents and profits during her life, and the wife, who was unable to read, in good faith joined in the execution of the deed, but the husband procured the deed to be so written that it would convey the fee to the children without the reservation of rents and profits agreed upon, and the deed was signed by the wife upon the representation of the husband that it was prepared in accordance with the agreement, she had a right to rely on her husband's sincerity, and had a sufficient excuse for not having the deed read to her. Koons v. Blanton, 129 Ind. 383, 27 N. E. 334.

So, where the relations between a vendor and vendee are so intimate and friendly that the vendee has every confidence in the vendor, the vendee's failure to examine the deed to land purchased by him, before accepting it, does not prevent him from seeking equitable relief where the deed does not conform to the contract of sale. McDonald v. Yungbluth, 46 Fed. 836.

And where, by a written agreement between two persons, one agreed to convey land to the other subject to an encumbrance on it of $9,000, and the purchaser agreed to pay the seller $15,000 by conveying to him land, some of it subject to an encumbrance, and the seller, without any further bargain, delivered to the buyer a deed conveying the land subject to the encumbrance, and also containing a clause stating that the buyer assumes and agrees to pay the debt secured by the encumbrance as a part of the consideration of the conveyance, and the buyer, being ill, did not read the clause in the deed respecting the assumption of the debt, but discovered it afterwards, and promptly brought suit to have the deed reformed, the purchaser had the right to presume that the deed would conform to the written agreement, and was not guilty of such negligence or laches in not observing the provisions of the deed as should preclude him from relief, and he was entitled to have the deed reformed. Elliott v. Sackett, 108 U. S. 132, 27 L. ed. 678, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375.

And where a man contracted verbally with an agent to furnish and put up certain lightning rods at a cost not to exceed $100, and the agent presented him with a paper for his signature, which he said was the order for the work, and the man, not being able to read without spectacles, and having none at hand, requested the agent to read the paper, though several others were present, and the agent read, or pretended to read, the paper, but omitted to read anything about the price to be paid, whereupon the man put his signature to it, and it turned out that the paper contained a stipulation on his part to pay something more than $400 for the work, the signer of the instrument was held to be not guilty of such negligence or want of diligence as to enable the other party to recover on the instrument. Cole Bros. v. Williams, 12 Neb. 440, 11 N. W. 875.

And where a corporation executed a deed for leasehold property which it had held under a long-term lease containing a provision for a reversion to the lessor for breach of a condition subsequent, and its deed contained a covenant of warranty, which did not except such right of reversion, and such right having been exercised, it was sued on its covenant by its grantee, its attention having been particularly drawn to the omission, and it having executed the deed after verbal assurance from its agent contrary to the plain terms of its covenant, if the deed did not express its true intent it was due to its own fault or negligence, and it was not entitled to a reformation of the same in equity on the ground of either mistake, fraud, or accident. Great Western Mfg. Co. v. Adams, 99 C. C. A. 615, 176 Fed. 325.

e. Delay in seeking relief.

1. Generally.

A party injured by a mistake in a written instrument should take steps promptly to get relief in equity, and if he is guilty of laches he cannot complain if, by reason thereof, he is a sufferer. Beard v. Hubble, 9 Gill, 420; Ætna Indemnity Co. v. Baltimore, S. P. & C. R. Co. 112 Md. 389, 76 Atl. 251; Hunt v. Stuart, 53 Md. 225; Yocum v. Foreman, 14 Bush, 494; Beers v. Hendrickson, 6 Rebt. 53.

Relief in the way of reformation of a written instrument should not be granted where the party seeking it has unreasonably delayed bringing suit. Snell v. Atlantic L. & M. Ins. Co. 98 U. S. 85, 25 L. ed. 52; Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 392, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827; Hurto v. Grant, 90 Iowa, 414, 57 N. W. 899; Paulison v. Van Iderstine, 28 N. J. Eq. 306; Newman v. Milner, 2 Ves. Jr. 483.

And this is especially true where the dealing is with respect to speculative property which is liable to large and constant fluctuation in value. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827.

Where a person desires to rescind a contract upon the ground of mistake or fraud he must, upon the discovery of the facts, at once announce his purpose, and adhere to it. Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. ed. 798; Sable v. Maloney, 48 Wis. 331, 4 N. W. 479.

The length of time which an instrument remained in a party's hands without his asserting that it contained a different contract from that actually entered into is a circumstance to be weighed as bearing upon the truth of his claim that the instrument did not conform to the contract. Bidwell v. Astor Mut. Ins. Co. 16 N. Y. 263.

And a mistake the only ground for which is alleged to be want of counsel and well-considered advice, which led the party into error in signing the agreement, will not be deemed a ground for relief where a great length of time elapsed before relief was sought for. Salinas v. Stillman, 14 C. C. A. 50, 30 U. S. App. 40, 66 Fed. 677; White v. Campbell, 80 Va. 180.

Nor will a vendee of land satisfying a mortgage thereon and canceling it be substituted to the place of the mortgagee, where, through his gross neglect, he has failed to discover the existence of a prior encumbrance on the land, under which it is sold. Garwood v. Eldridge, 2 N. J. Eq. 145, 34 Am. Dec. 195.

And where a mortgagee who holds a certificate of purchase of the mortgaged premises sells and assigns the certificate, the assignee thereof acquires all the rights of the assignor under the certificate, and the assignor cannot, after the year of redemption 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

has expired and a deed has been issued to the assignee, maintain an action for the reformation and foreclosure of the mortgage. Whipperman v. Dunn, 124 Ind. 349, 24 N. E. 166, 1045.

So, where a written agreement was prepared at the instance of a party to it and read over to him before signing, and an alleged error was afterward discovered in it, but he made no effort to reform it, and omitted to claim that there was any error or mistake for about two years, when he was sued upon the contract, he cannot then contend that there is a mistake in it, in that it does not represent the true contract between the parties, where he fails to give any evidence as to the preparation of the instrument and makes no attempt to explain the manner in which the alleged mistake occurred. Fitschen v. Thomas, 9 Mont. 52, 22 Pac. 450.

And when a writing is in form an absolute conveyance with a right to repurchase at an early date, and the securities are surrendered and the full price of the land paid, and the grantor lies by for years without complaining or taking any steps toward redemption, and in the meantime the grantee, in apparent good faith, disposes of the premises, this makes a strong case against granting relief, and warrants denying redemption to the grantor. Mellish v. Robertson, 25 Vt. 603.

So, where two persons made an agreement, and one of them died over twenty years afterwards, and the other was not ignorant of what was written in the agreement, or could have been informed if he used due diligence, and the agreement was at all times accessible to him, and on one occasion he procured its production for another purpose, an application to have it reformed, made twenty-two years after it was made, is barred by the lapse of time. Keedy v. Nally, 63 Md. 311.

And a very strong showing is required to justify a court in reforming a deed to land in which strangers have subsequently acquired rights, after the lapse of a quarter of a century. Varner v. Turner, 83 Ark. 131, 102 S. W. 1111.

And more than twenty years after a mistake occurred in a deed of trust to secure creditors, it cannot be reformed against the intervening rights of others acquired in good faith. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Montgomery, 95 U. S. 16, 24 L. ed. 346.

And where a man deeded a house and lot to a trustee for the use and benefit of himself and his wife during their joint lives, and to the survivor of them, and to the children of the wife by a former husband, and to such children as might be born to them, and afterwards the wife and the trustee and one of the children died, and the grantor married again, and there was a great lapse of time between the drawing of the deed and the institution of the suit to rescind it, this, coupled with the death of the wife, the scrivener, and one of the children, and the second marriage of the grantor, demands the strongest proof of the scrivener's mistake in drawing a deed, instead of a will, to justify the court in rescinding the deed. Weidebusch v. Hartenstein, 12 W. Va. 760.

So, persons desirous of opening a settlement, on the ground of error or mistake, must make haste in their application to the court. Long acquiescence amounts to a presumed ratification. Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349.

And a court of equity will not direct payments, made under a mistaken construction of a doubtful clause in a settlement, to be refunded after many years of acquiescence by all the parties, and after the death of one of the authors of the settlement, especially where subsequent family arrangements have proceeded on a footing of that construction. Clifton v. Cockburn, 3 Myl. & K. 76.

That suit was not immediately commenced, on discovery of a mistake in a written instrument, however, does not bar the right to have it reformed; the complainant is justified in exhausting persuasion before resorting to litigation. Metropolitan Lumber Co. v. Lake Superior Ship Canal R. & Iron Co. 101 Mich. 577, 60 N. W. 278.

And this is especially the case where the complainant never gave the defendants reason to suppose he had abandoned or intended to waive his claim, and no injury resulted to the defendants from the delay, and it was admitted by the party who negotiated the contract that he understood that the omitted matter was a part of the contract. Ibid.

There is no rule of law fixing the period within which a man may discover that a writing does not express the contract which he supposes it to contain, and which bars him of relief, for delay in asserting his rights, other than that contained in the statute of limitations. Bidwell v. Astor Mut. Ins. Co. 16 N. Y. 263.

A party to a contract seeking relief from a mistake therein is not chargeable with laches if he moves, within a reasonable time after discovering the mistake, to seek relief therefrom. Livingstone v. Murphy, 187 Mass. 315, 105 Am. St. Rep. 400, 72 N. E. 1012; De Forest v. Walters, 153 N. Y. 229, 47 N. E. 294; Hill v. Kuhlman, 31 C. C. A. 87, 59 U. S. App. 82, 87 Fed. 498.

And a party having a legal title to land, but who is ignorant of his rights, does not forfeit his title by his silence, though he knows that another is about to purchase the land from a third person. Lammot v. Bowly, 6 Harr. & J. 500.

And lapse of time since the execution of a deed is no objection to having it reformed in equity according to the real intention of the parties making it, if that intention has been acted upon by both parties, and those claiming under the deed, until within a short time of the application. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373; Harris v. Ivey, 114 Ala. 363, 21 So. 422; Schautz v. Keener, 87 Ind. 258.

Nor is a delay of eleven months in asking for reformation of a mortgage for a mutual mistake such laches as will bar the right as against a subsequent mortgagee 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

with knowledge of the mistake. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Judy, 146 Ind. 322, 43 N. E. 259.

And where the mistake in a mortgage is in the terms of payment, delay in moving to correct the mistake, and payment by the mortgagor of an instalment, or a promise to pay, as specified in the mortgage, though under protest, asserting the mistake, furnish no ground for a denial of relief in the way of reformation, to which he is entitled. Andrews v. Gillespie, 47 N. Y. 487.

And where a father made a deed to his son conveying a tract of land in fee, and afterwards sought in equity to have a provision inserted reserving to himself a life estate, the relief asked for by him, being entirely of an equitable nature, is not barred by the statute of limitations until the lapse of three years from the discovery by him of the fraud upon his rights. Day v. Day, 84 N. C. 408.

So, where less than four years have intervened, and the plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, have been in actual possession of the land in question all the time, though under a deed erroneously describing the property, and the defendant has not been prejudiced, and no issue of laches is made either by the pleadings or the evidence, the plaintiff is not barred of his relief on the ground of want of diligence. Long v. Gilbert, 133 Ga. 691, 66 S. E. 894.

And if, through a mutual and innocent mistake in settling the accounts of a partnership, one partner gives to the other a promissory note for a much larger sum than that due from him, upon a bill in equity for the correction of the mistake laches is not necessarily to be inferred from the lapse of more than six years, and the payment of more than half the principal of the note, and the regular payment of interest, before discovery of the mistake. Gould v. Emerson, 160 Mass. 438, 39 Am. St. Rep. 501, 35 N. E. 1065.

In the absence of a statute of limitation barring the bringing of an action for the reformation and correction of a written instrument on the ground of mistake, it is an essential element of laches which will bar such an action, that a party to be charged with it should have knowledge of the matter involved, or, after notice, have failed or omitted to obtain knowledge where it might be found, or that there must have been circumstances which should have induced an inquiry from such party concerning it. Wall v. Meilke, 89 Minn. 232, 94 N. W. 688.

And where there is a mutual and innocent mistake on the part of both vendor and vendee as to the quantity of land named in a deed, the statute of limitations begins to run against the vendee from the discovery of the mistake, and not from the date of the deed. Emerson v. Mavarro, 31 Tex. 334, 98 Am. Dec. 534.

Nor does the statute of limitations begin to run against an action for the reformation of a deed until the assertion of an adverse claim against the party seeking reformation. State v. Lorenz, 22 Wash. 289, 60 Pac. 644;

Perrior v. Peck, 39 App. Div. 390, 57 N. Y. Supp. 377, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 582, 60 N. E. 1118.

In cases of mistake as well as of fraud, courts of equity will not consider the statute of limitations as running until after the discovery of the mistake, as laches cannot be imputed to the injured party till the discovery of the fraud or mistake has been made. Stearns v. Page, 7 How. 819, 12 L. ed. 928; Gould v. Emerson, 160 Mass. 438, 39 Am. St. Rep. 501, 35 N. E. 1065; Perrior v. Peck, supra; Perry v. Williams, 40 Misc. 57, 81 N. Y. Supp. 204.

Or when by the use of due diligence it ought to have been discovered. Gould v. Emerson, supra.

Lapse of time applied by courts of equity in analogy to the statute of limitations will be reckoned only from the time of the discovery of the mistake, in cases purely equitable, and not cognizable in a court of law, where in otherwise proper cases it is sought, on the ground of mistake, to reform and enforce an agreement for the conveyance of real estate, and the correcting of the mistake involves no change of possession, no disturbance of investments made by the party against whom the correction is sought, and leaves the enjoyment of the property to go on in harmony with the prior acts of the parties in interest. Ormsby v. Longworth, 11 Ohio St. 653.

And the statute of limitations does not begin to run against a defendant in ejectment in possession of land excepted out of a sale by the sheriff, under execution, so as to bar such defendant's right to the relief of having the sheriff's deed reformed so as to show that such land had been so excepted, until the suit is commenced. Bartlett v. Judd, 21 N. Y. 200, 78 Am. Dec. 131.

So, a bill to reform a contract for a mistake in it may be maintained after an action at law thereon has been defeated. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. v. Hearne, 20 Wall. 494, 22 L. ed. 398, affirming 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300.

And a party to a contract who has sought and failed to obtain from the court a decision in his favor upon the construction of it is competent to institute an action to have the contract set aside for mistake. Wilding v. Sanderson [1897] 2 Ch. 534.

Nor is a surety guilty of laches in instituting a suit to have a bond canceled or reformed which, by mutual mistake, made him personally liable for the amount of a judgment, until an attempt is made to hold him personally liable for such amount on the bond. Griswold v. Hazard, 141 U. S. 200, 35 L. ed. 678, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, 900.

And where a mortgage is given in payment for land under a misapprehension as to the grantor's title, upon suit being brought to foreclose the mortgage, laches cannot be imputed to the mortgagor so as to bar his defense, where the mistake was not discovered by him until the foreclosure suit was brought. Wilson v. Ott, 173 Pa. 253, 51 Am. St. Rep. 767, 34 Atl. 23.

years, to bring suit for the correction of a deed from which part of the land intended to be conveyed was, by mutual mistake, omitted, show laches where relations of mutual trust and confidence existed between the grantor and grantee, and the grantee commenced suit as soon as he discovered the mistake. Wilson v. Wilson, 23 Nev. 267, 45 Pac. 1009; Pavloski v. Klassing (Ga.) 68 S. E. 511.

And, where notes were executed by trustees, and it was the belief and intention of the parties that the trustees were not liable thereon personally, but subsequently, in an action against the trustees individually, it was determined that they were personally liable, whereupon the trustees immediately sued to reform the notes so as to render them payable from the trust estate, the fact that the trustees had not taken steps to reform the notes until after the trust funds had been disposed of is no objection to the maintenance of the suit, it having been commenced within a reasonable time after the mistake became known. Richmond v. Ogden Street R. Co. 44 Or. 48, 74 Pac. 333.

And where a mortgage covering the northeast quarter of a section of land was foreclosed, but, by mistake, the decree ordered the sale of the southeast quarter, and the commissioner advertised and sold the land as misdescribed, and the purchaser conveyed the east half of the land as mortgaged, and his grantee filed a bill to rectify the title and secure a release from defendants, who claimed under a deed executed by the mortgagor after the foreclosure sale, with full knowledge of the error in the commissioner's deed, the purchaser has an interest in having the mistake corrected, and as the record of the foreclosure sale, if not the decree itself, furnishes a means of determining what land was really meant, lapse of time is no bar to such correction, as all the papers must be read together. Merrifield v. Ingersoll, 61 Mich. 4, 27 N. W. 714.

So, courts of equity are liberal in allowing mistakes to be corrected when they are clearly established, notwithstanding the acquiescence of the party, providing no injury has resulted in the meantime to the person against whom the relief is sought or those claiming under him. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88.

And the lapse of nearly three years from the making of an error in a contract to the filing of a bill to reform the contract, in the absence of a substantial change of conditions, is not sufficient to bar a party's right of reformation. Providence Steam Engine Co. v. Hathaway Mfg. Co. 79 Fed. 512.

And where land jointly owned was partitioned among four sisters, and by mistake it was conveyed in fee to their husbands, the fact that for more than twenty years one of the husbands was in possession and his wife never called upon him to rectify the mistake, or complained of it to him, does not bar her right or that of her representatives to have the deed reformed, where his right of possession as husband was unquestionable, and there was nothing in the manner of his possession adapted to awaken suspicion that the deed was not what it should be, and neither she nor her sisters had knowledge of the mistake until about a year and a half before her death, shortly after which the proceeding was commenced. Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 139.

Nor does the lapse of three years between the discovery of a mistake and the filing of a bill to correct it show such laches as will deprive the party of the right to relief, when it appears that the defendant was insolvent and the plaintiff made repeated efforts to have the mistake corrected without the expense of a lawsuit. Thompson v. Marshall, 36 Ala. 504, 76 Am. Dec. 328.

And where a husband, after deserting his wife, proposed to her to join him in conveying a tract of land to their children, reserving to her the rents and profits during her life, but procured the deed to be so written that it conveyed the fee to the children without the reservation agreed upon, and the wife surrendered her possession of the land at the request of the children's guardian, and the guardian rented the land and expended part of the rents in the improvement of the land and part of it in compensating the wife for the maintenance of the children, and had anticipated the rents and profits for several years in advance, a delay upon the part of the widow of nine years in bringing suit to have the conveyance reformed is not such laches as will bar her action. Koons v. Blanton, 129 Ind. 383, 27 N. E. 334.

So, an action for the reformation of a deed on the claim that it does not contain a reservation in favor of the plaintiff, to which, under a prior contract between the parties, he was entitled, is not based upon the rescission of any contract for fraud so as to be within the rule requiring immediate disaffirmance; it seeks the performance of the contract; and while, if there has been unreasonable delay in seeking relief, it will be refused, it is within the discretion of the court, under all the circumstances, to grant or refuse it. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525.

And the fact that a grantor does not begin an action against a subsequent grantee immediately upon discovery of a mistake in the deed to the prior grantee does not amount to laches, where such subsequent grantee is chargeable with knowledge of the mistake. Dennis v. Northern P. R. Co. 20 Wash. 320, 55 Pac. 210.

And where notes and a mortgage were given under an agreement that if the payee died before his wife she would be the sole owner of the property, and if she died first he should be the sole owner, which understanding, by mistake, was not included in the written agreement, a delay upon the part of the husband for four years before bringing an action to reform the notes and mortgage, including two years after her death, is not such laches as to bar his remedy by way of reforming the notes and mortgage, especially where the statute of limitations gives a longer period for bringing such actions. Kropp v. Kropp, 97 Wis. 137, 72 N. W. 381.

If fraud and mistake are admitted as an exception to the running of the statute of limitations, however, they will only prevent the running of the statute until the fraud and mistake are discovered, or by the use of reasonable diligence might have been discovered by the party applying for relief. Smith v. Fly, 24 Tex. 345, 76 Am. Dec. 109.

And after the lapse of forty-four years equity will refuse to interfere to correct a mistake in the description in a deed, especially against an innocent purchaser, but where only nine years have intervened, and the complainant has been in actual possession all the time, though under an erroneous deed, and the defendant has not been prejudiced, relief will not be denied on the ground of want of diligence. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88.

And whether the time which would bar an action of ejectment for the recovery of land, or a verbal contract for the payment of money or for damages for an injury, elapsed before the discovery of an excess in the quantity of land sold, would bar a suit in equity for the rescission of the contract or for compensation for the excess, or not, the grantor must bring his suit within a reasonable time after the discovery of the mistake. He is not entitled to the time from the sale and conveyance to the discovery of the mistake, and the additional time thereafter that would bar an action, within which to bring his suit. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

And where a person for whom another held the legal title to land, upon advice of counsel, procured the property to be conveyed in trust for the benefit of himself and his wife and the survivor, and on the death of both the same to be conveyed to their children or descendants per stirpes, the deed will not be set aside after the lapse of twenty years, during which time the disposition so made had been acquiesced in, on the ground of a mistake in not inserting a power of revocation, unless the proof of that fact is of the most satisfactory kind. Finucan v. Kendig, 109 Ill. 198.

So, it has been held that where the statute of limitations, making the running of the statute to depend upon discovery, is limited to actions for fraud, cases of mistake are excluded from its operation, so that the ordinary statute would run from the time of the mistake. Exkorn v. Exkorn, 1 App. Div. 124, 37 N. Y. Supp. 68. But see later New York cases set forth supra this section.

2. Application to insurance contracts.

Whether an insured person was guilty of laches in not discovering a mistake in the policy, and seeking to have it corrected before loss and suit brought thereon, is a question for the jury, there being no arbitrary rule fixing the time within which such relief must be sought, unless it be the period of limitation applicable to such an equitable suit. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 283.

And the acceptance and retention of an insurance policy until the expiration of fifteen years, without taking any steps for reformation, deprives the person insured of the right to reformation. Avery v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 117 N. Y. 451, 23 N. E. 3.

And where an insured in a tontine life policy kept the policy for eleven years in ignorance of the fact that it did not guarantee his share in the surplus at a specified sum, but only provided for a share in the surplus based on experience, and kept it for four years more with knowledge of the fact, and until the completion of the accumulative period had demonstrated what his share of the surplus would be, on the contingent plan adopted by the insurer, he cannot sue to reform the policy so as to make it guarantee his share in the surplus at a specified sum, in accordance with a preliminary contract between himself and the soliciting agent, binding the insurer. Langdon v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 92 N. E. 440.

So, where a person obtained life insurance with an ordinary life policy, the character of which plainly appeared in print, both on the margin and in the body of the policy, and he paid the premium thereon for ten years, but, when called upon for the eleventh annual premium, he alleged that he had applied for a ten-year paid-up policy, and had supposed that he had one, equity will not interfere to compel the issuance of a paid-up policy, or to rescind the contract and recover for him the premiums paid, since, by the use of reasonable diligence, he might have had knowledge of the truth. Massey v. Cotton States L. Ins. Co. 70 Ga. 794.

And where a son took out a policy of insurance in his own name upon his father's property, the father being privy thereto, so that, in case of loss, the proceeds thereof might be protected from garnishment by the father's creditors, the father and son, joining as plaintiffs, cannot ask that the policy be reformed so that the loss which occurred shall be payable to the father, and he cannot recover thereon, and the son cannot recover for the benefit of his father, where the policy limited the right of recovery to himself. Baldwin v. State Ins. Co. 60 Iowa, 497, 15 N. W. 300.

An insurance company issuing a renewal policy, and promising that the renewal policy should be on the same terms with the old one, however, is not in a position to charge the insured with neglect in not discovering that it was not the same. Palmer v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 54 Conn. 488, 9 Atl. 248.

And where a policy of insurance was issued in renewal of an old policy, materially changing its terms, and this policy was renewed from time to time, and the insured person did not discover the change until 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

after a loss, the only effect of the negligence of the insured in not discovering the change, and in not sooner seeking relief, is to make the granting of relief discretionary with the court. Hay v. Star F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 235, 33 Am. Rep. 607.

And where an insurance policy expired, and the assured applied for a renewal in the same terms, and a policy was given him, supposed by him to be a renewal on the same terms, and he omitted to examine the policy until after a loss of property by fire, several months later, when, on reading it, he discovered an improper variance from the former policy, materially affecting his right of recovery, the existence of which would have prevented him from accepting the policy had he known it, he will not be regarded as guilty of laches in not examining the policy and applying earlier for its correction, since he had a right to believe it to be in all essential respects like the former policy. Palmer v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. supra.

Nor does the mere failure of an insured person to read the application or the copy of it on the policy, or to read the policy, constitute such negligence as will deprive him of the right to a reformation of the policy to correct a mistake of the agent. Fitchner v. Fidelity Mut. Fire Asso. 103 Iowa, 276, 72 N. W. 530.

And an assured person who has fully, truthfully, and in good faith answered all the required questions put to him by the agent of the insurance company is not guilty of negligence in signing the application, when such agent has prepared it, without reading it, and it is immaterial whether the agent acted dishonestly or mistakenly, and it is not necessary to reform such application in order to secure a recovery on the policy. Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Lunkenheimer, 127 Ind. 536, 26 N. E. 1082.

Nor can lapse of time be relied upon to bar a suit in equity to reform a policy of insurance which is auxiliary to an action already commenced at law upon the policy, if the latter was brought within the time limited. Rosenbaum v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 3 L.R.A. 189, 37 Fed. 724.

The line of distinction would seem to be that an insured person must not permit himself to remain ignorant of material features of his policy which would and should be observed by reasonably careful men, but that reasonable delay in discovering changes made by the insurer which he had no reason to anticipate, or in discovering errors of the agent in making out the policy, is not laches which will bar reformation.

f. Waiver, confirmation.

1. By Acquiescence.

The general rule is that relief in the way of reformation of a written instrument should not be granted where the party seeking it has acquiesced in the written agreement after becoming aware of the mistake. Snell v. Atlantic F. & M. Ins. Co. 98 U. S. 85, 25 L. ed. 52.

And a plaintiff bringing forward a document on which he founds his right cannot be allowed to say that the instrument which he himself produces to the court does not express the real agreement into which he has entered. Druiff v. Parker, L. R. 5 Eq. 131.

And where a bond is executed by one member of a firm, all of the members intending the instrument should bind them, and the obligee, after discovery of the mistake, pursues the individual maker of the bond, this is a ratification of the instrument which will prevent relief against the copartners in equity. McNaughten v. Partidge, 11 Ohio, 223, 38 Am. Dec. 731.

So, where, in case of a parol agreement as to land, a third person has been permitted to act upon his conception of the rights thereunder, not questioned, a party to the contract cannot object that he acquiesced under expectations from that person which were in part disappointed. Stockley v. Stockley, 1 Ves. & B. 23.

And where a ground rent was advertised and sold at public auction as irredeemable, and the purchaser bought it as irredeemable, relying on such representations, and after the purchase, the owner procured a title policy of insurance in which the ground rent was insured as irredeemable, and settlement was then made, and the money was received and afterwards invested by the original owner, the present owner has no standing in equity to have the contract of sale set aside. Clapp v. Hoffman, 159 Pa. 531, 28 Atl. 362.

Nor can a mutual mistake in the calls of a deed, conveying land in excess of that bargained for, be corrected at the suit of the vendor, where, after the discovery of the mistake, he received payment of the purchase money for the land thus conveyed, and yielded possession thereof to the vendee. Wittbecker v. Walters, 69 Tex. 470, 6 S. W. 788.

And where a deed contained a condition that it was to be held in the maker's possession till his death, and the scrivener who wrote it inserted it of his own motion, for the protection of the grantor, but read it over to the grantor before he signed it, a court of equity will not strike out the clause, where he held it for over a year without asking to have it so stricken out. Griffin v. Miller, 188 Mo. 327, 87 S. W. 455.

So, where land conveyed to husband and wife jointly is devised by him in severalty in different parts to his children, one portion thereof being devised to his wife for life, with remainder to two daughters, and there is also devised to the wife other property, all of which she accepts in ignorance of such joint title in the land, she is thereafter estopped from asserting any other interest in the land than was devised to her, unless, upon obtaining information of such joint interest, she renounces the will, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) and surrenders all interests acquired thereby. Tolley v. Poteet, 62 W. Va. 231, 57 S. E. 811.

And where a husband and wife were seized of an estate by entireties, and the husband by will directed the land to be sold, and the proceeds divided amongst his wife and children, and died, leaving his wife and a number of children, and the land was sold under an order of the orphans' court, and bought by two of the children, at the request of the widow, who received her share of the proceeds, in accordance with the will, the heirs are estopped by her acts, and if she was ignorant of her rights, she is estopped upon the principle that when one of two innocent persons must suffer, it shall be he who causes the injury. Maple v. Kussart, 53 Pa. 348, 91 Am. Dec. 214.

And where the name of a wife was inserted in a deed as grantee instead of that of her husband, and the draftsman of the deed testified that he did it without authority, a reformation of the deed by substituting the husband's name therein will not be ordered, where the deed was delivered to the husband for examination, and kept by him for a day before its execution, and the design was to effectuate a division of lands between the husband and the grantors therein, who were joint owners with him, and from the date of the execution of the deed to the date of the husband's death, a period of seven years, he never mentioned that any mistake was made in the deed, and exercised dominion and control over the land, and the wife claimed an undivided interest in the land, which was recognized by the husband. Hough v. Smith, 132 Ala. 204, 31 So. 500.

So, where a person holding a mortgage and bond given for purchase money voluntarily relinquished the mortgage, and canceled the bond, and took another mortgage for the same debt, knowing that an intervening mortgage on the same premises, previously given, was outstanding, and upon a sale of the premises, subsequently made, consented to give up his second mortgage, and both mortgagees took new mortgages in the place of their old ones, the mortgagee who had previously surrendered the purchase-money mortgage voluntarily assenting to the priority of the other's mortgage, he is not entitled to have the outstanding mortgage postponed, so as to give priority to his mortgage over it. Hinchman v. Emans, 1 N. J. Eq. 100.

And if a landowner has appropriated water for a mill, and leased it in connection therewith, the lessee is entitled, in the absence of actual notice, to infer that there is no restriction upon the water rights, and mere constructive notice from the record of a deed, limiting those rights, will not estop him from recovering rent which he has paid to the lessor in the belief that no such limitation existed. Bedell v. Wilder, 65 Vt. 406, 36 Am. St. Rep. 871, 26 Atl. 589.

And where an executor, acting on the advice of counsel on the construction of a will, proposed to divide in certain proportions a fund between two legatees, and one of the legatees, being dissatisfied, took the opinion of counsel, which agreed with the former opinion, and the executor then divided and paid over the fund in accordance with the opinions, the dissatisfied legatee cannot, two years afterwards, file a bill against the executor and the other legatee, alleging that the will had been wrongly construed, and claiming repayment from the other legatee. Rogers v. Ingham, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 351.

So, where the drawer of a bill of exchange, knowing that time had been given by the holder to the acceptor, but apprehending that he was still liable upon the bill, in default of the acceptor's payment three months after it was due, said that he knew he was liable, and if the acceptor did not pay it, he would, he is bound by such promise. Stevens v. Lynch, 12 East, 38.

And where a person who had been induced to sign a promissory note, on which suit had been brought, as surety, through the agency of the principal maker and payee, by fraudulent representations that would have been for him a valid defense in a suit thereon after the note had matured, with a full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, but ignorant that the fraud was a defense at law, voluntarily requested the payee to extend the time of payment of the note, which was done, and upon that consideration promised to pay, he thereby waived his defense to the note. Rindskopf v. Doman, 28 Ohio St. 520.

So, where a person misconceives his remedy, either because the facts turn out to be different from what he supposed them to be, or the law applicable to the facts is found to be different than supposed, and he proceeds to judgment, but is unsuccessful, if a second remedy invoked is in equity, and the defendant would be seriously prejudiced by plaintiff's mistake if he were permitted to proceed the second time, the court may apply the principle of estoppel in pais if necessary to prevent injustice. Rowell v. Smith, 123 Wis. 510, 102 N. W. 1, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 773.

In order to work confirmation of an instrument, however, the party alleged to confirm must know the law as well as the fact. Cockerell v. Cholmeley, 1 Russ. & M. 418.

And the continued possession of a lessee, and payment of rent after the time when, according to an oral agreement, left out of the lease by mistake of the scrivener, repairs were to have been made, in expectation that they would be made, does not operate as a waiver of the agreement in that respect. Silbar v. Ryder, 63 Wis. 106, 23 N. W. 106.

Nor does a defendant in an action for the reformation of a written instrument waive his objections to the ruling of the court allowing submission of the question of reformation by his subsequently addressing the jury on that question as one of fact that they were to determine. Skiba v. Gustin (Mich.) 126 N. W. 464.

So, where a deceased person left specific bequests to different persons of his family, and without taking advice, they assumed that one of the sons took a life interest only, and during the life of that son, and till the time of filing the bill, which was twenty-four years after his death, all the persons of the family believed, and did many acts on the belief, that the title of the deceased son expired with his life, this was not such an acquiescence in a family arrangement as prevented the son's personal representatives from enforcing their claim, and the length of time was not a bar under the statute of limitations, for the will created a trust. Bullock v. Downes, 9 H. L. Cas. 1.

And where a wife agrees to join her husband in a deed conveying a tract of land to their children, reserving to her the rents and profits during her life, but he procures a deed without the reservation, a judgment for alimony, recovered by the wife in a suit for divorce after the execution of the deed, is no bar to an action by the wife for the reformation of the deed, since there is no question of property rights between the husband and wife. Koons v. Blanton, 129 Ind. 383, 27 N. E. 334.

2. By attempt to enforce.

A contract cannot be rescinded for mistake as to its terms, where the party seeking to rescind completed the contract, and afterwards brought an action to reform it. Grant Marble Co. v. Abbot, 142 Wis. 279, 124 N. W. 264.

Nor can a promissory note be reformed after judgment has been taken upon it. Heavenridge v. Mondy, 49 Ind. 434.

And where a person who entered into a contract brought an action upon it which he prosecuted to final judgment not only in the circuit court, but on appeal, and declared upon the contract as it was written, and admitted in the agreed case that the work was done under the contract, and a dispute arose as to the meaning of the contract with reference to the rule of measurement of the work done, it was then too late to go into equity for a correction of an alleged mistake in the contract with reference thereto. Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106.

And where an action is brought against an indorser of notes, and it is sought to reform them, it is competent for the defendants to plead and prove, as tending to show the absence of mistake, that after the notes were in default, the payee retained them, and in an individual capacity entered suit thereon in a justice's court, and prosecuted it to appeal. Jackson v. McCalla, 133 Ga. 749, 66 S. E. 918.

Where a defendant in a suit at law has only a purely equitable defense, which could not be made available to him in a court of law, however, he is not estopped from seeking equitable relief because of a judgment thereon in a court of law by the mere fact that he did not invoke the power of equity thereto until after the judgment at law was rendered. Stevens v. Hertzler, 114 Ala. 503, 22 So. 121.

And a justice's suit upon notes would not estop the person bringing it from maintaining, as administratrix, a suit in equity to reform the notes, on the plea that they were payable to her personally, when they should have been payable to her as administratrix. Jackson v. McCalla, supra.

Nor does the mere commencement of an action for damages for breach of a written contract, the action being afterwards dismissed without a determination on the merits, conclusively bar a subsequent action for reformation of the contract for a mistake in it. Spurr v. Home Ins. Co. 40 Minn. 424, 42 N. W. 206.

And the unsuccessful use of a remedy supposed to be, but in effect not, appropriate to vindicate the right of a particular matter, either because the facts turn out to be different from what the plaintiff supposed them to be, or the law applicable to the facts is found to be different than supposed, though the action proceeds to judgment, does not preclude the plaintiff from thereafter invoking the proper remedy, and neither the doctrine of election nor res judicata applies. Rowell v. Smith, 123 Wis. 510, 102 N. W. 1, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 773.

And a bill to reform a contract may be sustained after an action at law thereon has been defeated. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. v. Hearne, 20 Wall. 494, 22 L. ed. 398, affirming 4 Cliff. 192, Fed. Cas. No. 6,300.

VII. Remedies.

a. General rules.

Where a mistake in a written instrument is of so fundamental a character that the minds of the parties have never in fact met, or where an unconscionable advantage has been gained by mere mistake or misapprehension, and there was no gross negligence upon the part of the person injured thereby, either in falling into the error, or in not sooner claiming redress, and no intervening rights have accrued, and the parties may still be placed in statu quo, a court of equity will interfere in its discretion, to prevent intolerable injustice. Brown v. Lamphear, 35 Vt. 252.

If the written contract is untrue, and misstates the real agreement as made and understood by both parties, in some essential particular, then the contract is a mistaken one, and the mistake may be corrected in equity. Botsford v. McLean, 45 Barb. 478; Whitehead v. Brown, 18 Ala. 682; Trout v. Goodman, 7 Ga. 383; Seals v. Stocks, 100 Ga. 13, 30 S. E. 278; Hileman v. Wright, 9 Ind. 126; Smith v. Allen, 1 N. J. Eq. 43, 21 Am. Dec. 33.

And the rule is the same under statutes authorizing the reformation of mistakes in deeds, grants, or other instruments, where, by fraud, mistake, or accident, they do not speak the intention of the parties. American Asso. v. Williams, 93 C. C. A. 1, 166 Fed. 17.

And a statute authorizing such reformation by courts of law does not deprive equity 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ty of jurisdiction to reform grants containing a misdescription of the land intended to be conveyed, where the errors to be corrected do not appear on the face of the instruments, and must be shown by outside evidence. Ibid.

And this is so whether the petitioner be in or out of possession, and the proprietors of interests adversely affected, including the state, are barred if notice is given. Ibid.

Where, from any defect of the common law, want of foresight of the parties, or other mistake or accident, there would be a failure of justice, it is the duty of a court of equity to supply the defect or furnish the remedy. Quick v. Stuyvesant, 2 Paige, 84.

And if a deed or obligation is sought to be enforced in an event not foreseen or provided for by the parties, and contrary to the original intention, a court of equity will interfere to prevent such injustice, and will direct that to be done which the parties would themselves have directed had they foreseen the event. Ibid.

And the mistake may be set up as a defense in an action on the contract in question, as well as in a direct suit for reformation. Barlow v. Elliott, 56 Mo. App. 374.

So, a court of equity, when it has reformed a contract, may enforce it, or grant such relief upon it as the complainant shows himself entitled to. Brugger v. State Invest. Ins. Co. 5 Sawy. 304, Fed. Cas. No. 2,051.

And where a contract is reformed by a court of equity, the rights of the parties under it must be measured by the contract as reformed. Hale v. Young, 24 Neb. 464, 39 N. W. 406; Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099.

The object of the correction of mistakes in equity in written instruments is to give the parties the same beneficial results that would have flowed from the agreement had the mistake never existed; and the form in which relief will be given when a mistake in a material particular is established depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. Lestrade v. Barth, 19 Cal. 660.

And whether an application to equity be regarded as one for the reformation of a deed, or for the establishment and declaration of a trust in respect to the property conveyed by the deed, the effect is substantially the same, and in either case the beneficial effect and operation of the deed, if different from that originally intended, may be changed or modified. McDonnell v. Millholland, 48 Md. 540.

And a court of equity has the right, in a proceeding to correct a mistake in a deed or contract, to consider all the equities between the parties to the controversy, and if the general equities of the whole of the dealings between them, especially in matters between husband and wife, are against the complainant, or are equal, she can very properly be refused relief in particular parts of such dealings, though, as to the one transaction, a particular equity may seem to exist in her favor. Redding v. Rozell, 59 Mich. 476, 26 N. W. 677.

So, a court of equity will interfere to prevent the fraudulent use of a paper for a purpose not contemplated at the time it was made, even though there was no mistake or fraud in its execution. Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 644.

Chancery will not contravene the express provisions or the policy of the law, however, in order to reform a contract for a mistake. Dickinson v. Glenney, 27 Conn. 104.

And a court of equity relieves against a defective execution of a power only when the defect consists in the want of some circumstance in the manner of execution. Cockerell v. Cholmeley, 1 Russ. & M. 418.

And the plaintiff in a bill in equity to reform a written instrument by inserting a clause alleged to have been omitted by common mistake of the parties cannot have an issue of the question of mistake framed for a jury as a matter of right, but the court may frame such an issue at its discretion. Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 102 Mass. 45.

So, when a party asks a chancellor to restrain the inequitable use of a legal title, he must show such facts as entitle him to rescind on the ground of either mistake or fraud. Watts v. Cummins, 59 Pa. 84.

And the authority of a court of equity to reform a written instrument does not extend to any alteration of a contract, but only to making the contract in which a mistake has occurred correct by conforming it to what was actually agreed upon between the parties. Garnar v. Bird, 57 Barb. 277.

And where, in reducing an agreement to writing, a material clause has been omitted by mistake, a party seeking to avail himself of the actual contract must obtain a reformation of the writing, either by a distinct proceeding to reform it, or by specially pleading the mistake in an action in which the contract is sought to be used, and asking its correction as independent relief. Pierson v. McCahill, 21 Cal. 123; Adams v. Gillig, (N. Y.) 92 N. E. 670.

So, if an agreement was not founded on a mistake of any material fact, and if it was executed in strict conformity with itself, a court of equity will not decree another security to be given, different from that which had been agreed upon, or treat the case as if such other security had in fact been agreed upon and executed. Hunt v. Rhodes, 1 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 27.

And, where the law has declared the construction of a contract, a court of equity will not interfere to aid either of the parties merely on the ground of their own or their agents' dealings under it, for that would be to make a new contract, which can only be done by mutual consent by persons properly authorized, and in due form. Midland G. W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 6 H. L. Cas. 798.

Nor will important conditions, which the parties never fully assented to, be inserted in a lease by a court of equity, where there is no sufficient evidence that the alleged agreement on the defendant's part, on which the action is based, formed part of the lease counted on. Ladwig v. Haase, 54 Wis. 311, 11 N. W. 485.

And a bill in equity for the reformation of the description of premises in a lease will not lie, where it appears that the effect of the reformation prayed for would be to show an eviction from a portion of the premises, and work a forfeiture of the rent due on the entire leased premises. Morris v. Kettle, 56 N. J. Eq. 826, 34 Atl. 376.

And if the different operation of a contract from what was expected of it, beyond what was intended, is merely a legal result from what they did intend, so that relief cannot be obtained except by annulling the very contract understandingly and intentionally made, a court of equity will not interfere, except in cases in which the contract might still operate in the manner and to the extent which the parties intended when they made it, and its further and different operation, which was not contemplated by them, be restrained. Proctor v. Thrall, 22 Vt. 262.

So, though equity may enforce specific performance of an agreement to make a mortgage, it will not give, to an executed agreement of the parties contemplating no further act by either, any different effect from that which the law attributes to it, and it will not reform the writing to make an agreement of a different effect from that which the parties intentionally entered into. Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y. 556.

And where money was advanced upon the security of a mortgage, with a parol agreement that further advances should be made, and that the amount thereof should be inserted in the bond, and that the mortgage should be considered as security for what should thus be inserted, and after the mortgage was recorded a further advance was made, and the amount inserted in the bond, the mortgage could not be extended to cover such subsequent advance, even as against a grantee of the premises who took them for a precedent debt, with full notice of all the facts. Ibid.

And under a bill to correct a deed on the ground of mistake of the scrivener, the essence of which is that the terms of the description were so essentially mistaken that nothing short of a reformation in equity could carry out the agreement, it is inadmissible on proofs under which relief on this ground is not allowed to grant substantially the same relief on the inconsistent ground that the deed presents a case of latent ambiguity which equity ought to remove through extrinsic proof of intent. Dart v. Barbour, 32 Mich. 267.

So, if a party to a deed, by a mistake in it, holds a greater estate than belongs to him, and conveys it to an innocent purchaser, receiving the consideration, he may be treated as a trustee for the real owner. Andrews v. Andrews, 12 Ind. 348.

And a defective conveyance will in equity be treated as an agreement for a conveyance, in order to effectuate the intention of the parties, and a conveyance by an agent, nugatory because professing to pass the title from himself, will, where there was ample authority in the agent to bind his principal, had the conveyance been in a proper form, be executed in equity as an agreement of the principal to convey. Welsh v. Usher, 2 Hill, Eq. 167, 29 Am. Dec. 63.

And where a conveyance was intended by both parties to vest an absolute title in the grantee, but, by mistake in drawing it, it did not do so, and the grantee in possession is attacked with reference to his title, his conveyance may be construed as a conveyance of the entire premises; and it is unnecessary that he should first procure a reformation of the deed. Perrior v. Peck, 39 App. Div. 390, 57 N. Y. Supp. 377, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 582, 60 N. E. 1118.

And where a deed by a husband and wife to homestead property described the land by mistake, and the grantee thereafter conveyed it to a third person, using the same description, it not appearing whether there was any mistake as between the first grantee and the second, the first grantee is the proper party to sue for reformation of the first deed. Tillis v. Smith, 108 Ala. 264, 19 So. 374.

So, equity never interferes to aid one creditor against another, on the ground of mistake. Knight v. Bunn, 42 N. C. (7 Ired. Eq.) 77.

And where a debtor conveys land to a trustee to secure the payment of debts, no definite price is fixed, and so the estimated quantity of land is not an element in the fixation of the price, and consequently excess in the actual quantity of the land cannot entitle the grantor in trust to a rescission of the conveyance, or compensation for the excess. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

But the right of a creditor to have a specific lien which is about to fail from mistake of a draftsman set up in a court of equity is superior to that of the general creditors of an insolvent intestate, who have no lien. Huffman v. Fry, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 415.

b. What courts have jurisdiction.

Generally, power to reform written contracts for fraud or mistake belongs to courts of equity, and cannot be exercised by common-law courts. Ivinson v. Hutton, 98 U. S. 79, 25 L. ed. 66; Bush v. Merriman, 87 Mich. 260, 49 N. W. 567; Skiba v. Gustin (Mich.) 126 N. W. 464; Winnipiseogee Paper Co. v. Eaton, 64 N. H. 234, 9 Atl. 221.

And a court of law cannot by construction make a contract express the real intention of the parties, which, by mistake, is not expressed in the words thereof. Zohrlaut v. Mengelberg (Wis.) 124 N. W. 247.

Where a written instrument is sought to be reformed for mistake, in an action at law, the party should move at the trial term for leave to amend his pleading by filing a bill in equity. Winnipiseogee Paper Co. v. Eaton, supra. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Where a written instrument reciting the receipt of money on the purchase price of land sold is considered as a mere receipt for money, it is competent in an action at law to explain and modify it; but, considered as a contract for sale and purchase of real estate, it may not be corrected or reformed in an action for damages for failure to convey, to show that the agreement was for the sale of other land. Skiba v. Gustin, supra.

And where lands sold are described as a specified number of acres, more or less, the purchaser complaining of a deficiency must resort to a court of equity to obtain relief, on the ground of mistake; he cannot maintain an action at law for money had and received, to recover back the money paid for the number of acres in which the tract was alleged to be deficient. Smith v. Fly, 24 Tex. 345, 76 Am. Dec. 109.

So, a court of law like a city court may construe and enforce a written contract as it stands, but it cannot compel alteration to be made in it, since the power to reform such contracts is exclusively within the jurisdiction of courts of equity. Fowler v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. 100 Ga. 330, 28 S. E. 398.

A Federal court, however, has jurisdiction of a suit in equity to reform a policy of insurance where the action is brought in a state court by a foreign assignee of the policy, against an insurer who is a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and thence removed to the Federal court, although the insurer and insured are citizens of the same state. Rosenbaum v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 3 L.R.A. 189, 37 Fed. 724.

And a court of law, in giving effect to the intention of the parties to a written contract, as gathered from the entire instrument, may disregard a mistake apparent on the face of the writing, when, notwithstanding the mistake, the intent remains clear from other parts of the contract. Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Jaynes, 87 Ill. 199.

But a mistake on the face of an instrument, however obvious, cannot be corrected or disregarded by a court of law, unless, from other parts of the instrument, there can be no doubt of the real intention of the parties. Ibid.

So, the right which one has to nullify an alleged ratification by him of a voidable release executed by him, by showing that when he was alleged to have so ratified it, he was not aware of his private legal right arising out of the facts, to repudiate the release, is a substantive right, and not a mere rule by which a court of chancery administers his right; and as such substantive right, it is available in avoidance of the alleged release, as well at law as in equity. Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Jones, 73 Miss. 110, 55 Am. St. Rep. 488, 19 So. 105.

c. The relief granted.

1. Generally.

Reformation of a deed or contract can only be had to express some material thing which the parties agreed on and meant to put in, but left out, or by striking out or changing something they did not mean to express. Moffett v. Jaffe, 132 App. Div. 7, 116 N. Y. Supp. 402, reversing 61 Misc. 584, 114 N. Y. Supp. 614; Sweet v. Marsh, 133 App. Div. 315, 117 N. Y. Supp. 930.

A written instrument will be reformed for fraud or mistake only so as to give effect to a previous binding contract of the parties. Petesich v. Hambach, 48 Wis. 443, 4 N. W. 565.

The design is to give effect to the intention of the parties to the contract or instrument. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. v. Merriman, 35 Minn. 42, 27 N. W. 199.

And a reformation of a deed will never be decreed when the effect would be to compel a conveyance from the grantor of something not originally intended to be conveyed. Norris v. Colorado Turkey Honestone Co. 22 Colo. 162, 43 Pac. 1024.

If, after making an agreement, however, in process of reducing it to a written form, the instrument, by means of a mistake of law, fails to express the contract which the parties actually entered into, equity will interfere with appropriate relief, either by way of defense to its enforcement, or by cancelation or by reformation to the same extent as if the failure of the writing to express the real contract was caused by a mistake of fact. Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892; Hileman v. Wright, 9 Ind. 126; Bodwell v. Heaton, 40 Kan. 36, 18 Pac. 901.

And the duty of a court of equity to correct a mistake in a written instrument is coextensive with the mistake, and extends not merely to the reformation of the original instrument, but also to all subsequent proceedings, papers, judgments, and decrees into which the mistake, as such, is carried. First Nat. Bank v. Wentworth, 28 Kan. 183.

Relief from a mistake in a contract which does not express the agreement of the parties is not effected by erasures or interlineations of the former contract, but by injunction and orders for necessary and proper releases. Smith v. Greeley, 14 N. H. 378.

When a written contract does not express the understanding of the parties, on account of a mistake concerning the subject-matter of it, the remedy is by rescission or cancelation of the written contract, and, in some cases, by its rectification. Page v. Higgins, 150 Mass. 27, 5 L.R.A. 152, 22 N. E. 63.

So, a court of equity looks not so much to the legal formalities with which a transaction is clothed as to its pith and substance; and where a contract is in form broad enough to cover many things not in terms expressed upon its face, but it is manifest that the minds of the parties never met and concurred in reference to these matters, and where fraud has been practised, equity will disregard mere technical forms, and only attach to the contract the effect which both parties had in view at the time of its execution and delivery. Pomeroy v. Benton, 57 Mo. 531. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

But equity will not interpose to effect a forfeiture of a privilege, the divesting of an estate, the taking away of a right by condition subsequent or otherwise, or the discovery of some matter which may render the act done illegal, and thereby subject the party to a penalty, but this rule does not apply to the case of reforming a mistake in a bond for the prison limits. Smith v. Allen, 1 N. J. Eq. 43, 21 Am. Dec. 33.

Nor can a court of equity reform a contract or other written instrument by making it what the court thinks the parties ought to have made it, or would have made it if better informed. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. v. Merriman, supra.

And where a purchase of stock in a mining corporation is made on condition that the purchaser acknowledge an indebtedness of a specified sum as properly due on part of the shares, and also acknowledge an aggregate indebtedness to the seller of the stock in a specified sum, the contract is an entirety and indivisible, and cannot be reformed by striking out the acknowledgment of indebtedness upon the shares, upon the ground of mistake of law. Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064.

So, on the question of relief from a mistake in an instrument which fails to carry out the intention of the parties to it, it is immaterial whether the proceeding is by bill to correct the mistake, or the mistake is set up in the answer by way of defense. Leitensdorfer v. Delphy, 15 Mo. 160, 55 Am. Dec. 137; Trout v. Goodman, 7 Ga. 383; Hansford v. Freeman, 99 Ga. 376, 27 S. E. 706; Bodwell v. Heaton, supra; Rosevelt v. Dale, 2 Cow. 129; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 596, 7 Am. Dec. 559.

And this may be done by means of a decree quieting the grantee's title. De Forest v. Walters, 153 N. Y. 229, 47 N. E. 294; Lucas v. Labertue, 88 Ind. 277.

And a grantee in possession of land under a deed may, in defense of an action of ejectment in which his title is attacked, seek a reformation of his conveyance. Perrin v. Peck, 39 App. Div. 390, 57 N. Y. Supp. 377, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 582, 60 N. E. 1118; Hoppough v. Struble, 60 N. Y. 430.

And a mutual mistake on the part of the parties to a deed as to the legality of adjoining surveys called for in a deed may be set up, and, under a plea of partial consideration, relief obtained when the vendor seeks the collection of unpaid purchase money. Moore v. Hazelwood, 67 Tex. 624, 4 S. W. 215.

Nor need the defendants in a bill to foreclose a mortgage file a cross bill to have a mistake in the mortgage corrected; if entitled to such correction, they may be protected by the decree upon the original bill. Ames v. New Jersey Franklinite Co. 12 N. J. Eq. 66, 72 Am. Dec. 385.

And where a wife furnished money to her husband, with which he purchased certain city lots, taking title to the property in his own name, and afterwards the husband and wife took possession of the property, and occupied it as their homestead, and he attempted to convey the legal title to her, but failed, because of a failure to insert in the deed the number of the block and the name of the city in which the lots were situated, and this failure was not from accident or mistake, but from a want of recollection as to the number, and the grantor instructed the notary who took the acknowledgment to insert such number afterwards, which he never did, and afterwards the husband died intestate, and his children then set up a claim to the undivided half of said lots, and the wife, who had continuously resided thereon, claimed them as her own, although she is not entitled to an action to reform the deed, she is entitled to an action to quiet her title to the property, as against the children. Leonard v. Wills, 24 Kan. 231.

2. Injunction.

A court of equity will enjoin the enforcement of a bid for public work, in which a mistake occurred upon the part of one party, although it could not reform such bid unless the mistake was mutual. Moffett v. Rochester, 82 Fed. 255.

And in a suit by a surety to cancel or reform a bond given on exeat, as containing a condition inserted by fraud on the surety, if the principal in the bond be dead, the proper relief is to enjoin the prosecution of any suit to make the surety liable on such condition. Griswold v. Hazard, 141 U. S. 260, 35 L. ed. 678, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, 999.

And where there was an express agreement between a lessee and the agent of the lessor of buildings, that the rent should cease if the buildings leased should be casually destroyed, and that a stipulation to that effect should be inserted in the lease, but such stipulation was inadvertently omitted, and the premises were afterwards accidentally burned, the lessor may be perpetually enjoined from prosecuting any suit or proceeding for the recovery of rent which accrued subsequent to the destruction of the premises; and the lease may be decreed to be given up and canceled. Gates v. Green, 4 Paige, 355, 27 Am. Dec. 68; Wood v. Hubbell, 10 N. Y. 479.

So, where an action was brought against a person for breach of the covenants in his deed, and the action, through his mistake, was undefended, and judgment by default obtained, upon a satisfactory showing of the mistake a bill for an injunction against the enforcement of the judgment may be maintained. Sanders v. Wagner, 32 N. J. Eq. 506.

And where a sheriff's deed, made on sale under execution, by mistake did not include the whole premises advertised and intended to be sold, and the purchaser, supposing that the sheriff's deed included the whole, bid and paid a price accordingly, he is entitled to a decree perpetually enjoining persons claiming an interest in the property omitted from the deed from prosecuting ejectment suits brought to recover such 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

premises, and directing them to execute to the purchaser a release of the right and title to the same. De Riemer v. De Cantillon, 4 Johns. Ch. 85.

And where the execution of a contract is enjoined because of a mistake in it, and the mistake is found to exist, the bill for an injunction may be so far modified as to permit the defendant to proceed with his suit at law, but he will be restrained from setting up at the trial any other construction of the contract than that adopted by the court of equity. Firmstone v. De Camp, 17 N. J. Eq. 317.

So, where a negotiation took place for the sale by one person to another of a British patent and certain foreign patents for the same invention, and ultimately an offer was made for sale at £500, and accepted, but it was not quite clear whether the offer and acceptance related to all the patents or to the British patent only, an action for specific performance, treating the contract as including all the patents, and for an injunction to restrain the purchaser from parting with them, cannot be maintained, where the purchaser had understood that he was negotiating for the British patent only. The proper course in such case would be to allow an amendment of the writ so as to limit the action to the alleged sale of the British patent, and then to grant an injunction restraining parting with that patent until the hearing of the action. Preston v. Luck, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 497.

But where the complainant in a bill for an injunction to restrain waste claims title under a deed from the defendant, the defendant cannot, in defense of the bill, show by parol evidence that there was a mistake in the draft of his deed to the complainant; the proper course would be for the party relying on the mistake to bring a bill for a decree correcting it. Webster v. Webster, 33 N. H. 18, 66 Am. Dec. 705.

3. Reformation and enforcement.

A court of equity having jurisdiction to amend a contract thereby acquires the right, incidentally in the same suit, to give relief in damages, or by such other mode as justice may require. Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525; Gooding v. M'Alister, 9 How. Pr. 123; Willis v. Henderson, 5 Ill. 13, 38 Am. Dec. 120; Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Jaynes, 57 Ill. 199; Schwass v. Hershey, 125 Ill. 653, 18 N. E. 272; Morris v. Stern, 80 Ind. 227; Nebraska Loan & T. Co. v. Ignowski, 54 Neb. 398, 74 N. W. 852; Bellows v. Stone, 14 N. H. 175; Bidwell v. Astor Mut. Ins. Co. 16 N. Y. 263; Roberts v. Elmore, 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 208; Columbus & T. R. Co. v. Steinfeld, 42 Ohio St. 449.

And a claim for the reformation of a deed, and one for damages for breach of covenants of the deed as amended, may be joined in the same action, under a statute providing that legal and equitable remedies may be enforced in one action. Rutler v. Barnes, 60 Conn. 170, 12 L.R.A. 273, 21 Atl. 419.

And a complaint in an action for such reformation and enforcement contains but one cause of action. Gooding v. M'Alister, supra; Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 73 Cal. 452, 2 Am. St. Rep. 823, 15 Pac. 82.

And where a contract is reformed, and damages are awarded for its breach as reformed, it is not necessary for the judgment to recite that the damages were given by way of equitable relief. West v. Suda, 69 Conn. 60, 36 Atl. 1015.

So, where a decree directs the master in chancery to correct the instrument, it is not necessary that a formal correction be made by him before the final decree. The court may treat as done what it had determined should be done. Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Jaynes, supra.

And where a deed was executed, purporting by mistake to convey a moiety only of a parcel of real estate, the intention of the parties having been to pass the whole, a conveyance of the other moiety by another deed is not necessary; an order declaring that the deed was, in the particular specified, executed by mistake; that it was intended to pass the entirety, and that it should be rectified accordingly; and directing a copy of the order to be indorsed on the deed,—is sufficient. White v. White, L. R. 15 Eq. 247.

A declaration by a court of equity that a deed ought to be rectified, followed by an order that it be rectified accordingly, is sufficient to pass the legal estate, without a conveyance. Ibid.

And where a parol agreement was made, in consideration of a conveyance of property, that the grantee was to care for and support and furnish a home for the grantor for half of the time during the remainder of his life, and that agreement was carried out for two years, and thereafter was not observed, the grantee having offered a fulfillment, and the grantor having himself consented to a modification thereof by occupying the home of the grantee at another place, there having been such a part performance of the agreement as to take it out of the statute of frauds, the grantor would be entitled, upon satisfying the court that the arrangement was made, to a specific performance thereof, or, if a specific performance could not be had, to such damages as he might sustain by reason of a breach thereof. Herrick v. Starkweather, 54 Hun, 532, 8 N. Y. Supp. 145.

So, the reformation of a mortgage may be obtained, as incidental relief, on a bill to foreclose; and if the court has properly obtained jurisdiction of a bill by an administrator to foreclose a mortgage, it may also, on proper averments and proof by the administrator, grant such incidental relief. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Dayton, 116 Ill. 257, 4 N. E. 492.

And in a suit by a mortgagee against the heirs and personal representatives of a deceased mortgagor to foreclose a mortgage on real and personal property, upon proper allegations of fact, mistakes may be corrected, and the mortgage reformed as well as foreclosed. Morris v. Stern, 80 Ind. 227.

So, where the date and name of the payee of a note mentioned in the condition of a mortgage deed were misdescribed through mistake, the mistake may be corrected, on a bill for foreclosure stating it, not only as between the parties to the deed, but as between the mortgagor and a subsequent mortgagee with notice. Peters v. Goodrich, 3 Conn. 146.

And where important errors were inserted, by mistake or fraud of the defendant, in a contract, disadvantageous to the plaintiff, and the contract contained a provision for foreclosure in case of nonperformance by the plaintiff, an injunction may issue in an action to reform the contract, restraining the defendant from enforcing the forfeiture pendente lite, upon the plaintiff's depositing, under the order of the court, the sums accruing due under the contract, to abide the event of the action. Humphreys v. Hurtt, 5 Thomp. & C. 433.

And where a mortgage was given upon a life estate when it was intended to mortgage the fee, a judgment in an action to foreclose the mortgage, based on findings authorizing a reformation, which foreclosed the mortgage, and ordered a sale of the fee in all respects as though the mortgage had been reformed, but contained no provision specifically reforming it, is substantially a judgment of reformation. Lardner v. Williams, 98 Wis. 514, 74 N. W. 346.

So, in a proceeding for partition, a mortgagee made defendant may by counterclaim procure the reformation of his mortgage and a foreclosure thereof. Conyers v. Mericles, 75 Ind. 443.

And when an action at law has been commenced on a fire insurance policy, and, after the defendant has answered, it appears that a recovery cannot be had thereon, on account of a mistake of the parties to the insurance contract, equity will, at the instance of the plaintiff, stay the prosecution of the action at law, and entertain a bill to reform the policy, consolidating the two actions, and render judgment for the sum found due on the policy as reformed. Lansing v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 4 Nev. (Unof.) 140, 93 N. W. 756.

So, the general rule is that either party to a contract, in a suit for specific performance thereof, may show by parol evidence that the written contract relied upon does not correctly and truly express the agreement of the parties, but that there is some material omission, insertion, or variation through mistake, surprise, or fraud. Best v. Stow, 2 Sandf. Ch. 298; Hunter v. Bilyeu, 30 Ill. 228; Ring v. Ashworth, 3 Iowa, 457; Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 168; McCurdy v. Breathitt, 5 T. B. Mon. 234, 17 Am. Dec. 65; Coger v. M'Ger, 2 Bibb, 321, 5 Am. Dec. 610; Philpott v. Elliott, 4 Md. Ch. 273; Mosby v. Wall, 23 Miss. 81, 55 Am. Dec. 71; Columbus v. Steinfeld, 42 Ohio St. 449; Redfield v. Gleason, 61 Vt. 220, 15 Am. St. Rep. 889, 17 Atl. 1075; Creigh v. Boggs, 19 W. Va. 240; Fishack v. Ball, 34 W. Va. 644, 12 S. E. 856; Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. Jr. 394.

And this may be done without a cross bill. Redfield v. Gleason, supra.

And equity has jurisdiction to reform a deed, and enforce specific performance of the original contract according to the real intention of the parties, where, by reason of mistake of the draftsman, the deed did not convey the estate intended to be transferred by the parties. Nutall v. Nutall, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 671, 82 S. W. 377.

And an action to recover the price of property sold and delivered under a contract in writing, in which it is made to appear that such relief cannot be adequately administered without a reformation of the writing in such a way as to make it speak the truth with respect to the contract that was actually made, is an action arising out of contract, and the equitable relief is but an incident to the main action, and is not subject to the objection that a suit for specific equitable relief is not sufficient to sustain a money judgment founded upon facts cognizable only by a court of law. Palmer Steel & I. Co. v. Heat, Light & P. Co. 160 Ind. 232, 66 N. E. 690.

So, a court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction to reform an injunction bond, is not required to remit the parties to their remedy at law for damages, but may incidentally assess such damages as are shown to have resulted from its breach. Keith v. Henkleman, 173 Ill. 137, 50 N. E. 692.

And where a woman gives a bond to her intended husband, that in case of their marriage she will convey her lands to him in fee, and they marry, and the wife dies without issue, and then the husband dies, the bond, though void in law, is good evidence of an agreement in equity; and the heir of the husband may compel a specific performance against the heir of the wife. Cannel v. Buckle, 2 P. Wms. 243.

And where a mistake is set up by way of defense against a claim for the specific execution of an agreement for the sale of land, parol evidence is admissible to establish such defense. Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63, 99 Am. Dec. 133.

But where a suit at law is brought upon a note, and the defendant obtains a verdict in his favor, on account of a mistake in a title bond for the land for the purchase money of which the note sued upon was executed, he cannot afterwards set up that judgment as a defense to a bill filed for the purpose of reforming the title bond and specifically enforcing the contract as corrected. Mosby v. Wall, 23 Miss. 81, 55 Am. Dec. 71.

The rule has been acted upon to some extent, however, that courts of equity will not ordinarily compel the specific performance of a contract, with variations, additions, or new terms to be made and introduced into it by parol evidence. Whiteaker v. Vanschoiack, 5 Or. 113; Nurse v. Seymour, 13 Beav. 254.

And it has been held that though a defendant resisting a specific performance may go into parol evidence to show that by fraud the written agreement does not express the real terms, a plaintiff cannot do so for the purpose of obtaining a specific performance with a variation. Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. Jr. 211.

It has also been held that although a party to a written contract cannot have specific performance of it, with a variation upon parol evidence, still he may in the same action, upon parol evidence, have the written contract reformed and enforced. Monroe v. Skelton, 36 Ind. 302.

So, a court of equity will not make a decree in a suit for specific performance which would compel the defendant to convey, while leaving the complainant free to reject the deed tendered in compliance with the decree. Pope v. Hoopes, 84 Fed. 927.

And a court cannot reform a contract, and at once cancel it on the ground that the other party has not done what the contract as reformed required of him. Quimby v. Shearer, 56 Minn. 534, 58 N. W. 155.

But a court of equity will not refuse to decree the specific performance of an agreement, on the ground that one of the contracting parties had mistaken its legal effect. Powell v. Smith, L. R. 14 Eq. 85.

And a written agreement will not be required to be specifically performed, where there is parol evidence that one of the terms of the actual agreement was omitted. Garrard v. Grinling, 2 Swanst. 244.

Nor will a court of equity take jurisdiction to compel specific performance of a verbal agreement to make a valid contract of guaranty, where it would not reform such a contract defectively reduced to writing through mutual mistake. Rowell v. Smith, 123 Wis. 510, 102 N. W. 1, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 773.

So, where lots are conveyed with express reference to a recorded plat, evidence to control or in any way affect the plat is inadmissible in ejectment; if there is error or mistake in this respect in the description of the premises, the remedy is in chancery to rectify the deed. Jones v. Johnston, 18 How. 150, 15 L. ed. 320.

4. Reformation or rescission.

(a) Generally.

Where a deed or other contract or instrument contains a mistake which is mutual, the remedy is by bill in equity for reformation. Wirsching v. Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. 67 N. J. Eq. 711, 56 Atl. 713, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 442; Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099.

And courts of equity have power to correct mistakes in deeds and other written instruments so as to make them conform to the real intention of the parties, even to the extent of making a deed include more land than is embraced in it, where it was omitted by mistake, fraud, or surprise.

Ruhling v. Hackett, 1 Nev. 360; Durant v. Bacot, 13 N. J. Eq. 201.

But such relief is not to be granted in case of a deed, except upon proof that it is entirely satisfactory. Green v. Stone, supra.

And where a conveyance of land was made by one person to another, containing a reservation of minerals to the grantor; and four years subsequently the grantee filed a bill against the grantor, alleging that the reservation was inserted by mistake common to both parties, and was recently discovered by him, and praying for the reformation of the conveyance by its omission; and the grantor denied the mistake, claiming the reservation, and he afterwards died,—although the court deemed that there had been a mistake common to both parties, of which the grantor sought to take improper advantage, yet a simple decree of rectification could not be made after a lapse of a long time and against the oath of one of the parties, but it held that the representatives of the deceased grantor were entitled to the option of having the conveyance rectified, or the whole transaction set aside. Bloomer v. Spittle, L. R. 13 Eq. 427.

Where the mistake in a deed or other contract is unilateral, however, the remedy is by bill for rescission. Wirsching v. Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. and Green v. Stone, supra.

When an alleged agreement was entered into with an honest misunderstanding and through a mutual mistake of the parties, there is no legal contract, and the remedy is to set it aside, and not to enforce it. Boehm v. Yanquell, 15 Ohio C. C. 454; Whitaker v. Gavit, 18 Conn. 522; Bellows v. Stone, 14 N. H. 175.

And where goods delivered to a buyer are not those described by the seller in the contract of sale, rescission is the sole remedy. Kupfer v. Pellman, 121 N. Y. Supp. 1081.

And where by mistake a grantor conveyed land which he did not intend to convey, and which the grantee did not bargain for, and the grantor does not in fact own the land the parties supposed was being conveyed, the only remedy available is rescission; but that remedy, to be effectual, should be resorted to in apt time, between the parties to the conveyance. Brickey v. Linnertz, 241 Ill. 187, 89 N. E. 342.

Nor are purchasers entitled to a conveyance of part, though answering the general description in the advertisement of sale, where it was not in the contemplation of either party at the time of the purchase or conveyance, the purchaser being referred to a more particular description, which did not include the part. Calverley v. Williams, 1 Ves. Jr. 210.

To entitle a party to a judgment reforming a written contract, it is not enough for him to show his own intention, and that he never agreed to the terms of the contract; his remedy in such case is to have the contract canceled on that ground. Jackson v. Andrews, 59 N. Y. 244.

And though a deed sought to be reformed so as to include plaintiffs as grantees may have been procured from the grantor by fraud of the defendants, the grantees, in the absence of evidence tending to show that the grantor intended to include plaintiffs as grantees, the court cannot reform it so as to vest in them title to an interest in the land conveyed; a decree canceling the deed being the proper relief in such case. Bonneville v. Dum (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 1179.

So, if parties to a contract for the sale of real estate undertake to complete it by a deed and a mortgage back, and the mortgage, by mistake or ignorance of the draftsman, is so defectively drawn as to be void, and thereby the intention of the parties fails of accomplishment and the contract of completion, and the party undertaking to give the mortgage refuses to remedy the defect or puts it out of his power to do so, a case for rescission in equity is presented, if all the other essential elements thereto exist. Dietrich v. Hutchinson, 73 Vt. 134, 87 Am. St. Rep. 698, 50 Atl. 810.

And where a father conveyed to his married daughter real estate, and received from her a mortgage in which her husband did not join, conditioned to support the father through life and to reconvey upon certain conditions, while equity cannot decree the execution of a new and perfect deed from the daughter, nor foreclose her equity, it may treat the deed from the father as void. Chapman v. Long, 66 Vt. 656, 30 Atl. 3.

So, where a person buys another's interest in a partnership business, and agrees to pay the debts of the firm, and pays the same on an inventory made by himself in which there was a mistake, by reason of which he paid $500 too much, the mistake is not one for which the contract can be reformed; rescission or cancelation would be the appropriate remedy. De Voin v. De Voin, 76 Wis. 66, 44 N. W. 839.

And where an elderly man applied for admission to a Masonic home, of which order he had been a member, and deeded all his property to the order, on his attorney's advice that it covered only such property as might be sued for when he entered the home, and the deed was not explained to him, and he did not desire to convey a contingent legacy which he desired to pass to his children; and after he had remained at the home for some time the legacy accrued and the society claimed it, he was entitled, on paying a reasonable sum for his board, to a rescission of the deed. Wirsching v. Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. supra.

In case of rescission of a contract for a mistake which is unilateral, however, the whole contract is set aside and the parties are restored to their original position; and no relief can be granted in such case after the position of the parties has been so changed that their original rights cannot be restored. Green v. Stone, supra.

And the rule has been asserted that equity will direct the cancelation of a contract for fraud or mistake, but that it cannot alter the contract. Brooks v. Stolley, 3 McLean, 523, Fed. Cas. No. 1,962; Shelby v. Smith, 2 A. K. Marsh. 504.

And that an executory contract for the sale of land will not be reformed by enlarging the subject-matter, upon parol testimony, upon the ground of fraud, and enforced with the variation; but it may be rescinded upon such ground. Davis v. Ely, 104 N. C. 16, 5 L.R.A. 810, 17 Am. St. Rep. 667, 10 S. E. 138.

And apparently, under this rule, the defendant in an action instituted by a landlord against a tenant for rent under the forcible entry and detainer laws cannot interpose an answer alleging that, in drawing up the lease, certain terms thereof were omitted by mutual mistake, and asking that the lease be reformed to express the contract of the parties. Phillips v. Port Townsend Lodge No. 6, F. & A. M. 8 Wash. 529, 36 Pac. 476.

And where a deed was executed in performance of two separate contracts to convey land, and mutual mistake is alleged in defense, the defendant praying to be permitted to rescind and return the purchase money as to both tracts, a rescission and return as to one tract, and a reformation as to the other, may be decreed. Lord v. Horr, 30 Wash. 477, 71 Pac. 23.

Equity will not entertain an action to reform a deed, however, by inserting a condition subsequent, and declaring a forfeiture for breach of such condition. Mills v. Evansville Seminary, 47 Wis. 354, 2 N. W. 550.

And a person cannot rescind a contract in equity on account of a mutual mistake in the language of the instrument containing it, when the other party offered to make the correction as soon as he had notice of the mistake. Laver v. Dennett, 109 U. S. 90, 27 L. ed. 867, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73.

And where a man conveyed real estate to his daughter, and the deed contained a recital of a consideration of the sum of $500, whereas no money consideration passed or was intended to pass, the true consideration being an oral agreement of the daughter to support and care for the father on the premises described in the deed, there being no fraud or mistake, a conclusion that there was a mistake in fact by the parties to the deed is not warranted; and if there was a parol agreement that the grantee was to care for and support and furnish a home for the grantor as a consideration of the conveyance of the premises in question, and that agreement was carried out in part, the breach does not furnish a sufficient ground for canceling and annulling the deed. Herrick v. Starkweather, 54 Hun, 532, 8 N. Y. Supp. 145.

(b) Reinstatement, statu quo.

A court of equity will not usually rescind or reform a contract for mistake, unless the parties can be put back in statu quo. Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

L. ed. 798; Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827; Hewitt v. Powers, 84 Ind. 295; Bigelow v. Wilson, 99 Iowa, 456, 68 N. W. 798; Conaway v. Gore, 21 Kan. 725; Cottrell v. Citizens' Sav. Bank, 53 Minn. 201, 54 N. W. 1111; Columbus & T. R. Co. v. Steinfeld, 42 Ohio St. 449; Crosier v. Acer, 7 Paige. 137; Fink v. Farmers' Bank, 178 Pa. 154, 56 Am. St. Rep. 746, 35 Atl. 636; Lewis v. Cooper, Cooke (Tenn.) 467; Kesler v. Zimmersehutte, 1 Tex. 50.

If that cannot be done, it will give relief only where the clearest and strongest equity imperatively demands it. Bigelow v. Wilson; Grymes v. Sanders; and Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co.,—supra.

It is only in special cases that equity will relieve a party from the consequences of a pure mistake of law. It will not do so when the opposite party is blameless in the premises, and the parties cannot be replaced in their former positions. Truesdale v. Sidle, 65 Minn. 315, 67 N. W. 1004.

And if no effort has been made to rescind a conveyance by restoring the parties to their original position, until such restoration has become impossible, relief by way of rescission cannot be granted, even though the proof of unilateral mistake is entirely satisfactory and convincing. Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099.

So, where it appears that a person complaining that a contract did not speak the actual agreement of the parties has been guilty of such breaches of the real contract as substantially to deprive the other party of all its benefits, reformation will be ordered only on condition that the parties be put as nearly as may be in statu quo,—as, by the return of all moneys received by the complainant under the contract. Cassidy v. Metcalf, 66 Mo. 519.

Nor can one have a settlement for injuries rescinded, without having offered to return the money received thereunder. Barker v. Northern P. R. Co. 65 Fed. 460.

And where mutual deeds are necessary to the carrying out of a contract, and the deed of one party is defectively executed, that party will not be allowed to claim under the deed of the other if he refuses to remedy the defect in his own deed upon demand; and this is so, although the facts from which the defect arises were known to both parties at the time of the execution of the deeds. Chapman v. Long, 66 Vt. 656, 30 Atl. 3.

So, the mistake of an agent of a railway corporation in contracting to carry cotton at a price specified, caused by a telegram from his superior officer being incorrectly transmitted, does not entitle his principal to be released from the contract or from paying damages resulting from its breach. Borden v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 113 N. C. 570, 37 Am. St. Rep. 632, 18 S. E. 392.

And where an agreement contains a mistake, and one of the parties attempts inequitably to avail himself of the mistake, he is not entitled to an agreement binding other people as a condition of abandoning that agreement. Wake v. Harrop, 6 Hurlst. & N. 768.

Nor can a surety on the bond of a bank cashier, who, with knowledge of the facts, but mistaking their legal effect, has given his notes in settlement of a defalcation of the cashier, maintain a bill in equity to compel redelivery to him of the notes, unless he can prove that the parties have remained in statu quo. Fink v. Farmers' Bank, supra.

So, where a party seeks to correct a written instrument in his own favor, a court of equity should refuse its aid, unless he is willing that other mistakes therein should be corrected which would be against his interest. He who would have equity must do equity. Morisey v. Swinson, 104 N. C. 555, 10 S. E. 754; Hoppough v. Struble, 60 N. Y. 430.

A party praying for the correction of a mistake must offer to do whatever ought to be done on his part toward a correction thereof. Boyce v. Watson, 20 Ga. 517; Mastin v. Halley, 61 Mo. 196.

And a defendant in a foreclosure suit is not entitled to have a mistake in the mortgage corrected, by which, through mistake of the scrivener, the mortgagee obtained a lien upon more property than was intended, since there is no reason why the creditor should be compelled to relinquish any of his security until his debt is paid. He who seeks equity must do equity, and the defendant must pay the debt, which will relieve the property and correct the mistake without the intervention of the court. Ames v. New Jersey Franklinite Co. 12 N. J. Eq. 66, 72 Am. Dec. 385.

So, where the owner of a vested remainder in fee devised the estate absolutely to his wife, and after his death a posthumous child was born, and the child died prior to the death of the life tenant, and after the death of the child, but before the death of the mother, the brothers of the remainderman took a deed from the widow in which she purported to convey to them a fee, and at the same time they gave her a mortgage to secure the purchase money, all the parties being under the impression at the time that the widow took a fee as heir of her son; and where, after the death of the life tenant, the brothers claimed that the fee was really in themselves as heirs at law of the ancestor from whom the estate came, and that it did not pass to the child's mother,—the widow was entitled to recover at least the value of her dower interest. Wilson v. Ott, 160 Pa. 433, 28 Atl. 848.

And where a part owner of a mining claim conveyed interests in it to two persons respectively, by unstamped conveyances, who afterwards conveyed the same to another person by conveyances good in form; and the first vendor afterwards conveyed his remaining interest to the last purchaser, and then filed a bill in equity against him to correct an alleged mistake in the latter conveyance, on the ground that he conveyed more than was intended; and in order to make out the mistake it was necessary to repudiate his former unstamped conveyances,—a court of equity will not correct the mistake in order to allow him to avail himself of the advantages to result from repudiating his prior unstamped conveyances; equity requires that he should make good his prior void conveyances, and if he asks equity he must do equity. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. supra.

So, upon cancelation of a contract for public work because of mutual mistake as to the amount of work to be done, the contractor may recover upon a quantum meruit for all that he has done; and neither the cost nor the value of extra work is material in fixing the amount to be awarded for work done in such a case. Long v. Athol, 196 Mass. 497, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 96, 82 N. E. 665.

But where a trustee of an estate held, under a will, in trust for the testator's children, without authority therefor encumbered land belonging to it with a trust deed to secure a loan made to him individually, and afterwards took credit for the amount of the loan against the children in his settlement as their guardian, in an action by the wards to cancel the trust deed because made without the authority of the will, they will not be required, as a condition of the relief sought, to refund the amount of the loan to the purchaser under the deed of trust. Price v. Estill, 87 Mo. 378.

And trustees who have unintentionally executed and delivered their personal obligations, instead of obligations payable out of the trust estate, are not estopped from asking for the reformation of the instruments by the fact that the trust funds have been disposed of, so that the reformed notes will be worthless. Richmond v. Ogden Street R. Co. 44 Or. 48, 74 Pac. 333.

So, where a bill in equity was brought for the correction of a mistake as to a boundary in a deed from the defendants to the plaintiff, which was given to correct an earlier mistake in a conveyance to them by their predecessor in title, on the ground that the land thereby rebounded was only a part of the land originally conveyed, and the mistake in question was admitted, but it was sought by answer and cross bill to condition relief upon the correction of another alleged error in the first deed, consisting of the omission of a restriction against building on the boundary line, relief may be given as to the first mistake, and denied as to the latter, since the mistakes are in different matters; the deeds in question are different, and the connection between them is merely the empirical one that they concern the same piece of land. Slater v. Cobb, 153 Mass. 22, 26 N. E. 410.

And where, in an action to reform a deed, defendant alleges a mutual mistake, and prays for leave to rescind and return the purchase price, no advantage can be taken of his omission to bring the money into court, unless taken in the trial court. Lord v. Horr, 30 Wash. 477, 71 Pac. 23.

5. Keeping alive or reinstating encumbrances.

Where it will subserve the purposes of justice, equity will restore a mortgage released through mistake, and give to it its original priority as a lien. Hammond v. Barker, 61 N. H. 53.

In equity the cancelation of a mortgage on the records is only prima facie evidence of its discharge, and leaves it open to the party making such objection to prove that it was made by accident, mistake, or fraud; and on such proof being made, the mortgage will be established, even as against subsequent mortgagees without notice, if they became such anterior to the cancelation. Robinson v. Sampson, 23 Me. 388.

And where a person holding a mortgage on the premises of another, subject to a mortgage of a third person, in ignorance of a subsequent attachment of the premises by the third person on a different debt, releases his mortgage and takes a new one for the same consideration; and a fourth person, in ignorance of such attachment, pays the attaching creditor the amount of his mortgage, which is thereupon discharged, and takes a new mortgage from the first mortgagee for money so paid to the attaching creditor,—he will be regarded as the equitable assignee of the mortgage to the attaching creditor, and will be subrogated to the original rights of such mortgagee therein. Hammond v. Barker, supra.

So, where an insurance company held a mortgage on real estate belonging to a man, and after the man's death his heir borrowed money and paid the mortgage to the insurance company, and gave the lender a mortgage on the same lands to secure his money, both parties supposing that there were no other liens upon the land, but other debts of the deceased came to light, and an administrator was appointed on his estate, who filed a petition to sell the lands to pay debts, the mortgagee was entitled to be subrogated to the mortgage of the insurance company, as against the creditors, and to have the release thereof set aside for his benefit and protection. Straman v. Rechline, 58 Ohio St. 443, 51 N. E. 44.

And where a man and his wife made a mortgage, and duly acknowledged the same, before a notary, who duly certified the acknowledgment of the wife, but by mistake omitted to certify the acknowledgment of the husband, and the husband afterwards died intestate and insolvent, before the mistake was discovered, and the mortgagee after his death accepted a new mortgage for her debt from the heir, and released the old mortgage to enable the heir to give a first mortgage to another party for borrowed money, and an administrator on the estate of the deceased mortgagor thereafter appointed filed a petition to sell the lands to pay the debts of the deceased mortgagor, the mortgagee is entitled to have her mortgage reformed as to the deceased mortgagor, and to have the release thereof on record set aside, but such mortgage when so reformed is subject to the lien of general creditors of the deceased on the lands, and the mortgage is a valid charge on the dower interest of the widow in such lands, and the balance due on the debt to the mortgagee after receiving her dividend as a general creditor of the administrator should be paid out of the money value of the dower of the widow, and the remainder of such money value should be paid over to the widow. Ibid.

So, where money is loaned under an agreement that it shall be used in the payment of a lien on real estate, and it is so used, and the agreement is that the one who so loans the money shall have a first lien on the same lands to secure his money, and through some defect in the new mortgage, or oversight as to other liens, the money cannot be made on the last mortgage, the mortgagee has the right to be subrogated to the lien which was paid by the money so loaned by him, when it can be done without placing greater burdens upon the intervening lien holders than they would have borne if the old mortgage had been released. Ibid.

And where a deed was delivered, through mistake, before the whole of the purchase money was paid or secured, the grantor may be permitted to protect himself against the effects of the mistake by keeping alive in the hands of a trustee an encumbrance on the premises, created by himself before the sale, although the deed contained covenants of general warranty against all encumbrances. Neville v. Demeritt, 2 N. J. Eq. 321.

But where a person furnishes money with which to pay off a lien on real estate, under an agreement that he is to have a first mortgage on the same lands to secure his money, and the money is so used, he cannot be subrogated to the lien which was paid with his money, as against a bona fide lien holder who acquired his lien after the release of the old lien, without notice of such agreement as to the payment. Straman v. Rechline, supra.

And where a debtor gave several promissory notes to his creditor, and executed a mortgage on a lot of land to secure their payment, and afterwards, after other creditors had secured judgments against him, transferred the mortgaged property to the creditor in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, the mortgagee, thus discharging the encumbrance against the lot, and taking it in satisfaction of his debt, cannot have the mortgage reinstated in equity, so as to retain his prior lien over the other judgment creditors of the mortgagor. Campbell v. Carter, 14 Ill. 286.

For consideration of this subject under the rule that ignorance or mistake of law does not excuse, see Guy v. DuUprey, 16 Cal. 196, 76 Am. Dec. 518; Bentley v. Whit- temore, 18 N. J. Eq. 366; and Garwood v. Eldridge, 2 N. J. Eq. 145, 34 Am. Dec. 195; supra IV, b, 3 (b).

The question, considered from the standpoint of mistakes resulting in failure to carry out intention, of restoration of discharged mortgage, is treated supra, IV. c, 3, (c), (2).

The right to reinstatement of mortgage released or discharged by mistake is considered at length in notes to Atkisson v. Plumb, 58 L.R.A. 788, and to Errett v. Wheeler, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 816.

d. Contracts and instruments subject to reformation.

1. Generally.

Courts of equity will relieve against mistake in, and correct and reform all kinds of, deeds and instruments. Burgin v. Giberson, 26 N. J. Eq. 72.

Chancery will enforce contracts that are fair and certain, and will avoid those which are fraudulent or built on mistake. Shelby v. Smith, 2 A. K. Marsh. 504.

And the general jurisdiction of courts of equity to set aside or reform contracts or instruments on the ground of mistake includes both executed and executory contracts. Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 159; Leitensdorfer v. Delphy, 15 Mo. 160, 55 Am. Dec. 137; Paine v. Upton, 87 N. Y. 327, 41 Am. Rep. 371.

Reformation may be had with respect to written instruments operating inter vivos, whether they are executed contracts, such as deeds, mortgages, or leases; or executory agreements, such as bonds, insurance policies, notes, bills of exchange, etc. Gotthelf v. Shapiro, 136 App. Div. 1, 120 N. Y. Supp. 210.

And this is so whether they are within or without the statute of frauds, and whether for the conveyance of real or personal property. Wyche v. Greene, supra.

The consummation of the transaction, in ignorance of the mistake and without laches on the part of the party injured, gives the other party no immunity from making recompense, and does not deprive the court of the power to remedy the injustice. Paine v. Upton, supra.

And executed contracts may, in a proper case, be corrected in equity, either by enlarging or restricting the subject-matter. Davis v. Ely, 104 N. C. 16, 5 L.R.A. 810, 17 Am. St. Rep. 667, 10 S. E. 138.

So, a supersedeas bond may be reformed in equity in the event of a mistake made in its execution; but the reformation of such a bond which does not comply with the statute, to conform with the intent of the parties, should extend no further than to make the same a complete, statutory bond, unless there was an express agreement between the parties as to the conditions thereof. Nourse v. Weitz, 120 Iowa, 708, 95 N. W. 251.

And an instrument in writing which on its face is a guaranty of the collection of a certain bond and mortgage may, in a proper case, be reformed by a court of equity so as to become a guaranty of the payment of the bond and mortgage. Simpkins v. Taylor, 81 Hun, 467, 31 N. Y. Supp. 169.

And where one person signed an agreement to take from another a lease of a house at a rent of £230, and by the terms of the lease on which the agreement was written the rental was erroneously stated to be £130, and a lease was afterwards executed in which the rent was erroneously stated to be £130, on the view that the lessee must have perceived the discrepancy between the amount of the rent previously stated and that reserved in the lease, it was held that the lessor was not entitled to have the lease reformed, but that the proper relief was to give the lessee the option of taking the reformed lease or rejecting it, paying in the latter case a rental for the past occupation and a mortgage on the lease created by the lessee. Garrard v. Frankel, 30 Beav. 445.

So, the omission of a defeasance clause from a deed of trust is a mistake which a court of equity will correct where its interference is invoked. Michigan Buggy Co. v. Woodson, 59 Mo. App. 550.

And a contract for the services of a teacher in a public school of a township, purporting on its face to be a contract between the teacher and the civil township, may be reformed in an action thereon against the school township, upon an allegation of mutual mistake, and enforced against the latter corporation. Sparta School Twp. v. Mendell, 138 Ind. 188, 37 N. E. 604.

But where a mortgagor conveyed the mortgaged premises to a third person by deed, containing a clause stating that the purchaser assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage, and action was brought to foreclose the mortgage, making both the mortgagor and the purchaser of the mortgaged premises parties, the purchaser alleging that she did not assume or agree to pay the mortgage and that the mortgagor, to whom she intrusted the transfer, without her knowledge or consent fraudulently inserted the clause, and she accepted the deed believing it had been drawn according to the prior agreement, and did not know that it contained the clause, her right to a reform of the deed by striking out the clause is not affected on the theory that she should have tendered an issue to the grantor as to the alleged fraud; since the action is in equity, and the grantor was a party, and a complete determination of every question could be had. Albany City Sav. Inst. v. Burdick, 87 N. Y. 40.

A court of equity will not reform a deed made by a person individually, however, so as to convert it into a deed as trustee for certain cestuis que trust who never received any of the purchase money nor were otherwise involved by the individual deed of their trustee. Ellis v. Hunnicutt, 71 Ga. 637.

Nor can a lease be reformed by incorporating in it a subsequent parol agreement with reference to additional improvements upon the leased premises and an increase of monthly rental on account thereof. Wilson v. Moriarty, 88 Cal. 207, 26 Pac. 85.

And a court of equity will not enforce a building contract. Mastin v. Halley, 61 Mo. 196.

2. Judicial and official sales.

Judicial sales as a general rule are not subject to correction by reforming the deed. Keeper v. Force, 86 Ind. 81.

The record of a judgment at law imports absolute verity, and a court of chancery cannot examine or determine whether it expresses the judicial determination of the court in which it was pronounced, or whether it was entered up, by mistake of the clerk, different from what it ought to have been or was intended to be. Cutter v. Kline, 35 N. J. Eq. 534.

And where an incorrect description of lands intended to be mortgaged or otherwise transferred is carried into the judgment order of sale and sheriff's deed, the proceedings cannot be corrected either at the instance of the mortgagee or the purchaser at such sale. Conyers v. Mericles, 75 Ind. 443; Miller v. Kolb, 47 Ind. 220; Rogers v. Abbott, 37 Ind. 138.

And this is so, although the sheriff, at the sale, may have pointed out as the property he was selling the property that ought to have been described in the mortgage; the authority of the sheriff to sell is limited to the property actually described in the decree and order of sale. Miller v. Kolb, supra.

So, a tax sale partakes of the nature of a judicial sale: it is made by operation of law, and in it the owner of the land does not participate, and in it there can be no mutual mistake between him and the purchaser; and a deed to a purchaser for taxes which by mistake of the county auditor erroneously describes the land cannot be reformed by a suit in equity. Keeper v. Force, 86 Ind. 81.

And if, when proceeding to enforce a lien claim to recover against the same person as obligor and owner, the record shows a general judgment only, a court of chancery, in the absence of fraud or imposition, cannot directly or indirectly impose the debt involved therein as a lien on the lands in equity, on the ground that it ought to have been regarded as a special as well as a general judgment, and was erroneously recorded by mistake of the clerk. Cutter v. Kline, supra.

And where a purchase at a sheriff's sale was made at the request and with the consent of the defendant in execution, and for his benefit, upon an express agreement that he should be at liberty to redeem, and the purchaser was to hold such interest under the sheriff's deed as would indemnify him for the money advanced, and one intended to give and the other to receive a valid security, and it turns out to be insufficient in law, the purchaser has, in equity, a vested lien on the property for the amount of his judgment, and the other is estopped from coming into court and setting up any defect in the title. Vanness v. Vanness, 1 N. J. Eq. 248.

Mistakes are corrected in equity even when they occur in the records of proceedings of courts and exist in the records themselves, however, not by reviewing the judgments of proceedings of the courts, but by restraining the parties who may take advantage of such mistakes from doing so, or by compelling them to execute proper papers for the purpose of such correction. Loss v. Obry, 22 N. J. Eq. 52.

And a sheriff's deed may be reformed in equity to accord with the facts, where admissible evidence shows that its recitals are wrong and should be corrected. Bartlett v. Judd, 21 N. Y. 200, 78 Am. Dec. 131; Ehleringer v. Moriarty, 10 Iowa, 78; Stites v. Wiedner, 35 Ohio St. 555.

So, where an incorrect description of lands intended to be mortgaged is carried into the judgment, order of sale, notice, and sheriff's deed, though such proceedings cannot be corrected either at the instance of the mortgagee or the purchaser at such sale, such mistake may be corrected by reforming the mortgage and foreclosing it as reformed. Conyers v. Mericles, 75 Ind. 443; McCasland v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 108 Ind. 130, 9 N. E. 119.

And if a mistake in a mortgage, by leaving out a part of the lands to be mortgaged, was mutual, and was not discovered until after a decree of foreclosure had been obtained upon the mortgage and the time fixed by the decree for the payment of the mortgage had expired, and the mortgage be then ordered to be reformed, the decree of foreclosure will be opened so as to permit the mortgagor to redeem the premises by the payment of the entire sum due upon the mortgage. Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vt. 414.

The mortgage as reformed is not merged in the decree, since the original mistake infects all the subsequent proceedings, rendering them nugatory. Davenport v. Sovil, 6 Ohio St. 459; Conyers v. Mericles, supra.

And while a court of equity may have no jurisdiction to correct a mistake in the description of land in a levy indorsed upon an execution and in the certificate of sale, for the reason that there is a remedy at law by motion, yet when the same mistake occurs in the sheriff's deed to the purchaser and in the deed of the premises to the judgment debtor, a court of equity has jurisdiction, and may correct such mistake, in not only the deeds, but also in the levy. Bradshaw v. Atkins, 110 Ill. 323.

In a foreclosure case it is always a question of fact what premises are mortgaged, and in decreeing a sale the court is bound to determine what premises are to be sold, and down to the rendition of the decree the court should hear any allegation of mistake in the description of the mortgaged premises and correct any error that may be made manifest by proof. Eborn v. Cannon, 32 Tex. 231.

Nor is the equity of a vendee for the correction of a deed displaced by the lien of a subsequent judgment or execution issued thereunder. Blackburn v. Randolph, 33 Ark. 119.

And where a sheriff, in levying an execution upon real estate, misdescribed the same and sold property in accordance with his descriptions, which did not belong to the judgment debtor, after which the judgment debtor told the purchaser that he would redeem the same from the sale, the judgment debtor cannot be compelled to correct the mistake of the officer by the execution of a deed conveying the property to a purchaser by a correct description. Butcher v. Buchanan, 17 Iowa, 81.

But the rule that equity will grant relief where the quantity of land deeded is materially different from the quantity contemplated or intended is not usually applied in cases of sales by trustees and other fiduciaries or officers. Where there has been such a sale and conveyance, and subsequently an excess of quantity is discovered, if upon no higher principle, at least upon that of mutuality of right between the vendor and vendee, the former as well as the latter should have redress. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Paytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

g. Who may assert mistake.

It would seem that anyone to whom the mistake in question was a detriment, and having at least an equitable title to the property concerned, the parties both supposing, before the mistake was known, that a legal title had been transferred, may assert the mistake, and, either by way of defense or by way of a direct proceeding in equity, apply for relief.

Thus, a grantee in a deed may maintain an action to reform the deeds in his chain of title. Gwyer v. Spaulding, 33 Neb. 573, 50 N. W. 681; Weathers v. Hill, 92 Ala. 492, 9 So. 412.

And a grantor in a deed may have a mistake therein corrected as against the heir at law of the grantee. Savage v. McCorkle, 17 Or. 42, 21 Pac. 444.

And a grantor in a deed seeking to rectify a mistake therein is not estopped from securing relief because the land had been previously sold under judgment and execution in his favor, unless he directed the land to be sold or received a portion of the proceeds. Young v. Coleman, 43 Mo. 179.

So, the mortgagor has the right, in an action brought by the assignee of the mortgage to foreclose the same, to set up and prove a mistake in the drawing of the instrument, and have the same reformed. Andrews v. Gillespie, 47 N. Y. 487.

And where the object of a suit is to reform a contract, and to set aside and cancel a sheriff's deed taken by the defendant in violation of the terms of the agreement, the deed conveying whatever interest the plaintiff had in the property, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show the title to the land conveyed to have been in him to entitle him to relief on demand. Monroe v. Skelton, 36 Ind. 302.

And where public land was improperly certified to a state under a Federal land grant to the state, so that in equity the state had no title, and the state contracted with a person to sell the land to him, which contract transferred nothing, the United States may maintain a suit for the cancellation of such contract, and it may be decreed therein that the title of the purchaser be divested and that he surrender his contract for cancellation. Williams v. United States, 138 U. S. 517, 34 L. ed. 1028, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459.

A court of equity will not interfere to cancel a deed alleged to be fraudulent, however, on the prayer of one having no interest in the land conveyed. Norris v. Laberee, 58 Me. 260.

And where by reason of a misdescription of land in a deed a grantee did not obtain the legal title, but was put in possession, and before the mistake was discovered the lands were sold on execution against the grantee, and the purchaser took possession, the purchaser acquired no title, either at law or in equity, and could not maintain a suit to reform the deed. Conner v. Wells, 91 Ind. 197.

f. Against whom relief will be granted.

1. General rules.

Relief in contracts and other written instruments will be granted as between the original parties and their privies in law, in fact, or estate. Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63; Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 159; Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Lowe v. Allen, 68 Ga. 225; Berry v. Sowell, 72 Ala. 14; East v. Peden, 108 Ind. 92, 8 N. E. 772; Sample v. Rowe, 24 Ind. 208; Bush v. Bush, 33 Kan. 556, 6 Pac. 794; Young v. Coleman, 43 Mo. 179; Martin v. Nixon, 92 Mo. 26, 4 S. W. 503.

This includes personal representatives, heirs, devisees, legatees, assignees, voluntary grantees, and judgment creditors, or purchasers from them with notice of the facts. Wyche v. Greene; Wall v. Arrington; and Berry v. Sowell,—supra; Holabird v. Burr, 17 Conn. 559; Sample v. Rowe, supra; Warburton v. Lauman, 2 G. Greene, 420; Young v. Coleman and Martin v. Nixon, supra; Savage v. McCorkle, 17 Or. 42, 21 Pac. 444.

And a mistake in the description of lands belonging to a decedent, intended to be included in a mortgage executed in his lifetime by him and his wife, may be corrected in an action for that purpose against his widow and heirs or devisees and administrator or executor. Wilson v. Stewart, 63 Ind. 294.

And while a mere naked power may not be reformed, when it becomes a part of the principal's contract with another by the agent acting under it, so that it cannot be revoked so as to affect the rights of such other, it may, when necessary, be reformed. Olson v. Erickson, 42 Minn. 441, 44 N. W. 317.

Nor will equity refuse to correct a mistake in a deed because the property embraced in it has been sold under execution, where the purchaser took with notice of the facts. Young v. Coleman, supra.

So, an action for reformation of a deed and for damages for breach of covenant of warranty may be brought against a remote grantor who conveyed to plaintiff's grantor with covenants sufficient to support the action, and which were the same that were contained in plaintiff's deed. Butler v. Barnes, 60 Conn. 170, 12 L.R.A. 273, 21 Atl. 419.

But when a purchaser of land, whose deed conveyed to him a larger quantity of land than was contemplated by the parties, has sold and conveyed the land to another for a valuable consideration without notice of the mistake as to the quantity, the right of the first vendor to a rescission of the sale and conveyance made by him is extinguished unless there be such mistake in the last sale and conveyance made under such circumstances that the vendor in that sale is entitled to a rescission, when perhaps the first vendor having such a right against the latter vendor may be substituted to his right against the purchaser from him. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

Nor is there any difference in principle in the reformation of an instrument to make it express the intention of the parties, whether a surety is a party to it or not. Henkleman v. Peterson, 154 Ill. 419, 40 N. E. 359, overruling Trustees of Schools v. Otis, 85 Ill. 179.

And an instrument executed by a surety may be reformed as against him where it is the subject of fraud or mutual mistake, in the same manner as if it were executed by the principal debtor. Prior v. Williams, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 624; Wiser v. Blachly, 1 Johns. Ch. 607; State ex rel. Frank v. Frank, 51 Mo. 98; Smith v. Allen, 1 N. J. Eq. 43, 21 Am. Dec. 33; Butler v. Durham, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 589; Neininger v. State, 50 Ohio St. 394, 40 Am. St. Rep. 674, 34 N. E. 633; United States v. Cushman, 2 Sumn. 426, Fed. Cas. No. 14,908.

And it may be reformed upon parol proof, like other written instruments, and then enforced against the surety. Neininger v. State, supra.

And an injunction bond may be reformed in a court of equity by adding seals thereto, against the sureties as well as against the principal, such bond by mistake and inadvertence not having been sealed at the time of its execution. Keith v. Henkleman, 68 Ill. App. 623, affirmed in 173 Ill. 137, 50 N. E. 692.

But a joint bond cannot, as against a surety, be shown to have been made so by mistake instead of a joint and several bond, by evidence outside the contract itself, unless the evidence leaves no doubt that a mistake in point of fact has been committed and the instructions of the parties departed from. Moser v. Libenguth, 2 Rawle, 428.

So, where a partnership gave a chattel mortgage which was not recorded, and which by a mistake of the parties did not include property intended to be conveyed, and subsequently, in a suit for the dissolution of the partnership, a receiver was appointed for it, the mortgagee is entitled, as against the receiver, to have the mortgage reformed, the receiver taking the property of the firm subject to his equity. Ryder v. Ryder, 19 R. I. 188, 32 Atl. 919.

And where an administrator paid a claim against the decedent's estate in full, when the estate was insolvent, and the paid claim was subsequently disallowed, the liability of the administrator for the overpayment is not affected by the fact that when it was made he had no knowledge of the condition of the estate or of the mistake under which the payment was made. Mansfield v. Lynch, 59 Conn. 320, 12 L.R.A. 285, 22 Atl. 313.

So, a mutual mistake in the description of property mortgaged is sufficient to justify the reformation of the instrument by a court of equity, not only as against the mortgagors, but also as against purchasers under them chargeable with notice of such mistake. Carpenter Paper Co. v. Wilcox, 50 Neb. 659, 70 N. W. 228; Willis v. Henderson, 5 Ill. 13, 38 Am. Dec. 120; Strang v. Beach, 11 Ohio St. 283, 78 Am. Dec. 308; Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vt. 414.

And where two tenants in common divided their lands by deed of partition, and there was a mutual mistake in the deed with reference to the division line between them, and the agreed line was recognized and understood by them to be the one described in the deed so long as they were the owners, and, when they sold, the purchasers took with a like understanding and also recognized the agreed line for several years, the mistake is remediable in equity both as against the original owners and their grantees. May v. Adams, 58 Vt. 74, 3 Atl. 187.

So, where an agent of a town gave a memorandum of bonds to a printer, and by mistake the provision therein giving an option to redeem the bonds in ten years was omitted, and the mistake was not discovered until after they were negotiated, a holder of the bonds, who had notice of the mistake and that the town had called in the bonds for a redemption when he purchased them, may be compelled to correct the mistake. Essex v. Day, 52 Conn. 483, 1 Atl. 620.

A contract which fails to express a material term of the real contract which the parties mutually intended to make will not be reformed by a court of equity, however, against innocent third persons who had acquired vested rights and who cannot be placed in statu quo. Berry v. Sowell, 72

Ala. 14; East v. Peden, 108 Ind. 92, 8 N. E. 22; Hoeldtke v. Horstman (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 642; Johnson v. Parker, 34 Wis. 596.

As against a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, a court of equity will not decree the reformation of a conveyance on the ground of mistake, because such purchaser has the legal title and an equal equity. Early v. Owens, 68 Ala. 171; Davidson v. Davidson, 42 Ark. 362; Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63; Macon v. Dasher, 90 Ga. 195, 16 S. E. 75; Lowe v. Allen, 68 Ga. 225; Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Boardman v. Taylor, 66 Ga. 628; Pence v. Armstrong, 95 Ind. 191; Dart v. Barbour, 32 Mich. 267; Martin v. Nixon, 92 Mo. 26, 4 S. W. 503; Quick v. Stuyvesant, 2 Paige, 84; Ray v. Durham County, 110 N. C. 169, 14 S. E. 646; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Citizens' Nat. Bank (S. D.) 125 N. W. 642; Farley v. Deslonde, 69 Tex. 458, 6 S. W. 786; Robinson v. Braiden, 44 W. Va. 183, 28 S. E. 798; Lough v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 679, 17 S. E. 181, 470; Malden v. Menill, 2 Atk. 8.

Courts of equity will interfere in cases of mistake in written instruments only as between the original parties or those claiming under them in privity, such as personal representatives, heirs, devisees, legatees, assignees, voluntary grantees, or judgment creditors, or purchasers from them with notice of the facts. Adams v. Baker, 24 Nev. 162, 77 Am. St. Rep. 799, 51 Pac. 252; Cross v. Bean, 81 Me. 525, 17 Atl. 710.

Nor will courts of equity reform and enlarge a mortgage executed by one who is insolvent, if the rights of third parties would be changed and injured thereby, as in a case in which if the mortgage had been larger when it was given the other creditors would have instituted proceedings in insolvency before the lien became absolute. Tabor v. Cilley, 53 Vt. 487.

And a mortgage cannot be reformed so as to include land which has passed since its execution into the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Toll v. Davenport, 74 Mich. 386, 42 N. W. 63; Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vt. 414.

And a person who conveyed land through a third person to his wife, in ignorance of the legal effect of the conveyance, which land upon her death was conveyed by her heir to a third person, cannot maintain a bill in equity to compel the purchaser to convey the land to him, where there is nothing to show that the purchaser took the legal title otherwise than in good faith for value and without notice of any trust in favor of the husband. Molony v. Rourke, 100 Mass. 190.

Nor can a mortgage be reformed, and given priority over another mortgage taken in good faith for value and without notice, irrespective of the recording act. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Citizens' National Bank, supra.

And if a mistake is made upon a general accounting between mortgagor and mortgagee of all arrears of principal and interest, in consequence of which a new note and mortgage are taken for less than the amount actually due according to the basis on which their calculations are made, the sum thus omitted through mistake cannot be considered a part of the mortgage debt as against a subsequent mortgagee or a purchaser of the equity of redemption whose rights intervened before the mistake was discovered and corrected. Eslava v. Lepretre, 21 Ala. 504, 56 Am. Dec. 266.

Nor can a mortgagee have his mortgage reformed and corrected on the ground of a mistake in describing the real estate, to make the mortgage cover another and different tract of land than that described therein, as against a judgment creditor who has purchased in good faith for a valuable consideration judgments rendered against the mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage. Flanders v. O'Brien, 46 Ind. 284.

And where a bill is filed to reform a deed so as to change the location of a right of way over land, a subsequent mortgagee of the land is entitled to be protected from any loss caused to him by such reformation. White v. Shaffer, 97 Md. 359, 54 Atl. 974.

And the record of a conveyance void for insufficiency of description is not constructive notice, and will not put a stranger upon inquiry. Cass County v. Oldham, 75 Mo. 50.

So, where an assignment of a whole mortgage is made by mistake, instead of a part, and the assignee has conveyed for a valuable consideration to a bona fide purchaser without notice of any mistake or claim by the original mortgagee, no decree of reformation of the mortgage will be made against him to the prejudice of his interest subsequently accruing. Langdon v. Keith, 9 Vt. 299.

Nor can the purchaser of a promissory note before due, in good faith, for a full consideration, and in reliance upon the validity of a trust mortgage as it then read given to secure the payment of said note and of other indebtedness of the mortgagor, with a preference in favor of said note, be deprived of such preference by the reformation of the mortgage so as to eliminate the preference therefrom. Dunham v. W. Steele Packing & Provision Co. 100 Mich. 75, 58 N. W. 627.

So, a decree reforming a deed does not affect the rights of persons not parties to the suit. Daggett v. Ayer, 65 N. H. 82, 18 Atl. 169.

And a grantor cannot be compelled to correct a mistake in his deed, while the grantee, or person claiming under him, who is seeking to compel the correction, is in default in the payment of purchase money. McFadden v. Rogers, 70 Mo. 421.

So, in Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 15 Pet. 233, 10 L. ed. 721, the rule that a court of chancery will relieve against mistake was applied to a controversy with reference to a boundary between two states, where the line had been established by commissioners acting for the states while colonies, under an alleged mistake.

2. Who are innocent purchasers for value against whom reformation cannot be had.

A mere creditor, or even a creditor having a general lien, as for example a judgment, is apparently not an innocent purchaser against whom reformation of a contract or other written instrument may not be had.

Thus, a court of equity will correct a mistake, clearly proved by parol evidence, in an agreement for the sale and purchase of real estate, whether the contest is between the vendor and purchaser or the vendor and creditors of the purchaser. Mauzy v. Sellars, 26 Gratt. 641.

And a mistake of the scrivener in drawing a deed, whether of law or fact, will be corrected by a court of equity even against bona fide creditors of the grantor. Alexander v. Newton, 2 Gratt. 266; Marine Sav. Bank v. Norton, 160 Mich. 614, 125 N. W. 754.

But a court of equity would be much less disposed to interfere for the reform of an instrument for a mistake of law in favor of a particular creditor against the general creditors of an insolvent estate, than in an ordinary case. Hunt v. Rhodes, 1 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 27.

And while a debtor may prefer one creditor to another provided the instrument designed to effect the object contains the requisite provisions, if, through a mistake of law, the parties select and use such an instrument as cannot effect their object without the aid of a court of equity, the court will not correct the mistake by reforming the instrument to the prejudice of the general creditors of a debtor in embarrassed circumstances. Anderson v. Tydings, 8 Md. 427, 63 Am. Dec. 708.

And where creditors, by reason of a mistake in law in drawing a deed, have a legal advantage, a court of equity will not deprive them of it by rectifying the deed for the benefit of parties whose claim rests upon no stronger equity than theirs. Ibid.

So, a mistake in a conveyance of real property will be decreed by equity as against judgment creditors having no legal title, but only a lien. Early v. Owens, 68 Ala. 171.

Statutes of registration for the protection of judgment creditors against unrecorded conveyances relate only to conveyances of the legal estate in lands, and have no application to mere equitable assets or interests which are not subject to the lien of executions or judgments, and there is nothing in such statutes, which, as in favor of judgment creditors, forbids the reformation of a recorded mortgage by a court of equity so as to make it include lands which were omitted by mistake. Bailey v. Timberlake, 74 Ala. 221.

And the same rule applies to a lien secured by attachment. Bush v. Bush, 33 Kan. 556, 6 Pac. 794.

And one who obtains a judgment lien and an execution against property is not a purchaser for value whose rights will be preferred to a vendee who, before the date of the judgment, had paid the price and received a deed intended, but which by mistake failed, to convey the property. Morson v. Collier, 79 Ind. 417.

Nor does a judgment creditor, whose debt was made before the making of a deed to land but whose judgment was obtained afterwards, stand on the basis of a bona fide purchaser without notice, so as to prevent the correction of a mistake in the deed as against him. Lowe v. Allen, 68 Ga. 225.

And the equity of a party who procures reformation of a written instrument on the ground that it fails to express the contract of the parties attaches prior, and is paramount, to the lien of a judgment obtained against the party in whom, by reason of such mistake, the legal title vests. Stone v. Hale, 17 Ala. 557, 52 Am. Dec. 185.

But a correction will not be had against one who, having actual notice at the time of his purchase, bought the land in question at execution sale founded on a judgment rendered in favor of a party who had no notice of the mistake at the time the judgment was recovered. Nugent v. Priebatsch, 61 Miss. 402.

Nor does failure to record a deed, or its attestation by but one witness, postpone it to judgments junior to it, so as to prevent its reformation for mistake. Lowe v. Allen, 68 Ga. 225.

And where lands were intended to be conveyed to a person in trust for the grantor, but by mistake were conveyed to such person absolutely, and a third person having a judgment against the trustee, which was a lien on his real estate, caused execution to be levied on such lands, the vendor is entitled to have the deed reformed so as to express the trust and thereby to release the lands from the apparent lien of the third person's judgment. Sullivan v. Bruhling, 66 Wis. 472, 29 N. W. 211.

So, where land intended to be included in a mortgage is by mistake omitted, and a judgment is subsequently rendered against the mortgagor, the lien of the judgment creditor is subject to the equity of the mortgage, and does not exceed the actual interest which the judgment debtor had in the land at the time of its rendition. Martin v. Nixon, 92 Mo. 26, 4 S. W. 503; Phillips v. Roquemore, 96 Ga. 719, 23 S. E. 855.

Nor is the priority of the lien of a mortgage, on the omitted property, corrected to include property omitted by mistake, over a judgment obtained after the mortgage was originally executed but before its reformation, affected by the fact that the judgment was founded upon a debt in the contracting of which by the debtor credit was extended to him on the faith of his apparent unencumbered ownership of the omitted property, there being no protection by the statute in such cases to others than bona fide purchasers for value without notice. Phillips v. Roquemore, supra.

So, where after-acquired property was intended to be included in a chattel mort-page given by a corporation to a bank, but was left out by mistake, but both parties to the mortgage understood that it covered such property, and acted upon that understanding, the mortgage is not fraudulent as against general creditors of the corporation, and reformation should be granted. Marine Sav. Bank v. Norton, 160 Mich. 614, 125 N. W. 754.

It has been held, however, that a defective mortgage when reformed will not affect a lien of a judgment rendered between the date of the execution and the reformation of the mortgage. Van Thorniley v. Peters, 26 Ohio St. 471.

In an action to reform and foreclose a mortgage in which a mistake was made, a notice of lis pendens duly filed prior to the record of a deed from the mortgagors to a grantee against whom a judgment had been recovered, will save to the plaintiffs their prior lien as against such judgment, because such judgment, by the terms of the recording act, only takes precedence where the judgment debtor's title is of record. Lebanon Sav. Bank v. Hollenbeck, 29 Minn. 322, 13 N. W. 145.

And a junior mortgagee has no equity to have a mistake of the scrivener corrected in a senior mortgage, by which the senior mortgagee obtained a lien upon more property than was intended, since he is bound by the record of the senior mortgage. Ames v. New Jersey Franklinite Co. 12 N. J. Eq. 66, 72 Am. Dec. 385.

So, where an error in the description appears on the face of the record of a mortgage, that is sufficient notice to a subsequent purchaser to put him on his guard. Walls v. State, 140 Ind. 16, 38 N. E. 177.

And mistakes in the description of land may always be corrected against a party who buys with full knowledge of another's prior purchase of land from the same grantor. Smith v. Schweigerer, 129 Ind. 363, 28 N. E. 696.

And the fact of possession by a party of property under a claim of title which by mistake had been conveyed to another is a sufficient intimation of the right of possession to put the purchaser upon inquiry into the nature of his rights, and, failing to make it, the purchaser is in equity visited with all the consequences of the knowledge of the title. Baynard v. Norris, 5 Gill, 468, 46 Am. Dec. 647.

And where a bill charges the defendant with having notice of the true contract and intention of the parties to a deed when he made a levy upon property covered by the deed, he takes by the levy the land of the debtor subject to all equities, and where the deed on its face discloses the intention to make it a mortgage its record is notice to subsequent purchasers of the equity which that intention creates. Sampson v. Mudge, 13 Fed. 260.

And a conveyance to a purchaser, upon a condition therein expressed that it is to be void if the purchaser shall not support the father of the grantor, and as a consideration for which the grantee undertook to pay a stipulated sum in case he should hold the land under his deed, is not such a purchase for value as will render his want of notice available against a prior equitable title. Doe v. Doe, 37 N. H. 268.

Where a grantor in conveying land, by mistake included his dwelling house and cleared lands adjoining it, not intending to do so, however, relief will be granted when the evidence is satisfactory that he acted under a mistake, though the grantee was not cognizant of the mistake at the time of the conveyance. Mitchell v. Mitchell, 40 Ga. 11.

And where one person granted to another a lease in which by error the rental was stated to be £130 instead of £230, and the lessee mortgaged it to a third person without notice of the mistake, and another person afterwards paid the mortgagee, and the lease was reassigned to the lessee, and not to the person making the payment, the claim of the person making the payment in respect to the mortgage and sums advanced by him without notice is entitled to priority over the lessor's equity to reform the lease. Garrard v. Frankel, 30 Beav. 445.

And where a mortgage is executed by a wife, and her husband joins therein to release his right of curtesy, and the note secured is in fact signed by both, but is in the mortgage stated to be signed by him only, and her claim of title to a part of the property is, as the records show, based upon a void execution sale against him, and it appears that both he and she and the mortgagee acted as though this property was hers, these facts are not sufficient to give notice to third persons that the husband had agreed to join in the mortgage, and the mortgage will not be reformed in equity, nor the execution of a new mortgage compelled, so as to affect the rights of persons claiming under the husband, acquired after the execution of the imperfect mortgage and without actual notice that he had agreed to join therein. Livingstone v. Murphy, 187 Mass. 315, 105 Am. St. Rep. 400, 72 N. E. 1012.

g. Necessity that injury be substantial.

The power of rescinding a sale of real estate is one of the highest attributes of a court of equity, and the public good requires that it be exercised with great caution and only in cases of extraordinary hardship; and the instances in which the power is exerted are generally cases where it is necessary in order to prevent great mischief. Taylor v. Fleet, 4 Barb. 95; Conaway v. Gore, 24 Kan. 389; Prescott v. Cooper, 37 La. Ann. 553; Hoeldtke v. Horstman (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 642.

A mistake in a contract, to warrant relief in equity, must be material. Marshall v. Homier, 13 Okla. 264, 74 Pac. 368; Burns v. Caskey, 100 Mich. 94, 58 N. W. 642; Daggett v. Ayer, 65 N. H. 82, 18 Atl. 169; Deare v. Carr, 3 N. J. Eq. 513; Taylor v. Fleet, supra; Mills v. Kampfe, 135 App. Div. 748, 119 N. Y. Supp. 903.

And no occasion exists for the reformation of an instrument when, upon the true construction of it, its meaning and effect are as they are proposed to be made by the amendment. Heert v. Cruger, 14 Misc. 508, 35 N. Y. Supp. 1063.

Nor will a contract be reformed where the contract as written was of the same legal effect as the court is asked to make it. Wolsey v. Neeley, 46 Ill. App. 387.

And a mistake will not be corrected in equity by making a contract apply to lands which had been omitted from it, instead of to those which were mentioned in it, and to enforce the contract when corrected, where the parties have not acted upon the contract, and there are no equitable circumstances requiring such correction. Climer v. Hovey, 15 Mich. 18.

So, if a party, in making a conveyance of one part of a mining claim, makes a mistake against himself as to the amount conveyed, and, in another part of the same conveyance, makes a mistake in his own favor of a corresponding amount in another portion of the same mine, and the grantee obtains no more in the aggregate than he purchased and paid for, the equities are equal, and a court of equity will not reform the conveyance by correcting the mistake against the grantor, to the injury of the other party upon the entire transaction. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7827.

And where there is a mutual mistake in the land intended to be mortgaged, but land is mortgaged which is owned by the mortgagor, and there is a foreclosure sale and purchase thereunder by the mortgagee, and the amount of the bid is the amount of the debt due, and the land purchased is worth in value the amount of the bid, the debt is paid and the mortgage is extinguished, and there can be no reformation. Ray v. Ferrell, 127 Ind. 570, 27 N. E. 159.

Nor should a sale of land be vacated by reason of a mistake caused by the representations of the seller unless the difference between the recommended and the actual value of the property is very considerable; a mere disappointment on the part of the buyer in some unimportant particular, although he may have made it the principal inducement for his purchase, is not enough. Taylor v. Fleet, supra.

And if an amount is claimed to have been over paid an outgoing partner in a settlement on a dissolution of a partnership, the amount must be certain, and the error made under circumstances and be of such a character as to make it just and equitable that it should be rectified. Hunt v. Stuart, 53 Md. 225.

And where a discharge of a mortgage is given on real estate for less than is due, by reason of an erroneous computation of interest, it is not a matter of course for equity to interfere afterwards to correct the error. And where circumstances appeared in the case which would render it inequitable for the holder of the mortgage to collect the full amount of interest, a court of equity irrespective of strict legal rights, will decline to interfere in his behalf. Wright v. Garrison, 40 Mich. 50.

So, a person purchasing land subject to a mortgage is not estopped by the insertion, by mistake of the scrivener, of a stipulation that the grantee agrees to pay the mortgage debt, since the mortgagee is not prejudiced thereby. Adams v. Wheeler, 122 Ind. 251, 23 N. E. 760.

A city has a right to treat its contract for paving as reformed to conform to the real agreement, and to allow claims for paving on such basis, so as to avoid litigation incident to reformation. Fullerton v. Des Moines (Iowa) 126 N. W. 159.

h. Effect of adequate remedy at law.

A court of equity will not sustain a bill for relief if, from the allegations, it appears that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law. Blanchard v. Kenton, 4 Bibb. 451.

And where a purchaser paid more for property under a written contract to purchase than the price agreed upon by the parties, it is not necessary to reform the contract in equity, since the purchaser could sue at law to recover the money paid through mistake, and if the contract was relied upon as a defense, could show that it did not contain the true contract. Ragsdale v. Turner, 141 Iowa, 604, 120 N. W. 109.

So, where a person sold his land, and it was expressly agreed that certain grain should be reserved, and should not pass with the land, and the stipulation to that effect was left out of the agreement by mistake, the vendor is entitled to recover of the purchaser for grain cut and carried away, in an action for trespass. Lauchner v. Rex, 20 Pa. 464.

A party is entitled to relief in equity, however, though a remedy at law exists, where, on account of a mistake in drawing up the instrument intended to secure the remedy, it is not as full, adequate, and complete as the one contemplated by the parties. Newcomer v. Kline, 11 Gill & J. 457, 37 Am. Dec. 74.

And though a party named as obligee in a bond may sue thereon at law, it does not follow that he has an adequate remedy at law, so that equity has no jurisdiction, since he is entitled to a security the consideration of which cannot be inquired into at law. Montville v. Haughton, 7 Conn. 543.

And though one who purchases property and pays more therefor than the price agreed upon by the parties could sue at law to recover money paid through mistake, he can recover such overpayments in a suit to reform the contract where no objection is made to that form of action, and the objection that the purchaser's remedy was on the deed, and not to correct a mistake in the contract, is untenable. Ragsdale v. Turner, 141 Iowa, 604, 120 N. W. 109.

But when a bill seeks the reformation of a written contract on the ground of mistake, and also alleges another distinct ground of equitable relief, it is not necessary to allege or show a prior request for the correction of the mistake. Miller v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 83 Ala. 274, 3 Am. St. Rep. 722, 4 So. 842; Sparta School Twp. v. Mendell, supra.

And demand for the reformation of a mortgage need not be made or alleged before suit brought to reform and foreclose it. Walls v. State, supra.

Nor need demand for the correction of a mistake be shown in a suit to quiet title, in which the mistake is alleged as a defense. Lucas v. Labertue, 88 Ind. 277.

Nor is it necessary to make a previous demand for a reformation, where the facts of the case show that a demand would have been a vain and useless formality. Weathers v. Hill, 92 Ala. 492, 9 So. 412.

And a bill for the correction of a mistake in a deed need not allege when the complainant discovered the mistake, or that a demand or request had been made for its correction, where the defendant had instituted suit in ejectment against the complainant's tenant, thus demonstrating the uselessness of a demand. Jones v. McNealy, 139 Ala. 381, 101 Am. St. Rep. 38, 35 So. 1022.

J. Pleadings.

A court of equity will exercise the power of reforming instruments with caution, and only do so when a proper case is made by the pleadings. Stricker v. Tinkham, 35 Ga. 176, 89 Am. Dec. 280; Burley v. Weller, 14 W. Va. 264.

If a mistake is alleged as a ground for reformation of a contract, it must be stated with precision, and made apparent, so that the court may rectify it with a feeling of certainty that it has not committed another and perhaps greater mistake. Stearns v. Page, 7 How. 819, 12 L. ed. 928; Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 474; Gamble v. Daugherty, 71 Mo. 599.

And where fraud is relied upon to secure the reformation of an instrument, it must be averred. Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479; Daughtrey v. Knolle, 44 Tex. 450.

There must be distinct averments as to the time when the fraud, mistake, concealment, or misrepresentation was discovered, and what the discovery is, so that the court may clearly see whether, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, the discovery might not have been made before. Stearns v. Page, supra.

And it is essential that such fraud, mistake, or surprise should be alleged in the bill, as the ground and object of the prayer for relief. Wesley v. Thomas, 6 Harr. & J. 24. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Nor will equity reform a contract on the ground of mistake unless the allegations in the bill are sufficient to show clearly that it was really by mistake that the parties, one and all, entered into the contract. Newell v. Stiles, 21 Ga. 118.

It must be shown that the mistake was mutual. Ramsey v. Smith, 32 N. J. Eq. 28.

And the complainant must show that an unfair advantage had been gained by the defendant through the mistake, and that the mistake would affect him inequitably if allowed to stand. Lewis v. Lewis, 5 Or. 169.

So, where a bill alleged that a deed was given merely to secure a debt, and the answer admits that the grantors made a certain deed in writing, of such date and of such purport and effect as in the bill mentioned and set forth, the answer is not such an admission of the nature and effect of the deed as to preclude all inquiry on the subject. Brown v. Balen, 33 N. J. Eq. 469.

And where the defense in an action on a note was that the note was given by mistake, but the plea did not allege how the mistake occurred, evidence in general terms that the note was given by mistake, that the consideration thereof was settled and paid off before it was made and delivered, is properly excluded. Carr v. Dickson, 58 Ga. 144.

So, a party who files a bill to correct a mistake in a written agreement, in a case in which the court has the power to make a correction therein, must not only state in his bill the agreement as it ought to have been reduced to writing, but also the substance of the written agreement itself. Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 526; Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Electric Goods Mfg. Co. v. Koltonski, 171 Fed. 550.

And he must allege that the parties agreed to the terms of the contract sought to be established. House v. McMullen, 9 Cal. App. 664, 100 Pac. 344.

And he must allege distinctly what the original agreement was, and point out with clearness wherein there was a mistake, and that it did not arise from gross negligence on his part. Meier v. Kelly, 20 Or. 86, 25 Pac. 73.

Nor can correction of a deed be obtained without showing that the complainant holds under it. Ballentine v. Clark, 38 Mich. 395.

And where a party avers a mistake to have been made in a deed of exchange, and sets up a verbal contract differing from the deed, which expressed the consideration to be the exchange of lands described therein, and asks a specific performance of the verbal contract, the terms of the contract must be accurately stated in the bill, and the proof must, in every essential particular, correspond with the terms of the contract thus set up. Atlantic & G. C. Consol Coal Co. v. Maryland Coal Co. 62 Md. 135.

So, a complaint for the reformation of a mortgage containing an erroneous description should set out the land mortgaged, the mistake which occurred, and the prayer for relief should be for the reformation of the instrument in accordance with the correction of the mistake. Walls v. State, 140 Ind. 16, 38 N. E. 177.

And where, in foreclosure proceedings, objection is made to the introduction of the mortgage on the ground that the certificate is defective, the plaintiff should be permitted to amend his complaint, and prove that the acknowledgment was made in compliance with the statute, and have judgment reforming the certificate. Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 63 Cal. 286.

And a complaint to correct a written contract on the ground of mistake, and to enforce it, wherein it is averred in a general and indefinite way that by the mistake, inadvertence, or neglect of the scrivener drawing it up, and without any fault of the plaintiff, the contract does not fully set forth the agreement of the parties, without showing in what respect or particulars it fails to set forth the agreement, and what words are omitted that it was agreed should be inserted, or what words are inserted contrary to the intention of the parties, is insufficient. Baldwin v. Kerlin, 46 Ind. 426.

So, in order to correct a deed, whether on the ground of mutual mistake, mistake of one party and fraud on the part of the other party to the contract, when it was drawn by mistake as an absolute deed, but was intended to be a mortgage or trust deed, or to establish a resulting trust arising on a verbal agreement to buy for another, or to set up a last deed, allegations of the party seeking relief to this effect are necessary to show his right to it. Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, 9 S. E. 445.

And an equitable decree confirming the title to real estate of which a defective conveyance had been made will not be granted without proof of an agreement to convey for the consideration stated in the bill, although the answer admits an agreement to convey for a different consideration, valuable in law, and an intention to make a valid conveyance, but the bill in such case may be amended by leave of court at the hearing upon the bill, answer, and proofs, by striking out the consideration stated, and substituting that admitted. Doe v. Doe, 37 N. H. 268.

And a complaint for rescission of a contract for fraudulent representations must positively and directly allege that the representations inducing the execution of the contract were relied on, and were false, and known to be false by the other party when made, and that plaintiff did not know their falsity, and was misled, to his injury. Church v. Baumgardner (Ind. App.) 92 N. E. 7.

And an allegation in a complaint for reformation by a proportionate reduction of the price in a contract of sale of a tract of land, under the mutual mistake of fact that it contained 28 acres, when it contained several acres less, is insufficient when it does not allege that the mistake of the vendor of the land as to acreage was what induced the purchaser to fix the contract price, instead of a proportionately reduced rate, or 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that the purchaser meant to fix the to by a certain sum per acre, the mere statement that she was mistaken as to the number of acres not having the effect of an allegation. Moffett v. Jaffe, 132 Div. 7, 116 N. Y. Supp. 402, reversing Misc. 584, 114 N. Y. Supp. 614.

But a complaint in a suit to reform a contract, which contains a succinct statement of the contract as intended by the parties, and the agreement actually reduced to writing and signed, and points out the differences between the contract agreed upon and the one alleged to have been signed by mistake, and that the difference was caused by the mutual mistake of the parties, is sufficient. Webb v. Hammond, 31 Ind. App. 613, 68 N. E. 916; State v. Lorenz, 22 Wash. 289, 60 Pac. 644.

It need not set out the exact language omitted from or inserted in the written agreement by mistake. State v. Lorenz, supra.

And a bill for reformation of a contract, alleging what the real agreement was, and that, by mutual mistake and inadvertence of the parties and the scrivener, the contract was not so executed, sufficiently shows that the mistake was mutual. Smelser v. Pugh, 29 Ind. App. 614, 64 N. E. 943.

And the fact that the complaint in an action for the reformation of a mortgage does not, in express terms, aver that the mortgage was erroneously executed through mutual mistake, will not render it insufficient, if it sets up facts from which such a conclusion is inevitable. Murdoch v. Leonard, 15 Wash. 142, 45 Pac. 751.

Nor is it necessary, in order to entitle a contract intended to include certain land, which does not do so by mistake, to be reformed or enforced, that the agreement should show an adequate consideration, and in an action on the contract no consideration for its execution need be alleged. Peasley v. McFadden, 68 Cal. 611, 10 Pac. 179.

And a prayer in a petition in an action in equity on a policy of insurance, that the policy be so reformed as to permit concurrent insurance of a specified amount, and for such other and further relief as plaintiff may be or show himself entitled to, is broad enough to include relief from a provision of the policy rendering it void if the insured now has or shall hereafter procure any other insurance, unless consent in writing is indorsed on the policy. Fitchner v. Fidelity Mut. Fire Asso. 103 Iowa, 276, 72 N. W. 530.

So, where, in an action upon a written contract, the defendant claims a mistake, and seeks to have the contract reformed because thereof, he should allege the facts entitling him to the reformation by way of counterclaim or cross bill, and should pray judgment for such reformation. Born v. Schrenkeisen, 110 N. Y. 55, 17 N. E. 339; Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099.

And all the persons interested must be made parties thereto. Green v. Stone, supra.

And although the defendant in a suit by vendor to recover possession of land conveyed by mistake may, in his pleading, rely on his deed alone, he may show without special plea that after the discovery of the alleged mistake, the vendor received a full consideration for the land, and agreed to let the conveyance remain undisturbed. Wittbecker v. Walters, 69 Tex. 470, 6 S. W. 788.

So, defenses in an action to reform a deed, that the deed expresses the contract, and if it does not, there was such a mutual mistake as would authorize defendant to rescind, are not inconsistent, and both may be relied upon. Lord v. Horr, 30 Wash. 477, 71 Pac. 23.

But where a plaintiff alleged the execution and delivery by the defendant to his testator of a bond for the payment of a certain sum, and a mortgage to secure the same, and the defendant denied the execution of the bond and mortgage, but did not set up any equitable defense, he will not be permitted to show on the trial by oral testimony that it was agreed between himself and the obligee in the bond, at the time it was executed, that the bond should cover only such amount as should be found to be due from defendant to the obligee, upon a settlement. Moffitt v. Maness, 102 N. C. 457, 9 S. E. 399.

So, a bill in equity, which, as originally filed, prayed for the reformation of a mortgage and the foreclosure thereof, may be amended by striking out the prayer for a foreclosure, and making the bill one for the reformation of the mortgage, and for the removal of a cloud on the title of the mortgagee. Hawkins v. Pearson, 96 Ala. 369, 11 So. 304.

And although a judgment cannot be set aside and a new trial granted merely on the ground of a mistake of counsel on a question of law, yet, after reversal of a judgment on appeal, if the mandate is sufficiently broad to permit it, the trial court may allow the pleadings to be amended so as to meet the objections to the former judgment, and to that end may allow a defense improperly pleaded to be perfected, or a new defense, by way of counterclaim or otherwise, to be pleaded, although the effect is to relieve the party from the effect of such a mistake. Wisconsin M. & F. Ins. Co. Bank v. Mann, 100 Wis. 596, 76 N. W. 777.

And where a father, in making a gratuitous disposition of some of his lands among his sons, made a mistake in the description of the land in a deed to one of them, and he took possession and improved the lands intended thereby to be conveyed, and gave a mortgage upon the same, and afterwards, on discovery of the mistake in the deed, after the father's death, procured the other heirs, except one, to convey the lands by proper description to his wife, for the purpose of defrauding the mortgagee, a bill to foreclose the mortgage, which joins as defendants the wife of the mortgagor and the heir whose interest was not conveyed to such wife, and seeks to litigate their rights to the lands as against the mortgage, setting out the facts, and praying for a correction of the mistake in the deed, and a foreclosure of the mortgage, is not demurrable on the ground of multifariousness in this regard, and the complainant is not required to wait until he has foreclosed the mortgage and become the purchaser before he can litigate such adverse claims to the land. Cummings v. Freer, 26 Mich. 128.

k. Proof.

1. Nature of.

Equity will grant relief on the ground of mistake, not only when the mistake is expressly proved, but also when it may be inferred from the nature of the transaction. Geib v. Reynolds, 35 Minn. 331, 28 N. W. 923.

When a mistake appears upon the face of a written instrument, a court of equity will correct it without evidence aliunde. Wagenblast v. Washburn, 12 Cal. 208; Michel v. Tinsley, 69 Mo. 442.

As, for instance, where the seal is omitted, where the deed purports to be under seal, and where there is no granting clause, although there are words of warranty. Michel v. Tinsley, supra.

And where the evidence in a case shows clearly, unequivocally, and decisively the existence of a mistake in an instrument, and there is no evidence to the contrary, a verdict against its correction is contrary to law and evidence, and without evidence to support it. Crockett v. Crockett, 73 Ga. 647.

And a mistake in a deed in the omission of land therefrom intended to be included may be established by evidence of the circumstances and nature of the transaction, and the conduct of the parties in relation thereto, provided the natural and reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom clearly and decidedly prove the alleged mistake. Layman v. Minneapolis Realty Co. 60 Minn. 136, 62 N. W. 113.

And the original contract or writing may be given in evidence, as well as subsequent acts done or procured by the party charged with the fraud, and which tend to prove fraud or mistake. Columbus & T. R. Co. v. Steinfeld, 42 Ohio St. 449.

And option contracts forming the basis of the transaction pursuant to which a deed was made are admissible in evidence in an action to reform the deed, alleged to contain, by mutual mistake, other lands besides those intended to be conveyed. Stahn v. Hall, 10 Utah, 400, 37 Pac. 585.

So, a witness may testify as to the intention of the parties in an action to reform a deed for mistake. Southern Finishing & Warehouse Co. v. Ozment, 132 N. C. 839, 44 S. E. 681.

And a deed for a tract of land described by metes and bounds, and of estimated quantity, for a given sum, imports a sale in gross, and a much larger deficit in quantity would be required to evidence mistake than where the sale was made by the acre. Rich v. Ferguson, 45 Tex. 396.

It has been held, however, that evidence outside the deed, and inconsistent with it, must be shown in order to set up a parol trust or to reform the deed. Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, 9 S. E. 445; Brock v. O'Dell, 44 S. C. 22, 21 S. E. 976.

And that where a mistake is alleged in a deed, it may be proved by other than the subscribing witnesses, they being dead. Brock v. O'Dell, supra.

So, courts of equity will grant relief more readily where the mistake is made to appear by reference to another writing. Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 159.

And while the most unequivocal testimony is required before courts of equity will grant relief against written contracts, antiquity of the transaction, as well as the fact that the donor himself was the draftsman of the instrument, increases the difficulty as to the sufficiency of the proof. Wyche v. Greene, 10 Ga. 57.

So, courts of equity are reluctant to rectify deeds on oral evidence unless there are circumstances which, in their opinion, justify a trial on affidavit evidence, such as where final instructions are proved, and it is clear that the deed as executed departed from them. Bonhote v. Henderson [1895] 1 Ch. 742, affirmed in [1895] 2 Ch. 202.

And where a deed executed and accepted as execution of a contract to convey differs from such contract as to the amount of land conveyed, the presumption is that the deed, being the last express agreement on the subject, expresses the final purpose of the parties, and that the change was made by mutual agreement; and the mere fact that the contract and the deed do not agree does not make out a case for the reformation of the deed; it must be proved that the discrepancy arose through fraud or mistake. Whitney v. Smith, 33 Minn. 124, 22 N. W. 181.

2. Burden of.

While courts of equity have jurisdiction to reform written instruments on the ground of mutual mistake, yet the presumption is that the writing speaks the final agreement of the parties, and the burden is on the complainant, seeking for the reformation of the instrument, to overcome this presumption. Donaldson v. Levine, 93 Va. 472, 25 S. E. 541; Moore v. Tate, 114 Ala. 582, 21 So. 820; Smith v. Allen, 102 Ala. 407, 14 So. 760; Campbell v. Hatchett, 55 Ala. 548; Hertzler v. Stevens, 119 Ala. 333, 24 So. 521; Hough v. Smith, 132 Ala. 204, 31 So. 500; George v. Howard, 56 Iowa, 646, 10 N. W. 212; Dulany v. Rogers, 50 Md. 524; Griffin v. Miller, 188 Mo. 327, 87 S. W. 455; Brown v. Brown, 79 Hun, 44, 29 N. Y. Supp. 652; Berringer v. Schaefer, 52 How. Pr. 69.

And the burden of proof to establish fraud or mistake which will warrant the reformation of a contract rests upon the person asserting it. Bigelow v. Wilson, 99 Iowa, 456, 68 N. W. 798; George v. Howard, supra.

Besides the ordinary burden of proof which rests upon every litigant who holds the affirmative of an issue, there is in cases for the reformation of written instruments the additional burden of overcoming the strong presumption created by the contract itself. Harrison v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. 862.

And one who seeks the reformation of a contract because of a mutual mistake has the burden to establish both the mutual agreement and the mistake, not merely by a preponderance of evidence, but by proof so clear and convincing as thoroughly to satisfy the mind of the court. Simpkins v. Taylor, 81 Hun, 467, 31 N. Y. Supp. 169; Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 526; St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. v. Merriman, 35 Minn. 42, 27 N. W. 199.

So, the burden rests with one seeking to rescind a contract, or to relieve himself from some contractual liability on account of the fraud of another, clearly to prove the fraud or the circumstances from which it should be assumed. Hoeldtke v. Horstman (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 642.

And where a grantor seeks to avoid a deed on the ground of mistake or fraud, and it appears he was the owner of the land for many years before the deed, the burden of proving his ignorance of the nature and extent of his title rests upon him. Taylor v. Cayce, 97 Mo. 242, 10 S. W. 332.

So, a person suing to reform a written instrument has the burden of showing that, when altered, it will correctly show the actual intention of both parties. Potter v. Frank (Me.) 76 Atl. 489.

And where a written instrument is sought to be reformed upon the ground that, by mistake, it does not correctly set forth the intention of the parties, or where the declaration of the mortgagor at the time he executed the mortgage, that the equity of redemption should pass to the mortgagee, is sought to be proved, or where it is insisted that the mortgagor, by a subsequent parol agreement, surrendered his rights, the burden of overcoming the strong presumption arising from the terms of a written instrument rests upon the moving party. Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027.

And a person filing a bill to correct and reform policies of insurance as to their dates has the burden to show by clear, exact, and convincing evidence that the policies do not truly state the real date of their issuance. Mitchell v. Capital City Ins. Co. 110 Ala. 583, 17 So. 678.

And the burden rests with an insurance company in an action against it upon a policy, to show that the policy did not in fact cover loss from tornado, and that the failure to erase the word "tornado" from the policy, or the insertion of that word, was a mistake which neither the insurer nor the insured intended. Arkansas Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Witham, 82 Ark. 226, 101 S. W. 722.

But the burden of proof does not rest upon the defendant in an attack by the maker upon a trust deed, to establish that the plaintiff, who made and seeks to cancel the deed, understood it at the time it was executed. Taylor v. Buttrick, 165 Mass. 547, 52 Am. St. Rep. 530, 43 N. E. 507.

3. Cogency of.

(a) General rules.

Equity has jurisdiction to reform written instruments where there is a mutual mistake, or mistake on one side and fraud or inequitable conduct on the other, if the evidence be sufficiently cogent thoroughly to satisfy the mind of the court. Nutter v. Brown, 51 W. Va. 598, 42 S. E. 661; Cross v. Bean, 81 Me. 525, 17 Atl. 710.

Or, as it is put by some of the cases, if the evidence of the mistake or fraud be "clear and convincing," or "clear and satisfactory." Berry v. Sowell, 72 Ala. 14; Whitehead v. Brown, 18 Ala. 682; Colorado Inv. Loan Co. v. Beuchat (Colo.) 111 Pac. 61; Sawyer v. Hovey, 3 Allen, 331, 81 Am. Dec. 659; Story v. Gammell, 68 Neb. 709, 94 N. W. 982; Mitchell v. Griffith (Neb.) 126 N. W. 998; Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385; Smith v. Allen, 1 N. J. Eq. 43, 21 Am. Dec. 33; Biggs v. Bailey, 40 W. Va. 188, 38 S. E. 499; Jarrell v. Jarrell, 27 W. Va. 743.

And evidence leaving no reasonable doubt that, through a mistake, an instrument does not embody the real intention of the parties to it, warrants equity in reforming the instrument. Fuchs v. Treat, 41 Wis. 404.

A mere preponderance of the evidence of mistake is not sufficient. Moore v. Tate, 114 Ala. 582, 21 So. 820; Hough v. Smith, 132 Ala. 204, 31 So. 500; Arkansas Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Witham, 82 Ark. 226, 101 S. W. 721; Wilson-Ward Co. v. Farmers' Union Gin Co. (Ark.) 126 S. W. 847; Tillar v. Wilson, 79 Ark. 256, 96 S. W. 381; Loukowski v. Pryor, 46 Colo. 584, 106 Pac. 7; Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 102 Mass. 45; Burns v. Caskey, 100 Mich. 94, 58 N. W. 642; Crookston Improv. Co. v. Marshall, 57 Minn. 333, 47 Am. St. Rep. 612, 59 N. W. 294; Fritz v. Fritz, 94 Minn. 264, 102 N. W. 705; Mikiska v. Mikiska, 90 Minn. 258, 95 N. W. 910; Layman v. Minneapolis Realty Co. 60 Minn. 136, 62 N. W. 113; Devereux v. Sun Fire Office, 51 Hun, 147, 4 N. Y. Supp. 655; Weed v. Whitehead, 1 App. Div. 192, 37 N. Y. Supp. 178; Bowers v. New York L. Ins. Co. 68 Fed. 785.

Nor is it sufficient that there may be some reason to presume a mistake. Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88.

And it has been held that the existence of the original contract, and of a mistake in reducing it to writing, must be shown "beyond a reasonable doubt," or "beyond a reasonable controversy," to warrant reformation. Smith v. Allen, 102 Ala. 407, 14 So. 760; Moore v. Tate, supra; Clopton v. Martin, 11 Ala. 187; Hand v. Cox (Ala.) 51 So. 519; Parker v. Carter, 91 Ark. 162, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

120 S. W. 836; Franklin v. Jones, 22 Fla. 526; Jackson v. Magbee, 21 Fla. 622; Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 159; Houser v. Austin, 2 Idaho, 204, 10 Pac. 37; Sutherland v. Sutherland, 69 Ill. 481; Douglas v. Grant, 12 Ill. App. 273; Linn v. Barkey, 7 Ind. 69; Wachendorf v. Lancaster, 61 Iowa, 509, 16 N. W. 533, 14 N. W. 316; Bodwell v. Heaton, 40 Kan. 36, 18 Pac. 901; Schaefer v. Mills, 69 Kan. 25, 76 Pac. 436; Andrews v. Andrews, 81 Me. 338, 17 Atl. 166; National F. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 16 Md. 260, 77 Am. Dec. 289; Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 102 Mass. 45, s. c. subsequent appeal, 107 Mass. 290; Mosby v. Wall, 23 Miss. 81, 55 Am. Dec. 71; Steinberg v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 49 Mo. App. 255; Henderson v. Stokes, 42 N. J. Eq. 586, 8 Atl. 718; Miaghan v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 12 Hun, 321; Devereux v. Sun Fire Office, supra; Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 526; Berringer v. Schaefer, 52 How. Pr. 69; Boyertown Nat. Bank v. Hartman, 147 Pa. 558, 30 Am. St. Rep. 759, 23 Atl. 824; Moser v. Libenguth, 2 Rawle, 428; Deseret Nat. Bank v. Dinwoodey, 17 Utah, 43, 53 Pac. 215; Bailey v. Woodbury, 50 Vt. 166; Fudge v. Payne, 86 Va. 303, 10 S. E. 7; Jarrell v. Jarrell, 27 W. Va. 743; Meiswinkel v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 75 Wis. 147, 6 L.R.A. 200, 43 N. W. 669; Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027; Pope v. Hoopes, 84 Fed. 927.

But that the proof of mistake must be beyond a reasonable doubt to warrant reformation has been contradicted, the rule being held to be that, to reform and correct a written instrument upon the ground of mistake, the evidence must be clear and convincing, but it is not necessary that the proof establish the mistake clear of all reasonable doubt. Wall v. Meilke, 89 Minn. 232, 94 N. W. 688, overruling on this point, Guernsey v. American Ins. Co. 17 Minn. 104, Gil. 83; Stille v. McDowell, 2 Kan. 374, 85 Am. Dec. 590; Southard v. Curley, 134 N. Y. 148, 16 L.R.A. 561, 30 Am. St. Rep. 642, 31 N. E. 330; Archer v. California Lumber Co. 24 Or. 341, 33 Pac. 526.

And the general trend of the decisions would seem to be to require considerably more cogency of evidence than the ordinary preponderance rule of civil cases, but it was not designed to go quite to the extent of requiring the strict "beyond a reasonable doubt" rule of the criminal law.

The courts of different jurisdictions have adopted different methods of expressing the test applied to the cogency of evidence of mistake necessary to the reformation of a written instrument. A group, in which Alabama takes the lead, fixes the requirement as, "clear, exact, and convincing," or, "satisfactory evidence." Moore v. Tate, supra; Mitchell v. Capital City Ins. Co. 110 Ala. 583, 17 So. 678; Burnell v. Morris, 106 Ala. 349, 18 So. 82; Ohlander v. Dexter, 97 Ala. 476, 12 So. 51; Guilmartin v. Urquhart, 82 Ala. 570, 1 So. 897; Alexander v. Caldwell, 55 Ala. 517; Hertzler v. Stevens, 119 Ala. 333, 24 So. 521; Hough v. Smith, supra; White v. Henderson-Boyd Lumber Co. (Ala.) 51 So. 764.

Another group of cases has adopted the test that the mistake must be proved by clear and satisfactory evidence, or by clear and convincing evidence. Burns v. Caskey, supra; Hinton v. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. 63 Ala. 488; Tyson v. Chestnut, 100 Ala. 571, 13 So. 763; Mitchell Mfg. Co. v. Kempner, 84 Ark. 349, 105 S. W. 880; Ezell v. Humphrey, 90 Ark. 24, 117 S. Hess*, 47 Ill. 170; Schwass v. Hershey, 125 Ill. 653, 18 N. E. 272; Rexroat v. Vaughn, 181 Ill. 167, 54 N. E. 917; Northfield Farmers' Twp. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sweet, 46 Ill. Monteith*, 61 Iowa, 541, 16 N. W. 591; Murphy v. First Nat. Bank, 95 Iowa, 325, 63 N. W. 702; Mahoning Coal Co. v. Dowling (Ky.) 124 S. W. 370; Fitzpatrick v. Rjugo, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 503, 5 S. That is, the evidence must be such that, if standing alone, uncontradicted, it would establish a clear prima facie case of fraud or mistake. Jarnatt v. Cooper, 59 Cal. 703.

And such as would have satisfied a chancellor or court of equity under the former practice. Kornegay v. Everett, supra; Wil- 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Williamson v. Carpenter, 205 Pa. 164, 54 Atl. 718; Breneiser v. Davis, 141 Pa. 85, 21 Atl. 508.

There must have been a plain mistake, clearly made out by satisfactory proof. Kent v. Manchester, 29 Barb. 595; Southard v. Curley, 134 N. Y. 148, 16 L.R.A. 561, 30 Am. St. Rep. 642, 31 N. E. 330.

The prayer for relief in such case must be supported by overwhelming evidence. Palmer v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 54 Conn. 488, 9 Atl. 248.

And another group has said that the evidence must be "clear and strong," or, "strong and conclusive." Dulany v. Rogers, 50 Md. 524; Beall v. Greenwade, 9 Md. 185; Ligon v. Rogers, 12 Ga. 281; Goodell v. Field, 15 Vt. 448; Preston v. Whitcomb, 17 Vt. 183; Barry v. Harris, 49 Vt. 392; Shattuck v. Gay, 45 Vt. 87; Weidebusch v. Hartenstein, 12 W. Va. 760.

And still another group holds that the proof of the mistake must be clear, unequivocal, and decisive. Davenport v. Hudspeth, 81 Ark. 166, 98 S. W. 699; Marquette Timber Co. v. Chas. T. Abeles Co. 81 Ark. 420, 99 S. W. 685; Wilson-Ward Co. v. Farmers' Union Gin Co. (Ark.) 126 S. W. 847; Turner v. Todd, 85 Ark. 62, 107 S. W. 181; Arkansas Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Witham, 82 Ark. 226, 101 S. W. 721; Tillar v. Wilson, 79 Ark. 256, 96 S. W. 381; Goerke v. Rodgers, 75 Ark. 72, 86 S. W. 837; McGuigan v. Gaines, 71 Ark. 614, 77 S. W. 52; Colorado Inv. Loan Co. v. Beuchat (Colo.) 111 Pac. 61; Wall v. Arrington, 13 Ga. 88; Allen v. Elder, 76 Ga. 674, 2 Am. St. Rep. 63; Iverson v. Wilburn, 65 Ga. 103; Habbe v. Viele, 148 Ind. 116, 45 N. E. 783, 47 N. E. 1; National F. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 16 Md. 260, 77 Am. Dec. 289; Philpot v. Elliott, 4 Md. Ch. 273; State ex rel. Frank v. Frank, 51 Mo. 98; Williamson v. Carpenter, supra; Cranston Print Works v. Dyer, 19 R. I. 208, 32 Atl. 922; Bowers v. New York L. Ins. Co. 68 Fed. 785.

And equity will not overturn a written instrument on the ground of mistake if the evidence tending to establish the mistake was of no greater weight than that tending to disprove the mistake. Goerke v. Rodgers, supra.

So, it is held that courts of chancery will exercise their jurisdiction to reform written contracts on the ground of mistake very sparingly, and only upon the clearest and most satisfactory proof as to the intention of the parties. Trout v. Goodman, 7 Ga. 383; Wall v. Arrington and Ligon v. Rogers, supra; Gray v. Woods, 4 Blackf. 432; Hileman v. Wright, 9 Ind. 126; Stover v. Poole, 67 Me. 217; Tesson v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 40 Mo. 33, 93 Am. Dec. 293; Lyman v. United Ins. Co. 17 Johns. 373; Talley v. Courtney, 1 Heisk. 715; Donaldson v. Levine, 93 Va. 472, 25 S. E. 541; Pulaski Iron Co. v. Palmer, 89 Va. 384, 16 S. E. 275; Carter v. McArtor, 28 Gratt. 356.

And to warrant a correction, evidence to show a mistake in a written instrument must be clear and strong, so as to establish the mistake to the entire satisfaction of the court. Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 596, 7 Am. Dec. 559; Ford v. Joyce, 78 N. Y. 618; McDonnell v. Milholland, 48 Md. 540; Seward v. Spurgeon, 9 Wash. 74, 37 Pac. 303; VanVleet v. Sledge, 45 Fed. 743; Ivinson v. Hutton, 98 U. S. 79, 25 L. ed. 66; Simmons Creek Coal Co. v. Doran, 142 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 1063, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 239.

The proof must be full, satisfactory, and conclusively convincing. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Ryland, 69 Md. 437, 1 L.R.A. 548, 16 Atl. 109; Beard v. Hubble, 9 Gill, 420; Prior v. Davis (Fla.) 50 So. 535; Franklin v. Jones, 22 Fla. 526; Northfield Farmers' Twp. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sweet, 46 Ill. App. 598; Pennell v. Wilson, 2 Robt. 505.

It must be clear, certain, and satisfactory. Bailey v. Bailey, 8 Humph. 230; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Wood, 50 Neb. 381, 69 N. W. 941.

The evidence must be clear, positive, and convincing. Turner v. Shaw, 96 Mo. 22, 9 Am. St. Rep. 319, 8 S. W. 897; Rowley v. Flannelly, 30 N. J. Eq. 612.

It must be clear, precise, and indubitable. Boyertown National Bank v. Hartman, 147 Pa. 558, 30 Am. St. Rep. 759, 23 Atl. 842; Breneiser v. Davis and Williamson v. Carpenter, supra.

It must be of such a character as would move a chancellor to reform a written instrument, and not merely of such a character as might induce a jury to reform it, and it must relate to the time when the instrument was executed. Williamson v. Carpenter, supra.

The mistake must be established by the weight of evidence, and must not be a mere inference. Mattingly v. Speak, 4 Bush, 316; Stockhoff v. Brannin, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 717.

And "must be clearly established" or "must be clearly proved" has been repeatedly applied to the questions of the intended contract and the mistake. Carnall v. Wilson, 14 Ark. 482; Parker v. Carter, 91 Ark. 162, 120 S. W. 836; Hathaway v. Brady, 23 Cal. 121; Stille v. McDowell, 2 Kan. 374, 85 Am. Dec. 590; Conaway v. Gore, 24 Kan. 389; Stockhoff v. Brannin, supra; Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 474; Burgin v. Giberson, 26 N. J. Eq. 72; Kent v. Manchester, 29 Barb. 595; Eborn v. Cannon, 43 Tex. 231; Bonneville v. Dum (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 1179; Probate Ct. v. May, 52 Vt. 182; Shirley v. Rice, 79 Va. 442; Griswold v. Hazard, 26 Fed. 135; New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 30 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 63, reversing 78 Fed. 33; United States v. Cushman, 2 Sumn. 426, Fed. Cas. No. 14,908.

The proper rule has been held to be that the party seeking to reform a written agreement must establish the fact that there was a mutual mistake not simply by a preponderance of the evidence, but by such evidence as will show conclusively that a mistake has been made, and satisfy the court or jury of such mistake beyond a reasonable doubt. Devereux v. Sun Fire Office, 51 Hun, 147, 4 N. Y. Supp. 655.

And the word "conclusive," as used with reference to the character of evidence neces- 23 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sary in cases in which it is sought to reform an instrument for fraud or mistake, means that measure or degree of proof which produces in the unprejudiced mind the belief and conviction of the truth of the facts asserted, having in view all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction. West v. West, 90 Iowa, 41, 57 N. W. 639.

A writing is itself regarded as evidence so strong that only other unequivocal evidence, irresistibly conclusive, is sufficient to reform it: Jarrell v. Jarrell, 27 W. Va. 743; Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406.

And the proof must be free from all reasonable doubt, almost, if not quite, incontrovertible, and clear and overwhelming. National F. Ins. Co. v. Crane, supra.

To warrant a reform, the same strength of evidence is required to establish a mistake in a written conveyance as to establish a trust. Modrell v. Riddle, 82 Mo. 31.

The proper proof of mistake which will warrant its reformation means something more than cogent inference or strong probability, generated by the evidence. Talley v. Courtney, 1 Heisk. 715.

To warrant reformation in equity, the evidence must show certainly in what the mistake consists. Spare v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 19 Fed. 14; Weed v. Whitehead, 1 App. Div. 192, 37 N. Y. Supp. 178.

And if proof as to a mistake in a written instrument is doubtful or unsatisfactory, the writing will be held to express correctly the intention of the parties. Deseret Nat. Bank v. Dinwoodey, 17 Utah, 43, 53 Pac. 215.

And where an agreement is twice reduced to writing in the same words, and a party to it seeks, contrary to both, to vary them, it can only be done on the strongest proof possible. Henkle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co. 1 Ves. Sr. 317.

So, a person who seeks to reform an instrument upon the ground of mistake must not only show clearly and beyond doubt that there has been a mistake, but he must also show with equal clearness and certainty the exact and precise form and import that the instrument ought to have been made to assume, in order that it might express and effectuate what was really intended by the parties. Keedy v. Nally, 63 Md. 311; Guilmartin v. Urquhart, 82 Ala. 570, 1 So. 897; Schwass v. Hershey, 125 Ill. 653, 18 N. E. 272; Fritz v. Fritz, 94 Minn. 264, 102 N. W. 705; Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, 34 Atl. 1099; Fowler v. Fowler, 4 DeG. & J. 250.

And where a person sold land, and there was a mistake in the conveyance as to the quantity of land intended to be conveyed, the grantor supposing he owned the tract as described, a reformation of the deed, relieving the grantor from his covenants with reference to the land not owned by him, will not be had unless he established the mistake by evidence of the most satisfactory character. McLucker v. Taggart, 29 Iowa, 478.

And to reform a warranty deed to conform to the intention of the parties that it was to be a mortgage, on the ground that there was a mistake, the evidence must be clear, satisfactory, specific, and convincing that there was such a mistake. Forester v. Van Auken, 12 N. D. 175, 96 N. W. 301.

So, in reforming written business contracts, courts of equity move with great caution, and proof of the mistake, and that it really gives an unjust advantage to one party over the other, must be of the most convincing character. Park Bros. v. Blodgett & C. Co. 64 Conn. 28, 29 Atl. 133.

Nor will the reformation of an insurance policy by changing the date of issuance be granted, where the evidence as to the exact day of issuance is founded on inference or presumption, and not upon actual knowledge. Mitchell v. Capital City Ins. Co. 110 Ala. 583, 17 So. 678.

So, to warrant the reformation of a bond against sureties to make it correspond with what the parties intended and supposed it to be, there must be clearness and certainty in showing the mistake, every presumption being in favor of the instrument as it is, and the evidence must be unequivocal, both that an error was committed, and as to its precise character. State ex rel. Frank v. Frank, 51 Mo. 98.

And officers of a corporation who executed its note and personally signed it cannot have the note reformed for mistake, so as to exempt them from liability, in accordance with the claimed understanding of the parties that they were not to be personally liable, where the evidence does not clearly show that the understanding was as claimed. Wilson-Ward Co. v. Farmers' Union Gin Co. (Ark.) 126 S. W. 847.

So, before a court of chancery will consent to correct a mistake in the terms of a deed, participated in by only one of the parties thereto, where no fraud or deception is practised, and where a party of ordinary intelligence, who can read, has deliberately executed said deed, the proof of mistake, where admitted at all, must be strong, clear, preponderating, and convincing to the mind of the court. Pennybacker v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 624, 11 S. E. 39.

Nor will equity reform a written contract where the proof in the action for reformation does not show the provisions of the contract sought to be reformed. Webb v. Hammond, 31 Ind. App. 613, 68 N. E. 916.

And it is error for a trial court, in an action to reform a contract by inserting an additional provision constituting a new consideration, to insert such provision, unless the testimony establishes that as the true agreement and contract between the parties. Jewett v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Mo. App. 58.

To warrant the reformation of a written instrument for mistake, however, it is not entirely accurate to require that the testimony should be positive; the better rule is that it should be clear, strong, and satisfactory, whether positive or presumptive. Greer v. Caldwell, 14 Ga. 207, 58 Am. Dec. 553.

And while, as a general rule, in order to induce a court of equity to rectify an instrument on the ground of mistake, it must be shown that the mistake was the concurrent mistake of all the parties, this rule applies to the ordinary cases of rectifying mistakes in an instrument where it is sought to alter the instrument in some prescribed or definite method, and for this reason it is necessary to prove not only that there has been a mistake, but also what was intended to be done, in order that the instrument may be set right according to what was intended; and the rule does not apply to a case in which the purpose of the rectification is to set aside the deed pro tanto as to the parties alleging the mistake; for such a case no proof would be necessary of any further agreement. Bentley v. Mackay, 4 De G. F. & J. 279.

So, where a court of error, acting upon a bill of exceptions, reviews the finding of the court below upon the fact of mistake, a doubt as to the degree of clearness will not authorize a reversal. Clayton v. Freet, 10 Ohio St. 544.

And where the fact of mutual mistake is clearly shown or conceded, the ordinary rule as to the preponderance of evidence controls in a suit for reformation of a contract, as to the consideration, the performance, and the prejudice. Conaway v. Gore, 24 Kan. 389.

And parol evidence of confessions or declarations of a party to a contract as to a mistake made thirteen years before, if uncorroborated by other facts and circumstances, is not sufficient to warrant a reformation of the contract. Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 596, 7 Am. Dec. 559.

So, when reformation is sought of a deed which, through fraud or mistake, conveys less land than was orally bought and paid for, the case does not stand as if there were no deed, and the error may be corrected without proof of such part performance as is necessary for a decree of specific performance, compelling a conveyance of the whole land when no part of it has been conveyed. Hitchins v. Pettingill, 58 N. H. 3.

And a written contract will not be reformed to correspond to the alleged intent of the parties at the instance of one of them, who acknowledges that it was read over to him before its execution, and that he was then satisfied with it, though there is other evidence of mutual mistake. Jurgensen v. Carlesen, 97 Iowa, 627, 66 N. W. 877.

So, evidence that a written contract was fraudulently misread to a party when he signed it, by a third person to whom it was intrusted merely for the purpose of delivery, is insufficient to warrant a reform of the contract. Sylvius v. Kosek, 117 Pa. 67, 2 Am. St. Rep. 645, 11 Atl. 392.

(b) Contradiction as to intention.

The right of recovery of a party to a contract on a question of reformation for mistake is not confined to cases in which there is no conflict of evidence upon the question of the intention of the parties. Devereux v. Sun Fire Office, 51 Hun, 147, 4 N. Y. Supp. 655; Mills v. Mills, 30 N. Y. S. R. 165, 8 N. Y. Supp. 811.

The fact that there is a conflict of evidence with reference to a mutual mistake in a contract is not necessarily a bar to relief in the way of reformation. Jenkins v. Lefaiver, 29 N. Y. S. R. 886, 9 N. Y. Supp. 19; Sullivan v. Moorhead, 99 Cal. 157, 33 Pac. 796; Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 73 Cal. 452, 2 Am. St. Rep. 823, 15 Pac. 82.

It is sufficient if upon all the evidence the mistake is established in a clear and convincing manner, to the entire satisfaction of the court. Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, supra.

And if the proofs of mistake of a scrivener in drawing a deed are entirely plain and satisfactory to the court, relief by way of reformation will be granted, though the mistake is denied and there is a conflict of testimony. Baldwin v. National Hedge & Wire Fence Co. 19 C. C. A. 575, 39 U. S. App. 162, 73 Fed. 574.

And it is sufficient to justify the reformation of a written contract for mistake, if the evidence is conflicting as to the mistake of one party, and tends to show that the other party knew or suspected that the first party was making a mistake. Wilson v. Moriarity, 88 Cal. 207, 26 Pac. 85.

And where a deed conveys a right, and then reserves and takes away the same right, and one of the parties interested claims it to be a mistake, and the other claims that the deed is as it was intended to be, it cannot be said, because of the contradiction, that the proof of the mistake is not clear, convincing, and conclusive so as to warrant a reformation of the deed, since the deed as it stood, conveying and taking away precisely the same right, would be entirely useless. Perry v. Knight, 85 Me. 184, 27 Atl. 96.

So, where the evidence in an action to reform a deed is sufficient to satisfy the court that the deed does not express the intention of the parties, the court is not bound to accept the statement of the defendant as to his intention, in contradiction of the written contract; and from his statement to the plaintiff that the deed was intended to be an execution of the agreement the court is authorized to find that the mistake was mutual, and that his failure to include in his deed all the lots sold, in accordance with the written agreement, without showing a release from his obligation, was either a mistake on his part or a fraud upon the plaintiffs. Sullivan v. Moorhead, supra.

And where the evidence which tends to prove fraud or mistake in an action for the reformation of a written instrument, if standing alone, uncontradicted, is sufficiently clear and convincing, the judgment cannot be reversed on the ground that such evidence is contradicted by other evidence, since the right to pass upon the credibility of witnesses is not vested in the court; the only question to be decided by the court in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) respect to the sufficiency of the evidence is whether that which tends to prove the alleged fraud or mistake, if standing alone, without contradiction, would make a prima facie case. Jarnatt v. Cooper, 59 Cal. 703.

The denial under oath by the defendant in a suit to reform an instrument on the ground of mistake, that there was any mistake, however, must be given considerable weight in determining the sufficiency of the evidence to establish mutual mistake. Lesser v. Demarest (N. J. Eq.) 72 Atl. 14; Fowler v. Fowler, 4 De G. & J. 250.

And where the answer to a bill alleging a contract to have been entered into by mistake denies the mistake, the strongest proof is necessary to destroy the effect of the denial. Watkins v. Stockett, 6 Harr. & J. 435; Goerke Co. v. Diskon (N. J. Eq.) 75 Atl. 780; Greene v. Smith, 13 App. Div. 459, 43 N. Y. Supp. 610; Meiswinkel v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 75 Wis. 147, 6 L.R.A. 200, 43 N. W. 669.

And where, in a suit to reform a written instrument, there is nothing but the recollection of witnesses, and the defendant, by his answer, denies the case set up by the plaintiff, the plaintiff is without a remedy. Mortimer v. Shortall, 2 Drury & War. 363; Ramsey v. Smith, 32 N. J. Eq. 28; McClain v. Smith, 158 Pa. 49, 27 Atl. 853; Sable v. Maloney, 48 Wis. 331, 4 N. W. 479.

Nor will equity interpose to amend a written instrument, such as a policy of insurance, without the clearest and most satisfactory proof of the mistake and of the real agreement between the parties,—especially where the mistake is denied in the answer. Lyman v. United Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 630.

So, where, in an action to correct a deed to make it conform to the alleged intentions of the parties, two of them are dead, and the evidence as to the mistake is contradictory, the reformation will be refused. Webb v. Nease, 66 Ark. 155, 49 S. W. 1081.

And in a suit for the reformation of a deed conveying real estate, so as to make the deed comply with a previous parol agreement, when the testimony is conflicting and is not full, clear, and convincing in favor of reformation, a decree denying reformation will not be reversed as contrary to the evidence. Prior v. Davis (Fla.) 50 So. 534.

So, where it is sought to reform a written instrument, and the testimony of part of the witnesses is explicit and satisfactory, and stands upon an equal footing with that of other witnesses, contradictory thereto, as to credibility, and conforms with the written agreement, the agreement will be upheld. Hoover v. Reilly, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 471, Fed. Cas. No. 6,677.

And where the evidence as to whether a written contract by mistake omitted a clause agreed upon by the parties is conflicting, and the witnesses seem to be equally reliable, and both sides are supported by circumstances attending the negotiations for the contract and the performance of work under it, the proof is not of that clear and conclusive character required to justify the court in reforming the contract. Little v.

Webster, 16 N. Y. S. R. 107, 1 N. Y. Supp. 315.

And where one party to an assignment of a mortgage testifies distinctly to facts indicating that no guaranty was in contemplation of the parties prior to the execution of the assignment, and the attorney for the other party, corroborated by his clerk, testifies that the former party positively agreed to guarantee the mortgage immediately before the assignment was drawn and executed, and that in his presence he dictated to his clerk the form in which the guaranty should be drawn, no case for a reform of the assignment by striking out the guaranty is made out. Moran v. McLarty, 75 N. Y. 25.

Nor is parol evidence to vary a written deed permitted to prevail against the positive answer of the defendant denying the charges of inserting provisions in the instrument different from those agreed upon, and of surprise on the complainant in the execution of the deed, where the complainant might have read the deed, and it was his own folly if he did not or if he signed when he did not understand it. Picton v. Graham, 2 Desauss. Eq. 592.

And when on a bill filed by a grantor to have a deed reformed by striking out the covenants of warranty, the complainant's evidence is that he employed an attorney to foreclose the mortgage under which the land was sold, and to prepare a deed to the purchaser, and upon its preparation, supposing it contained only a conveyance of his interest as mortgagee, he signed it without reading it over and without knowing it contained covenants of warranty, and the attorney testified that the covenants of warranty were inserted through his inadvertence, the proof is insufficient to authorize the reformation prayed for, where the grantee testifies that she purchased the land upon the express understanding with the grantor that he would make her a perfect title, and her testimony is corroborated by other evidence to the effect that the grantor admitted that he agreed to make the grantee a warranty title, and knew he had executed such a deed to her. Burnell v. Morris, 106 Ala. 349, 18 So. 82.

And equity will not reform a deed in which the easterly line of the lands therein conveyed is described as running "west about ten rods," so as to read "west two rods," where the oral testimony as to the northerly line was conflicting, and the only evidence as to the easterly line was the scrivener's testimony that, in copying the description from an earlier deed, he read the word "two" as "ten," where in the printed copy of this deed annexed to the report the word was printed "ten," and upon inspection of the deed it was impossible to determine whether the word was intended for "ten" or "two." Loud v. Barnes, 154 Mass. 344, 28 N. E. 271.

So, where, when a contract was made, only the seller and purchaser were present, and they are in immediate conflict as to what was the subject-matter of the sale and purchase, a deed conveying all the timber on certain land will not be reformed so as to show that only merchantable pine timber of certain dimensions was intended, the evidence not being clear and exact enough to authorize a reformation. White v. Henderson-Boyd Lumber Co. (Ala.) 51 So. 764.

And where a contract for the exchange of a farm for a stock of goods at invoice value provided for the invoice at wholesale cost as shown by cost marks on the goods, the owner of the farm is not entitled to have it reformed so as to require the invoice to be at wholesale cost without reference to the marked price, where there is a preponderance of evidence that the parties intended that the value of the goods should be determined by the cost marks. Simpson v. Kane, 98 Iowa, 271, 67 N. W. 247.

So, where a person executed a deed absolute on its face, for a money consideration stated therein to have been paid, and the grantee afterwards died, the deed will not be reformed and declared to have been intended as a mortgage, on application of the grantor, where the allegation that it was intended as a mortgage is denied by the answer. Watkins v. Stockett, supra.

And a bond conditioned that a named person shall on his part abide and perform the orders and decrees of the supreme court will not be reformed so as to be a mere bail bond for such person, where the evidence as to the intent of the parties as to the character of the bond is conflicting and the fraud is not clearly proved. Griswold v. Hazard, 26 Fed. 135.

And where a contract between an employer and employee gave the employee 5 per cent of the employer's profits as part of his salary, equity will not reform the contract so as to give him only its profits in operating its department store, on the ground that this was omitted from the contract by mistake, where the contract was drawn by the employer's president, and was accepted by the employee without hesitation or objection or advice of counsel, and is claimed by him to contain the agreement as made. Goerke Co. v. Diskon, supra.

So, where in a suit for reformation of a written contract the testimony is conflicting, the failure of the complainant to call as a witness a disinterested person who was present and took part in the original negotiations weighs against his claim. Pope v. Hoopes, 84 Fed. 927.

And though an averment of fraud, accident, or mistake in making a deed is properly pleaded in an action to reform the deed, when the answer is responsive it must stand until overcome by the testimony of two witnesses, or that of one witness and circumstances which are equivalent to the testimony of another. Hollenback's Appeal, 121 Pa. 322, 15 Atl. 616.

And the parol testimony of one of the parties to a written contract, if denied by the other, must be corroborated by another witness, or evidence equivalent to another witness, before a court of equity will attempt to reform it or set it aside, or before a judge sitting as a chancellor should submit it to a jury in a proceeding at law. North & West Branch R. Co. v. Swank, 105 Pa. 555.

So, in an action to reform a deed for mutual mistake the existence of which is denied by the defendant, it was the duty of the lower court to determine which contention was correct; and by giving judgment in favor of one of the parties the presumption is raised that the issue was implicitly found in his favor. Wilson v. Wilson, 23 Nev. 267, 45 Pac. 1009.

And the decision of the trial court upon a conflict of evidence as to a mistake is conclusive upon the appellate court. Sullivan v. Moorhead, 99 Cal. 157, 33 Pac. 796.

(c) Application of rules as to cogency in particular cases.

Evidence that a grantor wished to convey a life estate only, and that the word "assigns" was stricken out of his deed in two places where it occurred, but by accident was left in other places, is sufficient to establish that he intended to convey a life estate only, and to warrant a reformation of the deed. Newland v. First Baptist Church Soc. 137 Mich. 335, 100 N. W. 612.

And where a deed contained no words of inheritance, and it was obviously the intention of the parties, shown on its face, that a fee should pass, and it contained words of perpetuity, which in a devise would carry a fee, and trusts were declared which required that a fee should pass in order to secure their execution, the grantee is entitled to have the mistake corrected in his favor, unless there was something in the peculiar character in which the parties stood before the court to prevent such exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. Chamberlain v. Thompson, 10 Conn. 243, 26 Am. Dec. 390.

But where a deed conveying land to trustees and their successors forever was attacked for mistake, and a reformation sought, so that it might convey a fee-simple estate, proof by the draftsman that the grantor agreed that the land should be conveyed to the trustees and their successors forever, and that there was nothing in his instructions showing any intention that the land should ever return to the grantor, does not establish the alleged mistake. Showman v. Miller, 6 Md. 479.

And where a contract for a deed was entered into and thoroughly talked over and considered, and a lawyer was consulted and made a draft of the conditions, and they seemed to be intelligently understood, the mere fact that the deed was one which took immediate effect, contrary to the alleged understanding of the grantors, no fraud appearing, does not warrant a cancelation of the deed on the ground that it was executed through mistake. Stewart v. Dunn, 77 App. Div. 631, 79 N. Y. Supp. 123.

Nor will a deed conveying the right to flow so much of the grantor's land as would be flowed by raising the water of a stream by a dam to a given height be canceled upon a bill for that purpose, alleging that the deed was procured by false representations of the grantee as to the quantity of land that would be flowed by thus raising the water, where the evidence shows that the parties acted upon the assumption that the prospective flowage could be ascertained with certain accuracy by a personal inspection of the premises and vicinity, that neither of them pretended to possess any knowledge on the subject not thus obtainable, and that an agent of the grantor inspected the premises before the conveyance, for this very purpose, and there is no proof that the grantee at the time of such inspection did anything which was calculated to mislead such agent as to the real extent of the land which would be flowed. Sanford v. Nymman, 23 Mich. 326.

And where, owing to a mistake in the measurements of a lot, a portion forming a narrow gore 6 to 10 feet in width had not been conveyed in a deed, and this portion lay between the rest of the lot and a street, and it appeared that measurements corresponding with the measurements in the original plat were used in the deed, and that the defendant had failed for twenty-two years to assert any title to the omitted portion, and that his grantee had made large improvements upon a part of the tract and had regularly paid the taxes, and that the grantor had admitted that he supposed he had conveyed the whole lot, an intention to convey the whole is sufficiently established, and the court will reform the deed. Kellogg v. Chapman, 30 Fed. 882.

But a conveyance will not be rectified on the allegation that by mistake it passed more than was included in a previous agreement pursuant to which it was given, where the parties were dead, and the agent of the grantor acknowledged the extended agreement, and the agent of the grantee, who could have given a personal account of the transaction, was not examined in the case. Beaumont v. Bramley, Turn. & R. 41.

And the declaration of a magistrate who has since died, that a mistake in a deed was made by him, is inadmissible in evidence in a proceeding to correct the mistake, as hearsay. Westbrook v. Harbeson, 2 M'Cord, Eq. 112.

Nor is evidence in ejectment, of the undisclosed intentions and opinions of the parties to the plaintiff's deed, sufficient to show any mistake of a mutual nature, and it is therefore inadmissible to establish a defense of such mistake, in the absence of other evidence. Breneiser v. Davis, 141 Pa. 85, 21 Atl. 506.

And where a father conveyed adjoining lots to his two sons, not by an equal division, and the grantee of one of the sons, after the death of the father, alleged in an action of ejectment that the father made a mistake in the description of the respective deeds, and there was evidence that the father before the delivery of the deeds, by declarations to others, expressed an intention exactly reversing the description in the conveyances to the two sons, and that the sons after the conveyance occupied the property exactly as if the father had conveyed according to that expressed intention, but their occupation after the deeds was just the same as before,—the evidence is insufficient to warrant a reform of the instruments. Williamson v. Carpenter, 205 Pa. 164, 54 Atl. 718.

So, where a husband and wife purchased land, the wife paying more than half of the purchase money, and the conveyance was made, by mistake, to the husband alone, without her knowledge or consent, and they entered into possession, and she remained in possession after her husband's death, equity will reform the deed by inserting her name as one of the grantees, and decree her to be the sole owner of the property since the death of her husband, as against the heirs of her husband and a mortgagee with notice of her possession to whom one of the heirs had executed a mortgage. Mastin v. Mastin, 17 N. Y. S. R. 625, 1 N. Y. Supp. 746.

And a deed by a woman, made in contemplation of marriage, conveying property to a trustee, his executors and administrators, in trust for her sole and separate use for her life, and then in trust for such child or children as she may leave surviving, and if she dies without making any will, then the property to become the property of her husband, and the trustee to reconvey to the grantor or to her said husband or the survivor of them, contains upon its face sufficient evidence of a manifest purpose of the grantor to convey an estate in fee to the trustee in trust for the grantor for her life, and upon her death without issue to convey the property to the husband in fee, and a decree directing the reformation of the deed in those respects should be made, where the wife died intestate and without issue, but leaving the husband surviving. Moore v. Quince, 109 N. C. 85, 13 S. E. 872.

But statements made by a grantor to his wife a day or two before a deed was executed, as to what the agreement between the parties was, are not part of the res gestæ and admissible as such in an action to reform the deed. White v. Henderson-Boyd Lumber Co. (Ala.) 51 So. 764.

And where a wife's name is mentioned in the recital of a deed as a party thereto, but she is neither named nor referred to in the granting or operative clauses of the deed, in which the name of the husband alone appears, and the proof shows that the party drawing the deed was instructed to make it to the husband and wife jointly, but a mortgage of the same date recites that the husband is the sole owner of the land, the evidence is not sufficiently clear and certain to reform the deed on the ground that the name of the wife was omitted by mistake, and that it was intended to convey the land to the husband and wife jointly. Boyer-town Nat. Bank v. Hartman, 147 Pa. 558, 30 Am. St. Rep. 759, 23 Atl. 842.

So, where a grantor in a general warranty deed had no title to the coal under the land, which was not excepted from the deed, evidence clearly showing that the grantees knew the grantor did not own the coal, and did not intend to include it in the sale, and that they never could have supposed they were buying it, is sufficient to warrant the submission of the case to a jury to determine whether the omission to except the coal from the deed was a mutual mistake. Stafford v. Giles, 135 Pa. 411, 19 Atl. 1028.

And where an owner of coal land gave an option, reserving to himself 25 or 30 acres of coal in the tops of the hills, and the person receiving the option exercised it, and had his attorneys prepare a deed in which the reservation was described as the seam or bed of coal which may be in, upon, or under the above described premises, known as the Pittsburgh Seam, when it appeared that there was no coal known as the Pittsburgh Seam on the premises, and that the variance in the description in the deed from that in the option was the result either of deception by the grantee, or mutual mistake as to the name of the vein, and the evidence was uncontradicted that the coal reserved was an actual vein known to the grantee, and there was evidence that, at the time the deed was executed and delivered, representations were made to the owner by the grantee that the description in the deed covered the coal referred to in the option,—the grantor is entitled to have the deed reformed so as to read into it the description contained in the option. Mikesell v. Wehrle, 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 231.

So, where a bill is filed for the foreclosure of a mortgage, in which it is alleged that the mortgage had been canceled, and with the bond had been surrendered to the defendant by mistake, under a mistaken apprehension that the mortgage debt had been satisfied, when in truth it had not, the voluntary cancellation of the securities by the holder is a strong circumstance, which can only be overcome by clear evidence that the mortgage had never been paid. Banta v. Vreeland, 15 N. J. Eq. 103, 82 Am. Dec. 269.

And where trustees holding lands for themselves and their associates for mining purposes conveyed them (the associates also releasing) to one person to enable him to mortgage them, which he did; and reconvey the lands to his grantors, subject to the mortgage, and the mortgage, by the omission of the words of inheritance, conveyed only a life estate, instead of a fee; and one associate, who was not a nonresident, the others all being so, took possession and held the land subject to the mortgage as agent for the trustees; and some years after his death his administrator abandoned the land, which was let by the mortgagee's agent on a written lease; and, the tenant being in possession, the land was sold at judicial sale to pay the deceased associate's indebtedness, and bid in for a very small sum, and the purchaser took possession,—the mortgagee and his assignee both being dead, the latter's executors, upon clear evidence of the intention of the parties to the mortgage, the sum loaned being much more than a life estate in the land was worth, were entitled to have the mortgage reformed so as to convey a fee. Durant v. Crowell, 97 N. C. 367, 2 S. E. 541.

But a court of equity will not reform a mortgage for uncertainty or misdescription, when the evidence fails to identify the land intended to be mortgaged. Turner v. Hart, 1 Fed. 295.

And the law will not hold that a mortgage embraces lands which ought not to have been put in it, although in a condition to be mortgaged and deliberately included in it by the mortgagor himself, on the naked ground that the mortgagor swears he entertained a secret design to exclude such lands from the description. Shepard v. Shepard, 36 Mich. 173.

And where it is claimed that by mistake a mortgage described land, giving the beginning point at the northwest corner of a named league, whereas it should have been and was intended to be the northwest corner of the lower half of that league, evidence that, at the time the mortgage was given, sundry third persons were occupying the upper half of the league, claiming to be the owners of it, is not sufficient to establish the allegation of mistake. Eborn v. Cannon, 32 Tex. 231.

And where an insolvent debtor duly executed and delivered a mortgage of lands to a trustee to secure a bona fide indebtedness to his wife, but the name of the trustee was omitted in the granting clause, and also in the covenants of the mortgage, but in the clause of defeasance was a copy of a promissory note signed by the debtor and payable to the assignee for the use and benefit of the wife, and the mortgage was duly recorded, and afterwards other parties obtained judgment liens on the land, the mortgage, taking all its parts together, furnishes the means to supply the omission of the name of the grantee, and it is properly reformed so as to supply the omission. Hitesman v. Donnel, 40 Ohio St. 287.

And evidence of declarations by plaintiff in an action to correct a mutual mistake as to the amount of mortgage notes given for the purchase of land before the papers were drawn, as to the price agreed upon, is competent to corroborate his statement as to the same. Jones v. Warren, 134 N. C. 390, 46 S. E. 740.

But evidence in an action to reform a mortgage, that it was executed eleven years before the filing of the bill; and the draftsman who drew it did not testify that he was instructed to include the husband in the covenant to pay the mortgage, but concluded that that ought to have been done from the fact that the money, as he understood, was to be loaned to the husband; and the wife, to whom the mortgaged property belonged, testified that the money was loaned to her and she in turn loaned it to her husband, in evidence of which she exhibited a mortgage and bill executed by her husband to her,—is entirely insufficient to warrant the court in reforming the mortgage by inserting a personal covenant upon the part of the husband. Stiles v. Willis, 66 Md. 552, 8 Atl. 353.

And where there was an agreement and understanding as to property with reference to which notes and a mortgage had been given, that, should the husband die before his wife, she should become the sole owner of the property, and if she died first he should become the sole owner, and by mistake the papers did not include such understanding, the mere probability that in a transfer of stock as a part of the same transaction, and the issuing of a new certificate in the name of the wife, the agreement and intention were the same as in relation to the rest of the consideration, will not, in the absence of direct evidence to that effect, establish a mistake in such transfer, so as to justify a reformation of the stock certificate. Kropp v. Kropp, 97 Wis. 137, 72 N. W. 381.

So, where a note falls due, and is renewed, and an indorser indorses the renewal note in blank, expecting and understanding, without express agreement, that it is to be filled up the same as the original, and it is filled up differently, this is insufficient evidence to go to the jury to affect the written instrument, or to authorize its reformation on the ground of mistake. Ahlborn v. Wolff, 118 Pa. 242, 11 Atl. 799.

But where one man purchased a drug store of another, for which he paid by giving forty-eight notes secured by a chattel mortgage, and no provision for payment of interest was made therein, an interpretation of the contract, that it was one to pay interest, by the parties themselves, under which they acted for two years and more by the payment and receipt of interest, and by repeated promises of the purchaser to pay interest, in the end outweighs the inference from the written instrument, and warrants a reformation of the contract by inserting a provision for interest. Bayrhoft v. Rohde, 42 N. Y. S. R. 466, 16 N. Y. Supp. 851.

So, where insurance policies were agreed to be assigned as collateral security, and the papers drawn up were absolute assignments, and their execution was procured by the representation of the attorney and agent for the insurance company that an absolute assignment would have the effect of an assignment as collateral security only, and that to render it effectual as collateral security absolute terms were necessary, evidence to this effect presents a question of fact for the determination of the trial court, and is sufficient to support a conclusion for relief in favor of the assignor. Marsh v. McNair, 48 Hun, 117.

And where a fire insurance policy on property devised to a testator's children was made out in the name of his widow as executrix, and in an action by the widow and children to recover the amount of the policy it was averred in the petition that the insurance was intended and understood by the parties to the policy to be for the benefit of the owners of the property, and there was a prayer for judgment that, if necessary, the contract might be reformed, evidence of the conversation of the agent with the assured and the underwriter in relation to the object of the policy and the interest of the insured was admissible with a view to such reformation. Globe Ins. Co. v. Boyle, 21 Ohio St. 127.

But evidence of an insured person that he informed the company's agent of the intention of his firm to replenish the stock insured, and afterwards take out additional insurance so as to make the total amount of insurance on the property a named figure, does not establish a mutual mistake in the policy, such as would justify a court of equity in reforming it by inserting a provision permitting reinsurance to the named amount. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Wood, 50 Neb. 381, 69 N. W. 941.

And the right of persons to reimbursement from a railroad for advances which they made, though perhaps not too uncertain an interest to be insurable, and though insurance thereon might be valid, yet a court of equity would not, by reforming a contract of insurance, make it apply to such an interest, unless it appeared with almost absolute certainty that the parties intended it. Bishop v. Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. 49 Conn. 167.

So, an unconditional assignment of an entire patent will be held to have been intended only as a license for a single county, and reformation granted accordingly, where not only the parol evidence, but every incident and circumstance attending the sale, both before and after execution of the deed, showed that the parties negotiated for the sale of the county alone, and there is no evidence, outside of the deed, of any other agreement or understanding. Baldwin v. National Hedge & Wire-Fence Co. 19 C. C. A. 575, 39 U. S. App. 162, 73 Fed. 574.

And where an absolute bill of sale of a negro had been given, and a bill in equity was afterwards filed to have the same reformed on the ground of fraud or mistake, because the deed was intended as a security only for money loaned at a high rate of usury, and certain witnesses testified to declarations of the usurer, acknowledging that he had a lien only on the slave, and that if principal and interest were paid the debtor might keep him,—these circumstances, taken together, might afford a presumption that the deed was made absolute by fraud or mistake; and testimony to this effect should be submitted to the jury, that they may determine whether it had this effect. Greer v. Caldwell, 14 Ga. 207, 58 Am. Dec. 553.

And a contract by which one person agreed to run the boat of another from one named place to another, risk of navigation assumed, covers the risk of the boat being too large to pass through the locks; 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and where the hirer was prevented from performing his contract for this reason, and alleged that there was a verbal agreement between the parties, in pursuance of which the written contract was intended to be drawn, that the risk as to the practicability of the boat passing through the locks was to be, and was understood by them as, assumed by the owner, and asked to have the written contract reformed to correspond with the agreement, a mutual mistake is sufficiently shown; and the hirer is entitled to introduce evidence as to the original agreement. Pitcher v. Hennessey, 48 N. Y. 415.

So, inadequacy of price, while not of itself sufficient ground for reformation of a deed as between parties standing on an equality, is yet a material fact which, in connection with other facts, may amount to proof of fraud or mistake such as will warrant a reformation. Baldwin v. National Hedge & Wire-Fence Co. supra.

But evidence tending to show that a disputed clause was in an assignment when it was executed, that plaintiff read portions of the assignment, and had an opportunity to read it all, that it was dictated and written in his presence and with his consent, though he denied all knowledge of the existence of a guaranty clause in it prior to the commencement of an action brought to enforce it,—does not show a mutual mistake so clearly as to authorize a judgment directing a reformation of the assignment. Moran v. McLarty, 11 Hun, 68.

And where a lease was to some extent defaced by erasures and interlineations, and an attorney was directed to make a new one to take its place, and it was understood by both parties that the legal effect and form of the new lease were to be the same as the old; but the lease given gave the lessee no right to surrender the lease, which right was secured to him by the old lease; but no fraud was alleged, and it was not averred that the stipulation was omitted by mistake; and a witness testified that the two leases were compared, and the clauses providing for forfeiture were fully considered,—the proof of mutual mistake is not so clear and precise as to justify a decree reforming the lease. Liggett v. Shira, 159 Pa. 350, 28 Atl. 218.

Nor will a lease of rooms, with certain restrictions as to the business to be conducted therein by the lessee, be reformed for mistake or fraud, so as to permit the lessee to conduct his business therein, where he signed it with full knowledge of the restrictions, when he was doubtful whether it would permit his business to be conducted therein, upon the unauthorized assertion of the lessor's bookkeeper, that the lessor understood the purpose for which the lessee rented, and the statement of the agent who brought about the leasing, that there would be no trouble about it. Campau v. National Film Co. 159 Mich. 169, 123 N. W. 606.

VIII. Conclusion.

As a general rule, equity will reform written instruments to correct mistake. Equity has power to reform written instruments to make them conform to the true intention of the parties. And it may reform written instruments where there is a mutual mistake upon the part of the parties, or a mistake on one side and fraud or inequitable conduct on the other.

To warrant equitable interference for the reformation of contracts, there must have been originally a valid agreement sufficiently expressing in terms the real intention of the parties, and the written contract must have failed to express such true intention, and this failure must have been due to mutual mistake, or mistake on one side and fraud or inequitable conduct on the other. Equity will not rescind or reform a contract, however, where neither party has acquired a right or suffered a loss by the contract, or if the injury resulted from the negligence of the complaining party. And a court of equity cannot give a written instrument a more extended operation than the natural and legal import of the words in it authorize. And a third person cannot be substituted in the place of one of the parties who signed a contract. And one asking for the reformation of an instrument must stand upon some superior equity to that of the party against whom he asks it.

Courts of equity, in rescinding or reforming contracts, go upon the principle that where a mistake is manifest they will, in the exercise of their ordinary discretion, correct it and hold a party according to his original intention. They consider that as done which is agreed to be done and which ought to be done. A written instrument is the evidence of the contract between the parties to it; and if through mistake it fails to present their agreement, the contract it expresses is not their contract, and the true contract remains unexecuted, and equity will reform the writing, causing it to express the true intent of the parties.

There are two classes of mistakes of law in contracts: First, a mistake in law as to the legal effect of the contract actually made; and, second, a mistake in law in reducing to writing the contract, whereby it does not carry out or effectuate the intention of the parties. In the former case the contract actually entered into will seldom, if ever, be relieved against, unless there are other equitable legal features calling for the interposition of the court; but in the second class the mistake is not in the contract, but terms are used or omitted which give the instrument a legal effect not intended by the parties, and different from the contract made, and here equity usually grants relief, unless barred by some other ground. With reference to the first class of cases, the rule has been asserted that equity will not relieve from an act done under mistake of law, unmixed with matters of fact, unless there is some additional ground for equitable relief. Other equitable elements must concur, such as surprise, undue influence, bad faith, fraud, imposition, and the like. But in applying the maxim that ignorance of law does not excuse, the courts have, in cases of particular hardship, distinguished between ignorance of the existence of the law, and of its legal effect, giving relief in cases of ignorance of the effect. This rule applies particularly to mistake or ignorance as to legal consequences of an act or contract, such a mistake being a mistake of law pure and simple, for which no relief can be granted, as are also questions of the construction of a contract or of the definition of words in it. And it has been applied to mistakes in deeds, mortgages, leases, bonds, and common contracts, and other miscellaneous instruments. This rule has been adopted from the common law, and has been followed by many late cases, but it has been to some extent superseded by the rule that equity will correct mistakes without reference to whether they are mistakes of law or mistakes of fact, where they result in a failure to effectuate the intention of the parties.

In any event the doctrine that mistake or ignorance of law is no excuse for breach or nonperformance of an agreement is confined to cases of pure unmixed mistake of law, in which there is no mistake of fact, and no element of trust or fraud entering into the contract. And the rule is strongly supported that a mistake of law may, in a proper case, be corrected in equity, as well as a mistake of fact. And the rule is growing in favor, and has become the prevailing one, that the main object of equity jurisdiction should be to effectuate the intention of the parties to the contract in question, and that any mistake of such parties, which would defeat such intention, should be corrected in equity so as to carry it into effect, whether it be a mistake of law or a mistake of fact, and without reference to the principle that mistake or ignorance of law does not excuse. This rule has been applied to mistakes in deeds, which prevent the deed from expressing the intent of the parties, including omissions, insertions wrongfully made, mistakes in reservations, and in assumption of mortgages or other encumbrances, and as to the interest conveyed, and as to the quantity and description. But to reform a contract in equity under this rule, it must be shown that the true intention of the parties was different from the contract as reduced to writing, and that by some fraud or mistake the real contract between the parties was not truly reduced to writing. This principle has also been applied to mortgages and deeds of trust, and bills of sale, and to leases, and contracts with reference to lands, and bonds, and negotiable instruments, and insurance policies. And insurance policies may be reformed for mistake after, as well as before, loss, if the assured has not been guilty of laches. But the power of courts of equity to correct mistakes in policies of insurance is exercised with great caution, and only when the proof is entirely satisfactory. The omission of the seal from an instrument is a mistake apparent upon the face of the instrument, which a court of equity will correct.

The rule that equity will not interfere to cancel a contract made through mistake of law applies to a mistake as to the general law, and not to a case where a party is mistaken as to the effect of existing circumstances in relation to his private rights, interests, or relations. Such mistakes are in reality mistakes of fact, and equity will consider them. Nor does the maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse for the breach or nonperformance of any agreement apply to special or private acts of the legislature, which are designed only to operate upon particular persons, or to regulate private concerns. A party must know enough about his title, however, not, by his want of knowledge of it, to mislead a purchaser to his detriment; and where a deed purports to convey all interest and title of the grantor it will be given effect accordingly, although he actually held a greater interest than either he or the grantee, at the time of the conveyance, supposed he owned. The qualification of the rule above noted also applies to mistakes as to legal rights as affecting compromises and settlements. And if parties to a contract recognized the fact that something was uncertain as to the amount or condition of the subject-matter of their dealing, and the contract relating thereto is in the form intended, there is no ground for correcting a mistake, if it should finally turn out that one has intervened. This also applies to compromises of doubtful rights, and to voluntary settlements between parties, when characterized by good faith. And they will not be disturbed for any ordinary mistake, either of law or fact, in the absence of inequitable conduct, their very object being to settle all possible errors without judicial controversy. Nor can a contract or payment made for the purpose of avoiding litigation be rescinded for error in law. Compromises of doubtful claims will not be set aside, except for fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment of facts, or for such imposition as amounts to unfair and unconscientious dealing. Concealment of facts which one is not bound to disclose is not sufficient. And the court will not inquire into the adequacy or inadequacy of the consideration of a compromise fairly and deliberately made. Equity will in a proper case, however, relieve against an agreement of compromise, made under a mistake of law by the party seeking relief. And if the parties are not on equal terms, and one misleads the other, and obtains property thereby against right and equity, as well as against law, he will be compelled to restore it. Parol evidence is admissible to make out a case for the reformation of a settlement, but the jurisdiction in such cases is cautiously exercised.

The rule seems to be practically universal, that mistake or ignorance of law entering into a contract furnishes ground for interference by equity whenever the mistake is mutual. And a mistake is mutual, within this rule, when it is common to all the parties to the contract or instrument. But cases of this class also take the position that a mistake of law, to be a ground of interference by equity, must have been mutual, or must have been induced by fraud or circumvention. A mistake of one party, not induced by the act of the other, affords no ground for equitable intervention, though a mistake on one side may be ground for rescinding an agreement, but not for reforming it. And the reformation must consist of making the agreement what the parties intended it. The rule that mutual mistake or fraud is essential to reformation, however, is not necessarily applicable where the mistake occurs merely in the reduction of the agreement to writing. And it does not apply to the case of a contract executed between parties in the relation of vendor and purchaser, whom it is in the power of the court to replace in their original positions.

So, equity will reform a written instrument which, through the mistake of one party, accompanied and induced by fraud or other inequitable conduct of the other party, does not express the true intention. And misrepresentation, whether wilful or accidental, if prejudicial, is ground for reforming a contract. And if one party to a contract is ignorant with reference to a matter of law involved, and another party, knowing of such ignorance, takes advantage of it to make a contract advantageous to himself, a ground for reformation exists. False assertions of value, when no warranty is intended, however, do not constitute a ground of relief to a purchaser, if the assertion is a mere matter of opinion in which the parties may differ. Nor is a mere misrepresentation as to the legal effect of a contract, or the rights of the parties under it, a ground for canceling it as fraudulently obtained. And a representation as to what the law will or will not permit to be done is ordinarily to be regarded rather as the expression of an opinion than the assertion of a fact. And, ordinarily, mistake upon the part of the purchaser relative to the qualities of property, caused by communications of the seller, do not call for interposition of equity. And the mere fact that the person is of weak understanding, however produced, if there be no fraud or surprise, is not an adequate ground for relief against his contracts. Nor will a misrepresentation avoid a contract, if it be one of such a nature that the person to whom it was made had no right to rely on it, since the court will not aid one who refuses to exercise his own discretion. And to be a ground for reformation, the misrepresentation must be of some material fact which the party might have placed confidence in, and not a mere opinion. Misrepresentation and fraud in corruptly deceiving one as to matter of law amount to fraud in a legal sense, and furnish ground for interference of equity. And fraudulent representations as to the legal effect of an instrument will avoid it, though made to one who has actually read it, if he is unable to judge of its true construction. And knowingly availing one's self of a fiduciary relation to mislead the other party to a contract, by a misrepresentation of its legal effect, or knowingly taking advantage of the other's actual ignorance of the law, amounts to a fraud which is correctible in equity. Nor can one by falsehood deceive an illiterate man, and impose upon him a writing for one thing, when it is another, and receive the benefit of his fraud. And a person intrusted to reduce a contract to writing is bound to do it truly; and any variation from the original contract is a fraud which equity will correct. Undue concealment which amounts to fraud for which equitable relief will be given, where there is no peculiar relation of confidence and trust between the parties, is the nondisclosure of those facts and circumstances which one party is under some legal or equitable obligation to communicate to the other, and which the latter has not merely a conscientious right, but a legal one, to know. The gist of the inquiry, however, is not whether the misstatement was known to be false by the person making it, but whether the person to whom it was made was deceived thereby. And the person deceived must be prompt in repudiating his contract on discovering the fraud. Where one party to a contract seeks to avail himself of an opportunity afforded by a mistake of the other party, and attempts to enforce an inequitable advantage without consideration, and the other party is not blamable, equitable relief can be afforded to the party so mistaken, if the other party is not thereby injured; and the mistake need not be mutual. Ignorance or mistake of law, admixed with misrepresentation, imposition, undue influence, mental imbecility, or surprise, gives rise to a mixed question of law and fact of which equity will take cognizance. And equity will relieve when the legal effect of a transaction is misunderstood, the want of proper understanding being produced by misleading statements of the other party to the contract. This rule applies to leading a person to the belief that an instrument will have a different effect from its real effect, as well as to actual misrepresentations of fact. To justify the reformation of a contract on the ground of inequitable conduct of a party, however, it must appear that some relation of trust or confidence between the parties had been abused, or that there was fraud, or fraud and mistake, or that the means of knowing the facts were not equally open to both parties. And to constitute a ground of rescission, a misstatement must have been believed and acted upon by the party to whom it was addressed.

A court of equity has no jurisdiction to enforce a contract void at law, or to modify it so as to make it legal, and then enforce it. The rule is different, however, where the defect is one which merely renders the instrument inoperative, and not wholly void; and in such case reformation may be had. And while a mistake as to the existence or identity of the subject-matter of a contract is fatal to the contract itself, a mistake as to the value or quantity of property sold, or other collateral attributes, as distinct from a mistake as to the existence or identity thereof, warrants correction of the contract, if the thing delivered is existent and the identical thing in kind. That a contract would be invalid if not in writing is not a reason to deny reformation. So the rule is well supported that equity will not relieve against defects or mistakes in a voluntary conveyance or contract, of one made without consideration, and that it will not aid one volunteer against another. But though the transfer is without consideration, if a legal conveyance be effectually made, the court will protect all equitable interests and enforce all equitable rights and duties under it, as completely as if made with consideration. And the rule that a deed will not be reformed at the instance of a mere volunteer does not apply on a bill to reform a voluntary deed, in a dispute between parties claiming under it, the grantor being indifferent. But a pre-existing debt is sufficient to prevent a mortgage from being voluntary. And a deed founded on a consideration to be paid a third party is not voluntary. So the rule has been acted on to some extent, that a court of equity has jurisdiction, in a proper case, to reform or rectify a voluntary settlement, as well as a settlement for value. Under this rule a deed of gift, drawn by a mistake for a different interest from that intended, may be corrected. And a mistake upon the part of a donor, in giving more than was intended, justifies a decree of reformation. Equity will not reform a gift, however, against the intention of the donor. Nor will a court of equity lend its aid, at the instance of a donee, to reform a voluntary deed. And an error in the description of land in a voluntary conveyance will not be corrected, unless all the parties consent. And equity will not correct a mistake in a voluntary deed, to the injury of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Courts of equity, in some instances, have asserted jurisdiction as to mistakes in wills, to the same extent as in other matters. And under the rule thus asserted, equity will correct a mistake in the name of a legatee, or in the description of the land devised. But the rule has also been asserted, that to authorize a correction of a mistake in the description of land devised by will, the mistake must have been clearly demonstrable from the structure and scope of the will itself. And the prevailing rule would seem to be that a will cannot be corrected because the testator misapprehended its effect, and that equity will not entertain a bill to reform a will, and that, in the absence of latent ambiguity in wills, extrinsic evidence cannot be received to show intentions not expressed in them.

With reference to contracts for the sale of a homestead, the absence of a release of the right of homestead, acknowledged as required by law, renders the transfer of the homestead of no validity, and a court of equity has no power to reform the contract by the insertion therein of such release and acknowledgment; it cannot give life to an instrument having no validity in itself. It has been held, however, that equity will correct a mutual mistake in the description in a written instrument by which a man and wife have sought to encumber their homestead. And the right of a purchaser who has paid full value, to reform a conveyance from a husband and wife of a homestead, which conveyance was executed with proper formalities to pass her interest, is not affected by the fact that the wife was ignorant of her interest. And under this rule a homestead mortgage executed by a husband and wife in conformity with the statute providing therefor may be reformed in equity for mistake in describing the land, if the quantity of land conveyed is not thereby increased. Under the old rule creating an arbitrary disability to protect married women from the alienation of their real estate through acts of coercion of their husbands, contracts of married women, not made in the form prescribed by law, were absolutely void; and when there was an omission of some statutory requirement in the deed, the mistake could not be corrected in equity; and this was so, though the woman's husband assented to the original deed. And a defect in a deed of a husband and wife could not be rectified as against the wife. But under statutes doing away with the wife's disability to contract, a deed or contract of a married woman may be reformed in equity the same as that of an unmarried woman, or of anyone else.

It is a general rule, both at law and in equity, that parol evidence is not admissible to vary a written instrument. This rule was applied by the English courts to prevent the use of parol evidence in equity in the correction of mistakes in written contracts, and many of the American courts followed the lead of the English courts, and some of the prominent states still cling to the rule. Even under this rule, parol evidence may be received where there is anything in the writing to go by. And a written instrument may be corrected upon parol evidence, where such evidence is corroborated by the documents and subsequent transactions in the case. The rule that excludes parol evidence when offered to vary or control written contracts, however, is held by the weight of authority not to apply to cases where the written contract was obtained by fraud, mistake, or imposition, and the object of the evidence is to correct it. And under this theory, parol evidence is admissible in equity for relief from mistake in a written contract or other instrument, to show the mistake and what the real contract was, as well as to show fraud. Cases of this class take the view that the statute of frauds does not interfere with the power of courts of equity to reform written instruments in which the parties intended to comply with the statute, but were prevented by fraud, accident, or mistake. But under this rule, parol evidence will not be admitted to prove a contract entirely different from that expressed in the writing, except for fraud, mutual mistake, etc. And parol evidence will not be admitted to show that an instrument of a particular class was designed for use for an entirely inconsistent purpose. Some of the late and well-considered cases have asserted the theory that if the proposed reformation of a written instrument involves the specific enforcement of an oral agreement within the statute of frauds, or the terms sought to be added will so modify the instrument as to make it operate to convey an interest or secure a right which can only be conveyed or secured through an instrument in writing, and for which no writing has ever existed, the statute of frauds is a sufficient bar, unless the defendant is estopped to plead it. Under this theory, courts of equity can take from a contract on parol evidence, but cannot add to it. But even under this rule it has been held that courts of equity have power and jurisdiction to so reform an executory contract which is valid and binding on its face as to relieve it from anything inserted therein through deception, fraud, or mutual mistake, and to make its statements speak the truth as it was intended to insert it in the instrument. And the great majority of cases seem to adopt the theory that when, because of mistake or fraud, the intention of the parties has not been carried out, until there is a reformation there either is no contract to be contradicted or modified, or, if there is one, its scope and limits are unascertained, and parol evidence is admissible and necessary, not to contradict or modify the contract, but to show what it really was. Within this rule, to insist upon the legal effect of a written agreement in which a material mistake had been made would be such a fraud as to admit parol testimony to reform the deed by correcting the mistake. So, parol evidence may be used with reference to an alleged mistake in a written instrument, when it is not introduced to contradict the writing or control its legal effect, but in a matter collateral to the writing, the contract remaining untouched and in full force, the evidence being received in such case to show the application of the instrument and existing rights under it. But neither at equity nor at common law, in the absence of proof of fraud or mistake, can a contract be controlled by evidence that it was executed on the faith of a contemporaneous or preceding oral stipulation not embraced in it. And parol evidence will not be received to engraft upon or incorporate with a valid written contract an incident occurring contemporaneously with it, and inconsistent with its terms.

Freedom from negligence is a condition precedent to relief from mistake of law in a written instrument. And relief in equity will be denied where the trouble is the result of the complainant's want of proper diligence. A party asking equitable relief must show that he has used due diligence and good faith to avoid both the making and the consequences of the mistake. And the mistake must have been as to a fact of such a nature that the party could not by reasonable diligence get knowledge of it when put upon inquiry. He must have exercised at least the degree of diligence which may be fairly expected from a reasonable person. One who signs a written instrument in ignorance of its contents is presumptively guilty of gross negligence, and the burden of proof rests with him to rebut the presumption. The rule that negligence of a person in signing a contract estops him from afterwards asserting that the writing does not truly express the agreement of the parties, however, does not apply where the contract was obtained by fraud or entered into by mutual mistake. And the mere fact that a party to a contract was negligent in not examining it for omissions will not prevent relief in equity. Whether or not there will be correction must depend upon the circumstances of each case. Nor is the negligence or laches of a person seeking relief from a mistake in a contract caused by him a defense in an action for reformation or other relief, where such negligence or laches caused the other party no injury. But negligence, where the means of knowledge were easily accessible, is fatal to a reformation of a contract. If the fact with reference to which a person claims to have been mistaken is one of which he might have obtained knowledge by reasonable diligence, equity will suppose that he must have had knowledge. But the bare fact that a man did not read over a contract when he executed it, or know its contents, will not relieve him from it. A contract may be reformed for mutual mistake, though a party neglected to read it. And if a party to a contract is under a moral or a legal duty to make disclosures to the other, and fails to do so, the misconception by the other of the facts which should have been disclosed is not such negligence as will bar the injured party from equitable relief from the mistake. And a person injured by a mistake in a written instrument should take steps promptly to get relief in equity, and cannot complain if he is guilty of laches and suffers therefrom. And relief should be denied when there is unreasonable delay in bringing suit. But that suit was not immediately commenced on discovery of the mistake does not bar the right to have it reformed; the complainant is justified in exhausting persuasion before resorting to litigation. And a person seeking relief is not chargeable with negligence, if he moves within a reasonable time. And the statute of limitations begins to run against an action for reformation of a mistake in a written instrument, not from the date of the instrument, but from the time of the discovery of the mistake. Courts of equity are liberal in allowing mistakes to be corrected when they are clearly established, notwithstanding the acquiescence of the party, providing no injury has resulted in the meantime to the person against whom the relief is sought, or those claiming under him, or them. But if fraud and mistake are admitted as exceptions to the running of the statute of limitations, they will only prevent the running of the statute until the fraud and mistake are discovered, or by the use of reasonable diligence might have been discovered, by the party applying for relief. So, the general rule is that relief in the way of reformation of a written contract should not be granted where the party seeking it has acquiesced in the agreement after becoming aware of the mistake. And a mutual mistake in a deed, in conveying land in excess of that bargained for, cannot be corrected at the suit of the vendor, where, after the discovery of the mistake, he received payment of the purchase money for the land conveyed, and yielded possession thereof to the vendee. Nor can a contract be rescinded for a mistake as to its terms, where the party seeking to rescind completed the contract, and afterwards brought action to reform it. And a promissory note cannot be reformed after judgment taken upon it, though the defendant in a suit at law is not estopped from seeking equitable relief because a judgment was taken in a court of law, and he did not invoke the power of equity thereto until after the judgment, where he had a purely equitable defense which could not be made available in a court of law. And the mere commencement of an action for damages for breach of a written contract, which action was afterwards dismissed without a determination on the merits, does not bar a subsequent action for reformation of the contract, for a mistake in it.

One of the provinces of equity is to cause to be done that which should be done; and if a written contract misstates the real agreement as made and understood by both parties, in some essential particular, the contract is a mistaken one, and the mistake may be corrected in equity. And where a contract is reformed by equity, the rights of the parties under it are measured by the reformed contract. Equity also interferes to prevent the fraudulent use of a written instrument for a purpose not contemplated at the time it was made. But equity will not contravene the express provisions or policies of the law, in order to reform a contract for mistake. And a conveyance will not be reformed, in the absence of fraud without proof that previous to its execution there was a mutual agreement for sale and purchase different from that described in the deed, and that the misdescription was inserted by mistake. Nor will important conditions which the parties never fully assented to be inserted in a lease by a court of equity, where there is not sufficient evidence thereof. And if a grantee in a deed by mistake in it holds a greater estate than belongs to him, and conveys it to an innocent purchaser, receiving the consideration, he may be treated as a trustee for the real owner. Nor will equity interfere to aid one creditor against another on the ground of mistake. But the right of a creditor to have a specific lien which is about to fail from mistake of a draftsman set up in equity is superior to that of the general creditors of an insolvent intestate, who have no lien. Power to reform or rescind contracts is vested exclusively in courts of equity, and cannot be exercised by courts of law. Courts of law may construe contracts, but cannot reform or rescind them. But a Federal court has jurisdiction of a suit in equity to reform a contract, where the action is brought in a state court by a foreign assignee of the contract against a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, and thence removed to the Federal court, although the parties to the contract are both citizens of the same state. And a court of law may, in giving effect to the intention of the parties to a written contract as gathered from the entire instrument, disregard a mistake apparent on the face of the writing, when, notwithstanding the mistake, the intent remains clear from other parts of the contract. A contract can only be reformed to express something which the parties agreed on and meant to put in, but left out, or by striking out or changing something they did not mean to express. But if, after making an agreement, in process of reducing it to writing the instrument, by means of a mistake of law, fails to express the contract which the parties actually entered into, equity will interfere, either by way of defense to the enforcement of the contract, or by cancellation or reformation thereof. And on the question of relief from a mistake in the instrument, which fails to carry out the intention of the parties to it, it is immaterial whether the proceeding is by bill to correct the mistake, or whether the mistake is set up in the answer by way of defense. So, injunction may be employed to prevent the execution of provisions of a written instrument resulting from mistake. And injunction will lie where the mistake occurred upon the part of one party only, though the contract could not be reformed unless the mistake was mutual. So a court of equity, having jurisdiction to amend a contract, acquires the right, incidentally in the same suit, to give relief in damages or by such other mode as justice may require. Such an action for rescission and enforcement contains but one cause of action. And where a decree directs the correction of an instrument, it is not necessary that the formal correction be made before final decree. It is also proper to set up, as a defense in a suit for specific performance of a contract, that the contract relied on does not correctly and truly express the agreement of the parties, but that there is some material omission, insertion, or variation through mistake. And where mistake is set up as a defense against a claim for the specific execution of an agreement, parol evidence is admissible to establish such defense, though the rule has been asserted that courts of equity will not ordinarily compel the specific performance of a contract with variations, additions, or new terms to be introduced into it by parol evidence. Nor will equity make a decree in a suit for specific performance, which will compel the defendant to convey, while leaving the complainant free to reject the deed tendered in compliance with the decree. And it cannot at once reform a contract, and then cancel it on the ground that a party has not done what the reformed contract required of him. But equity will not refuse to decree specific performance of an agreement on the ground that a contracting party had mistaken its legal effect. And equity will not compel specific performance where the contract would not be reformed when through mutual mistake it was defectively reduced to writing. If the mistake in a written instrument is mutual, the remedy is by bill in equity for reformation. But where the mistake is unilateral, the whole contract must be set aside, and no relief can be granted in such case after the position of the parties has been so changed that their original rights cannot be restored. Equity will not usually rescind a contract for mistake, unless the party can be put in statu quo. And if a person seeks to correct a written instrument in his own favor, a court of equity will refuse its aid, unless he is willing that other mistakes therein should be corrected, which would be against his interests. Where it will subserve the purposes of justice, equity will restore a mortgage released through mistake, and give it its original priority as a lien. But this cannot be done as against a bona fide holder for value. Courts of equity will relieve against mistake, and correct and reform all kinds of deeds and written instruments, including both executed contracts, such as deeds, mortgages, leases, etc., and executory contracts, such as bonds, insurance policies, notes, bills of exchange, etc. And executed contracts may, in a proper case, be corrected either by enlarging or by restricting the subject-matter. But a court of equity will not reform a deed made by a person individually, so as to convert it into a deed as trustee for persons who never received any of the purchase money or were never otherwise involved by the individual deed of the trustee. And a court of equity will not enforce a building contract. Nor, as a general rule, are judicial sales subject to correction by reforming the deeds. But mistakes are corrected in equity, even when they occur in the records of proceedings of courts and exist in the records of sales, not by reviewing the judgments or proceedings of the courts, but by restricting the parties from taking advantage of the mistake. The equity of a vendee for the correction of a deed, however, is not displaced by a lien of a subsequent judgment or execution, thereunder. Anyone having an equitable title to property, with an apparent legal title, with reference to which a mistake was made, may assert the mistake either by way of defense, or by way of a direct proceeding in equity for reformation. And relief will be granted as between the original parties or privies in law, in fact, or estate, including personal representatives, heirs, devisees, legatees, assignees, voluntary grantees, and judgment creditors or purchasers for value with notice of the facts. An action may be maintained against a remote grantor, where he conveyed with covenants sufficient to support the action, which were the same as those contained in the plaintiff's deed. So, an instrument executed by a surety may be reformed in equity for fraud or mutual mistake, in the same manner as if it were executed by the principal debtor; though a joint bond cannot be shown, as against the surety, to be a joint and several bond, by evidence outside the contract, unless it leaves no doubt of the mistake. A contract which fails to express a material term of the real contract which the parties mutually intended to make, however, will not be reformed in equity, as against innocent third persons who had acquired vested rights and who cannot be placed in statu quo. Nor will courts of equity reform and enlarge a mortgage executed by an insolvent person, if the rights of creditors would be injured thereby. Nor does a decree reforming a deed or contract affect the rights of persons not parties to the suit. Within the meaning of these rules, a mere creditor, or even a creditor having a general lien, such as a judgment, is not an innocent purchaser against whom reformation of a contract or other written instrument may not be had. And a court of equity would be less disposed to interfere for the reformation of an instrument for a mistake of law, in favor of a particular creditor against the general creditors of an insolvent estate, than in an ordinary case.

A mistake in a contract or instrument, to warrant relief in equity, must be material, and there will be no rescission where the contract as written is of the same legal effect as it is corrected. But a person purchasing land subject to a mortgage is not estopped by the insertion, by mistake of the scrivener, of a stipulation that the grantee agrees to pay the mortgage debt, since the mortgagee is not prejudiced thereby. Nor will a written instrument be reformed for mistake of law, where it appears that the person complaining has an adequate remedy at law. But the mere existence of the remedy at law is not sufficient, if it was not as full, adequate, and complete as the one contemplated by the parties. Where the only relief sought for is reformation or rescission of the instrument for mistake, demand for reformation or rescission must be made before bringing action therefor. But where other distinct grounds of equitable relief are asserted, demand for rescission or reformation need not be made. A mistake alleged as a ground for reformation of a contract must be stated in the pleadings with precision, and made apparent. And where fraud is relied upon, it must be averred. And it is essential that the fraud, mistake, or surprise should be alleged in the bill as the ground and object of parol proof. And the agreement, both as it is and as it ought to be, should be set forth. But a complaint need not set out the exact language omitted from or inserted in the agreement. And the failure to allege in terms that the instrument in question was erroneously executed through mutual mistake does not render the pleading insufficient, if it sets up facts from which such conclusion is inevitable. Nor need a consideration for the execution of the contract in question be alleged. Where a party to a contract defends against it on the ground of mistake, he should allege the facts entitling him to reformation by way of counterclaim or cross bill, and should pray judgment for reformation. Defenses that a deed expresses the contract, and, if it does not, there was such a mutual mistake as would authorize its rescission, are not inconsistent, and both may be relied on.

Mistake which will warrant the correction of a written instrument may be established by direct proof, or it may be inferred from the nature of the transaction. When the mistake appears upon the face of the instrument, the court may correct it without outside evidence. And a witness may testify as to the intention of the parties, in an action to reform an instrument for mistake, though it has been held that evidence outside the deed and inconsistent with it must be shown in order to set up a parol trust or to reform the deed, and that a mistake must be proved by other than the subscribing witnesses. Equity will grant relief more readily where the mistake is made to appear by reference to another writing. And the courts are reluctant to rectify deeds on oral evidence, but will do so when the proof is clear and convincing. An executed written instrument is presumed to express the final agreement of the parties, and the burden is on the person seeking reformation of such an instrument to overcome the presumption by establishing fraud or mistake. And it has been held that to overcome this presumption the evidence of mistake or fraud must be clear and convincing; clear and satisfactory; clear, exact, and convincing. And it has been held that it must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, but this has been denied, the rule being held to be that the evidence must be clear and convincing, but it need not establish mistake clear of all reasonable doubt. A conflict of evidence on the question of the existence of the mistake does not bar relief in the way of reformation, but a denial that there was a mistake, made under oath, must be given considerable weight in determining the sufficiency of the evidence to establish mistake.

If he uses his own name, it must be so used as not to deprive others of their rights, or to deceive the public; and the name must be accompanied with such indications that the thing manufactured is the work of the one making it as will unmistakably inform the public of the fact. International Silver Co. v. Rogers, supra.

In Kaufman v. Kaufman, 123 N. Y. Supp. 699, it is said that the principle is well established that a man must use his own name honestly, and not as a means of pirating upon the good will and reputation of a business rival; and that if he cannot use his own name without inevitably representing his goods as those of another, then he cannot use his own name at all.

And in J. F. Rowley Co. v. Rowley, 154 Fed. 744, reversed on other grounds in 88 C. C. A. 258, 161 Fed. 94, it is said: "If a fraudulent purpose to filch trade good will exists, the fact that it is attempted under semblance of the use of a man's own name 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Harper County, sustaining a demurrer to the petition in an action brought to restrain the alleged unlawful use of plaintiff's trademark, and to recover damages for such use. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. P. Hackney, J. T. Lafferty, and Edward T. Hackney, for appellant:

makes the use none the less wrong. As an abstract right, every person has a right to the use of his own name; but when the use of such name is but a cloak to cover an intended fraud upon the rights of another, the wrongdoer has himself, and not the law, to blame for placing a limitation upon the right to the use thereof."

The following cases instance the extent to which the courts have gone in restraining the use by a person of his own name, as being likely to deceive the public:

Thus, in Gordon Hollow Blast Grate Co. v. Gordon, 142 Mich. 488, 105 N. W. 1118, an injunction was issued against the use of the defendant's name as the manufacturer of grates in competition with the corporation in which his individual name occurred, but his firm was permitted to state that they manufactured a grate under letters patent granted to him, in connection with another statement, made equally prominent, that the firm is distinct from, and has no connection with, the complainant company; in International Silver Co. v. Rogers, supra, against the manufacture and sale of goods stamped with the words, "W. H. Rogers of Plainfield, N. J.," unless also stamped with the words, "not the original Rogers," or "not connected with the original Rogers," and this although the boxes, packages, and wrappers in which such silverware was put up were marked, "not connected with any other Rogers;" in World's Dispensary Medical Asso. v. Pierce, supra, restraining the defendant from putting up, advertising, or offering for sale any proprietary remedies under the name of Pierce's, or Dr. Pierce's, where it appeared that the name had, by reason of its use by plaintiff, come to be generally recognized by the public as referring to and designating plaintiff's business and its remedies,—especially since the defendant was not entitled to the use of the title "Dr.;" in Kaufman v. Kaufman, supra, restraining a dealer in hats from using the name "Kaufman" unless in connection with his first name on a line with it and in letters of equal size, in competition with another of the same name, who had, for some years past, used his surname as a

A. 495, 146 Fed. 37, against using the name, "Hall's Safe Company," or any other name having similarity to the name, "Hall's Safe & Lock Company," in competition with the purchaser of the business and good will of the Hall's Safe & Lock Company, without also giving information to the public that it is not the business formerly carried on by the Hall's Safe & Lock Company; in Bates Mfg. Co. v. Bates Numbering Mach. Co. 172 Fed. 892, affirmed in 178 Fed. 681, against any further use of the words, "Bates Numbering Machine Company," as defendant's corporate name, in competition with the Bates Manufacturing Company, whose machine had for several years been extensively and exclusively advertised as the "Bates Numbering Machine," and as such known to the purchasing public; and in Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page Liquid Glue, Oil, & Fertilizer Co. 14 B. C. 317, restraining defendants from carrying on business as manufacturers or vendors of any preparation of glue or other adhesive under any name or title of which the name Le Page or "Le Page's" forms part, where it appeared that the glue designated as Le Page's is generally understood to be that manufactured by plaintiff.

So also, in Andrew Jurgens Co. v. Woodbury, 197 N. Y. 66, 90 N. E. 344, modifying and affirming 128 App. Div. 924, 112 N. Y. Supp. 1121, an injunction against the manufacture and sale of soap known as "Woodbury's New Skin Soap," in competition with the purchasers of the formula of "Woodbury's Facial Soap," was approved, although held to go too far in forbidding the defendants from using the name Woodbury on other soaps, or in connection with other articles where such use is not deceptive or misleading.

that the S. A. Foutz Stock Food Company, organized by Stanley A. Foutz, to manufacture and sell certain animal remedies under formulas prepared by him, should not be permitted to continue its business in competition with the owner of the business which had been carried on under the name of S. A. Foutz & Brother, the animal remedies manufactured by whom had become extensively known as the Foutz remedies, without amending its corporate name so as to read, "The Stanley A. Foutz Stock Food Company," and stating in its advertising and on its packages that the formulas used are those prepared by Stanley A. Foutz, and the goods are not the remedies prepared by the successors to S. A. Foutz & Brother.

And in Dickson v. Dickson [1909] 1 Ir. Ch. 185 (as digested in Butterworth's Yearly Digest for 1909), where it appeared that the plaintiffs had for many years traded in Dublin and elsewhere as seedsmen, nurserymen, and florists, under the name of Alex. Dickson & Sons, and had established a considerable trade and reputation; that the defendant, Alexander Dickson, had for many years carried on business as a nurseryman and seedsman in the city of Dublin, at first under his own name, but for the past twelve years under the name of the Ashbourne Agricultural Company, with a shop in Dublin and a nursery in Dundrum; that in 1905 he changed the name of the business at Dundrum to "Alex. Dickson & Sons," advertising under that name; that he had one son, but no partnership in fact existed, and the business at Dundrum was identical with the business in Dublin,—it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from the use of the name Alex. Dickson & Sons.

On the other hand, the extent to which a person is legitimately entitled to use his own name in competing with one having the right to use the name in a similar business is illustrated by the following decisions:

In Von Faber-Castell v. Faber, 71 C. C. A. 383, 139 Fed. 257, reversing 124 Fed. 603, it was held that Eberhard Faber might use the name "E. Faber" in the sale of lead pencils in competition with the house of

In Donnell v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. 208 U. S. 267, 52 L. ed. 481, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 288, reversing 74 C. C. A. 361, 143 Fed. 231, it was held that the successor to the business and good will of a safe and lock company, with the right to use the surname of the founder, which has a commercial value, while entitled to protection against the use, in the sale of safes made by the sons of such founder, who were members of the original corporation, of any name, mark, or advertisement indicating that the seller is the successor of the original company, or that its goods are the product of that company, or its successors, and against any interference with the good will, cannot have an injunction totally restraining the use of such surname, and thus interfere with the right of the founder's sons to continue in the safe business, and use their own name in so doing.

So also in Hall's Safe Co. v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. supra, it was held upon the same state of facts as that involved in the preceding case, that the sons had the right to use their own family name in the business of manufacturing and selling safes, and to adopt all proper means of making it known to the public that the safes they offered are made by them; and, if they choose to organize a corporation for that purpose, that they have the right to use their family name in its title so long as they make no endeavor to lead the public into the belief that the safes they make are the product of the original company's successors in business.

In J. F. Rowley Co. v. Rowley, 154 Fed. 744, an injunction was issued against the use of the name "Rowley" in connection with the manufacture and sale of artificial limbs, where the Rowley name had become firmly associated in the public mind with the complainant's product; but upon appeal, in 88 C. C. A. 258, 161 Fed. 94, it was held that the decree was too broad in restraining the defendant from using his own name "in any manner whatsoever," and that its use might be allowed, provided that an explanation should be attached which would avoid deception. The case was accordingly remanded for the purpose of describing the precise terms of the explanation which, in view of all the circumstances, should be attached to defendant's use of the name; and in 96 C. C. A. 371, 171 Fed. 415, it was held that a decree of the court below, restraining the defendant from the use, in the manufacture or sale of artificial limbs, of the name "Rowley" without initials, and from its use with initials, unless in each and every instance in which the name should be so used it should be accompanied by explanatory words sufficient clearly to distinguish the goods manufactured from the goods of the complainant, was in conformity to both the letter and the spirit of the instructions given by the appellate court in remanding the case.

In Fine Cotton Spinners' & D. Asso. v. Harwood Cash & Co. [1907] 2 Ch. 184, it was held that while John Harwood Cash might lawfully compete under his own name with the successor to the business carried on under the style of "John Cash & Sons," and might also have taken partners and carried on business as "Harwood Cash & Company," yet, that without ever setting up any business for himself, he could not confer upon a joint stock company formed by himself in conjunction with a number of other persons the right to use the name of Cash in a competing business, the court saying: "I think, also, that such a company merely by registration does not acquire and incorporate the individual rights which its promoters may respectively have had to carry on business in their own names; and, further, I think that a person of the name of 'A,' without transferring a business and good will, cannot, by merely authorizing the promoters of a company to Co. 141 Fed. 213.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition in this case alleged that prior to January 1, 1905, J. E. Kramer and S. P. Kramer had owned and operated the Ætna Mills at Wellington under the name of Kramer Brothers, and manufactured there several high grades of flour which were extensively advertised, and the brands thereof had become generally known over this country and Europe, and the reputation thereof was such that a ready sale was obtainable therefor; that in establishing this reputation the name "Kramer" or "Kramer Brothers," coupled with the grades to which they were attached, became a distinguishing mark, whereby any flour having such names met with a ready sale; that, on the date named, Kramer Brothers sold their business to the plaintiff by bill of sale, describing the property, with this addition: "Also our flour brands, trade signs, mottoes, and the full and entire good will of our business;" that "Kramer's High Patent" is one of the trademarks and brands so bought by the plaintiff, and a copy of that brand, as used on flour sacks, is shown by exhibit B, attached to the petition (other brands are referred to and shown in other use his name as part of their title, confer upon such company a right to do so as against other people who would be damaged thereby."

The case of Cash v. Cash, 84 L. T. N. S. 349, 745, which is set forth in the earlier note above referred to, and there characterized as an extreme case, was modified on appeal in 86 L. T. N. S. 211, in which it was held that the injunction granted by the court below went too far in restraining the defendant from carrying on business under his own name, and it was accordingly modified so as to restrain the defendant from carrying on a competing business, either in the name of Cash, or under any style in which the name Cash appears, without taking reasonable precautions clearly to distinguish the business carried on, and the goods manufactured or sold by the plaintiff, and from carrying on any such business under any name or in any manner so as to mislead or deceive the public into the belief that such business is the same as was formerly carried on by plaintiff's vendor and predecessor.

Other cases illustrating the extent to which a person is legitimately entitled to use his own name in competing with one having the right to use the name in a similar business, are: Sheffield-King Mill. Co. v. Sheffield Mill. & Elevator Co. 105 Minn. 315, 127 Am. St. Rep. 574, 117 N. W. 447; and White v. Trowbridge, 216 Pa. 11, 64 Atl. 862; which are sufficiently set forth in the opinion above reported.

In the earlier note above referred to the statement is made that the rule as to the right of a person to engage in business under his own name, notwithstanding the fact that another of the same name has already established a similar business, does not apply to the right of a corporation to use the name of a stockholder or director as a tradename, since the name of a corporation is an artificial thing, selected arbitrarily by the incorporators themselves. While this limitation upon the right of a person to use his own name has been recognized by a number of courts (Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879; International Silver Co. v. William H. Rogers Corp. 67 N. J. Eq. 646, 110 Am. St. Rep. 506, 60 Atl. 187, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 804; J. & P. Coats v. John Coates Thread Co. 135 Fed. 177; International Silver Co. v. Rodgers Bros. Cutlery Co. 136 Fed. 1019; Fine Cotton Spinners' & D. Asso. v. Harwood Cash & Co. supra; Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page Liquid Glue, Oil & Fertilizer Co. 14 B. C. 317), a more reasonable rule has been laid down by the Supreme Court in Howe Scale Co. v. Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict, 198 U. S. 118, 49 L. ed. 972, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, that, in the absence of contract, fraud, or estoppel, any man may use his own name in all legitimate ways, and as the whole, or a part, of a corporate name, the court saying: "If every man has the right to use his name reasonably and honestly in every way, we cannot perceive any practical distinction between the use of the name in a firm and its use in a corporation. It is dishonesty in the use that is condemned, whether in a partnership or corporate name, and not the use itself."

In accordance with the rule laid down by the Supreme Court, it is held in Bates Mfg. Co. v. Bates Mach. Co. 141 Fed. 213, that the fact that a person assisted in forming a corporation, in the name of which his own name was used, did not, in the absence of proof that he transferred to such corporation the exclusive right to use his name in its business, preclude the use of his name as part of that of another corporation organized by him to engage in a competing business.

And see, also, as recognizing the same rule, Donnell v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. 208 U. S. 267, 52 L. ed. 481, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 288; Hall's Safe Co. v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1182, 76 C. C. A. 495, 146 U. S. 37; David E. Foutz Co. v. S. A. Foutz Stock Food Co. 163 Fed. 408.

exhibits); that the plaintiff, after such purchase, and after it had registered such brands and trademarks, continued to manufacture and sell these brands of flour, and the commodities so designated have acquired a great reputation, are well known to the public and to buyers by such names and trademarks, and the business is a source of great profit to the plaintiff; and that in June, 1905, J. E. Kramer and S. P. Kramer—the former “Kramer Brothers”—organized the defendant company, purchased mills at Anthony, and proceeded to manufacture flour. The following allegation is then made: “The plaintiff further avers that the defendant, well knowing the plaintiff’s right in and to all said brands and trademarks so purchased and owned by it, as aforesaid, since the month of July, 1905, in disregard of the plaintiff’s rights, makes and offers for sale and sells, and still makes and sells, a similar article, an imitation of plaintiff’s said articles of flour and meal, well knowing that the same is an imitation of the plaintiff’s said flour and meal, and well knowing of the rights of the plaintiff to the trademarks and brands as aforesaid, which it puts up, similar to that of the plaintiff, and has labeled with plaintiff’s said trademark and brand and with labels similar to that of plaintiff, using the word ‘Kramer,’ which marks and brands so used by the defendant to deceive the public, as aforesaid, are attached to the original petition on file herein, marked ‘exhibits K and L,’ and the same are here referred to and made a part of this amended petition; that said imitation was calculated to deceive and does deceive buyers of said article and the public, and has induced many persons to purchase defendant’s article in the belief that it was made by the plaintiff, thereby greatly diminishing plaintiff’s profits.” Allegations of damages and averments appropriate for an injunction follow, with a prayer for relief accordingly. A demurrer was sustained to the petition, and the plaintiff appeals.

The following is the inscription upon one of the brands so sold, as shown by exhibit B:

Kramer Bros.
Wellington, Kans.

24 Kramer’s Flour
lbs. HIGH PATENT
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Exhibits K and L are inscriptions upon packages of flour made by the defendant company, and which it is alleged are used in violation of the plaintiff’s rights. Upon one side of the sack is the mark or brand designated as “exhibit K,” as follows:

KRAMER’S
C H A N C E L L O R
HIGHEST PATENT

KRAMER MILLING COMPANY
ANTHONY, KANSAS

49 CHANCELLOR FLOUR
lbs. HIGHEST PATENT

The word “Chancellor” is in large display letters in white upon a blue band printed diagonally across a red shield. This symbol and the word “Kramer’s,” in large letters, are the most prominent features of the brand. On the reverse side of the sack is the inscription or brand marked “Exhibit L” as follows:

THIS IS THE GENUINE
“KRAMER’S” FLOUR
Every sack guaranteed

The words in the first and second line are the most conspicuous feature in this inscription.

The petition states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, unless from the exhibits, which show precisely the marks and brands complained of, it appears that their use by the defendant is not a breach of any duty or obligation on its part. The exact question, then, is whether the exhibits K and L are brands that the defendants cannot lawfully use after having made the sale to the plaintiff of the mill, good will of the business, flour brands, and trade signs.

It will be noticed that, apart from the word “Kramer’s” and “Highest Patent,” there is little in Exhibit K that resembles the “Kramer’s High Patent” label or trade mark. The word “Chancellor” in display letters upon a red shield is entirely dissimilar from anything appearing upon the brand sold to the plaintiff. On the other side of the sack, however, is the inscription marked “exhibit L,” — “This is the genuine ‘Kra-mer's' Flour,"—in conspicuous letters, the words "Kramer's Flour" being displayed, in red in a manner that would at once attract notice. The prominent word "Kramer's" is made more significant and challenges greater attention by being placed in quotation marks. Why was this done if the word was innocently used as pertaining to the defendant's corporate name only? These matters, in connection with the inscription "Kramer's Highest Patent" on the other side of the sack, might well indicate to a purchaser desiring to buy that the sack contained the well-known product of the Ætna Mills, sold under the brand of "Kramer's High Patent," shown in exhibit B.

The discussion in the briefs has taken a wide range, covering cases of "piracy," so called, in the wrongful use of trademarks, and of unfair competition in the wrongful use of labels, wrappers, packages, etc., which although analogous, still differ from technical trademarks. The principles that govern these different subjects are similar, however, and for the purposes of this discussion need not be precisely distinguished. The plaintiff clearly had the right to purchase the labels in question, and acquired by such purchase, in connection with the establishment and its good will, the legal rights of the Kramers to use them before the sale, and must be protected to the same extent that they might have been. Mr. Justice Field said, in Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 620, 25 L. ed. 769, 770, that "when the trademark is affixed to articles manufactured at a particular establishment, and acquires a special reputation in connection with the place of manufacture, and that establishment is transferred, either by contract or operation of law, to others, the right to the use of the trademark may be lawfully transferred with it."

In Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 540, 35 L. ed. 247, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, it was said: "There are a few cases indicating that the mere right to use a name is not assignable (notably Chadwick v. Covell, 151 Mass. 190, 6 L.R.A. 839, 21 Am. St. Rep. 442, 23 N. E. 1068); but none that it may not be assigned to an outgoing partner or to a successor in business, as an incident to its good will."

In Ball v. Broadway Bazaar, 194 N. Y. 429, 435, 87 N. E. 674, 676, the rights incident to trademarks and analogous rights in tradenames were discussed. The court said: "Although we agree with the learned appellate division in recognizing the technical distinction between trademarks and tradenames, we think the same fundamental principles of law and equity are applicable to both. 'All such cases, whether of trademark or tradename, or other unfair use of another's reputation, are concerned with an injurious attack upon the good will of a rival business; customers are diverted from one trader to another, and orders intended for one find their way to the other.' Sebastian, Trade-Marks, p. 17. Trademarks and tradenames are in reality analogous to the good will of the business to which they appertain. The trademark represents it in the market, and the tradename proclaims it to those who pass the shop. In either case, such unfair conduct as is calculated to deceive the public into believing that the business of the wrongdoer is the business of him whose name, sign, or mark is simulated or appropriated, constitutes the gist of the offense."

A manufacturer who, to designate his goods has adopted a name or device, not subject to appropriation as a trademark, may still be protected in its use from unfair competition if the circumstances warrant it. Wolf Bros. & Co. v. Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. 91 C. C. A. 363, 165 Fed. 413.

In J. G. Mattingly Co. v. Mattingly, 96 Ky. 430, 438, 27 S. W. 985, 987, it was held that the brand, "J. G. Mattingly & Sons, Standard Bourbon, Est. 1845, Louisville, Ky.," and another brand with the words, "Pure Rye," instead of "Standard Bourbon," might be lawfully sold and transferred with the establishment, and their use thereafter by one of the vendors of the same surname was restrained. The court said: "That their intention was by some device, if not by actual use of the tradename of J. G. Mattingly & Sons, to induce belief that the whisky they contracted for had been made at the distillery in question and according to the formula long used there, and thus defraud and injure plaintiff, is shown by a letter B. D. Mattingly, April 21, 1890, wrote to Jones, Munday, & Company, in which he proposed a secret contract for manufacture on joint account of whisky having the Mattingly brand on it. In that letter is this significant language: 'We can use all the Mattingly thunder we want, save the exact brands.'"

In a leading case on this subject, the court of appeals of New York held that the right of a person to use his own name in business, notwithstanding the prior use of the name by others, does not extend to a corporation of which he is a promoter and member. The court said: "Whether the court will interfere in a particular case must depend upon circumstances,—the identity or similarity of the names, the identity of the business of the respective corporations, how far the name is a true description of the kind and quality of the articles manufactured or the business carried on, the extent of the confusion which may be created or apprehended, and other circumstances which might justly influence the judgment of the judge in granting or withholding the remedy." Chas. S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co. 144 N. Y. 462, 27 L.R.A. 42, 43 Am. St. Rep. 769, 39 N. E. 490.

One may not, in the use even of his own name in connection with a manufactured article, to promote its sale, resort to any artifice to mislead the public, and thereby induce a belief that the article is the one manufactured by another, which has become known to the trade by the particular mark or brand. Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co. 163 U. S. 169, 41 L. ed. 118, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1002.

In Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page, 147 Mass. 206, 208, 9 Am. St. Rep. 685, 17 N. E. 304, the imitation by one manufacturer of the trademark of another by the use of the same surname as a prefix was considered. Le Page, the defendant in that action, and another, had been engaged in the manufacture of glue known as "Le Page's Liquid Glue." They used that mark upon cases and bottles; the word "Le Page" being the prominent feature. They sold out the business, including the trademarks, to the Russia Cement Company, a corporation, which thereafter advertised the article extensively under the trademark or name of "Le Page's." Le Page then commenced to manufacture and sell a glue under the name, "Le Page's Improved Liquid Glue," and described its manufacture as carried on under the management of Wm. N. Le Page, the original inventor and manufacturer of Le Page's Liquid Glue. The court said: "A person cannot make a trademark of his own name, and thus debar another, having the same name, from using it in his business, if he does so honestly, and without any intention to appropriate wrongfully the good will of a business already established by others of the name. Everyone has the absolute right to use his own name honestly in his own business, for the purpose of advertising it, even though he may thereby incidentally interfere with and injure the business of another having the same name. In such case the inconvenience or loss to which those having a common right to it are subjected is damnum absque injuria. But although he may thus use his name, he cannot resort to any artifice or do any act calculated to mislead the public as to the identity of the business firm or establishment, or of the article produced by them, and thus produce injury to the other beyond that which results from the similarity of name. . . . One who has carried on a business under a tradename, and sold a particular article in such a manner, by the use of his name as a trademark or a tradename, as to cause the business or the article to become known or established in favor under such name, may sell or assign such tradename or trademark when he sells the business or manufacture, and by such sale or assignment conclude himself from the further use of it in a similar way." This language was quoted with approval in Howe Scale Co. v. Wyckoff, Seamans, & Benedict, 198 U. S. 118, 49 L. ed. 972, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609.

Other cases involving the transfer of trademarks, labels, etc., and the rights of vendor and vendee, are collated and discussed in subject notes in 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 704, 20 C. C. A. 165, and 30 C. C. A. 376.

There may be relief against others than the vendors, however, in cases of unfair competition, by the use of trademarks signs, and labels.

The Sheffield-King Milling Company, a manufacturer of flour in Minnesota, designated the flour made at its mill by various brands, among which were "Sheffield's Best" and "Gold Mine." Its flour was generally known as "Sheffield's Flour," and the name "Sheffields" was used as part of its trademarks, tradenames, and brands, and the name became generally known in the flour trade. Afterwards, B. B. Sheffield, with others, organized a corporation named the "Sheffield Mill & Elevator Company," and proceeded to solicit business from the customers of the Sheffield-King Company, representing that it was a successor thereto, and making other false representations. B. B. Sheffield was the son of the founder of the business of the Sheffield-King Company. In an action by the last-named company against the new company, to restrain the latter from this unfair competition in trade the supreme court of Minnesota sustained an injunction against the new company, restraining it, among other things, from using as a trademark or tradename, or as a part thereof, the word "Sheffield," and from representing itself as a successor to the business of the first company. The court said: "It is apparent that an effort was made by the defendant so to name itself that the business built up by the plaintiff's predecessor, the Sheffield Milling Company, might be attracted by the name 'Sheffield;' that the name of the defendant was fraudulently selected by it for that purpose, and for the purpose of diverting the business of the plaintiff to itself; and, further, that the defendant has been guilty of unfair competition in business with plaintiff. . . . The intent of the promoters, officers, and agents of the defendant in adopting and using the name 'Sheffield,' in connection with the business of manufacturing and marketing flour by the defendant, may be inferred from their acts and the circumstances connected with the incorporation of the defendant and the conduct of its business. It clearly appears from the evidence that the name 'Sheffield,' by long use, became and is a valuable tradename, descriptive of the flour made by the plaintiff, and signifies to the commercial world a desirable grade of flour; and, further, that the right to use the name in such connection was sold to the plaintiff by the promoters of the defendant. Upon the evidence in this case, much of which is not disputed, it seems difficult to explain the acts and conduct of the defendant's officers and agents, except upon the theory that they intended the necessary consequences thereof, which were unfairly to deprive the plaintiff of that which it had honestly acquired and paid a fair consideration therefor." Sheffield-King Mill. Co. v. Sheffield Mill. & Elevator Co. 105 Minn. 315, 319, 127 Am. St. Rep. 574, 117 N. W. 447, 449.

The same result was reached in the case of Walter Baker & Co. v. Slack, 65 C. C. A. 138, 130 Fed. 514. Walter Baker & Company were the manufacturers of "Baker's Cocoa" and "Baker's Chocolate," articles so marked and known and extensively advertised and sold. Other marks and symbols were upon the labels in connection with these names. Thus the name "Baker's" became associated in the minds of dealers and associates with the product of Walter Baker & Company. Years after the business had been so carried on, William Henry Baker began, in another state, to make and put upon the market chocolate and cocoa products, so labeled as to cause them to be sold and accepted as the goods of Walter Baker & Company. He was enjoined and obeyed the decree. Two of the labels of the goods of the party enjoined were "Baker's Best Cocoa," and "Baker's Premium Best Cooking Chocolate," and were sold by a grocer who was made a party to the suit. This party, being only enjoined in part, complainant appealed. Upon that appeal, the court said: "It must not, however, be overlooked that the word 'baker,' as applied to chocolate and cocoa manufactured by the appellant, had, in the course of years, come to represent to purchasers the product of Walter Baker & Company, and was so generally known to the trade. The appellee had largely dealt in those products, and was well informed of those facts, prior to the time when he undertook the sale of the product of William Henry Baker's manufacture. It must also not be overlooked that William Henry Baker instituted his business and applied the name of 'Baker' to his products fraudulently, with the expectation of profiting by the tradename of 'Baker,' and in the hope of diverting to himself some part of the trade which legitimately belonged to Walter Baker & Company, Limited. We must therefore deal with the conduct of the appellee in the marketing of this product of William Henry Baker in the light of these circumstances. He had the right, as we assume, to sell that product; but honesty and good faith required that he should not palm it off as the product of Walter Baker & Company; that he should not represent it as 'Baker's Chocolate' or 'Baker's Cocoa,' for that meant to the purchaser that it was the product of Walter Baker & Company, Limited."

It was held in White v. Trowbridge, 216 Pa. 11, 64 Atl. 862, that a retiring partner, who had not entered into any contract restricting him from using trademarks of the firm, should not be enjoined from afterwards using trademarks and labels which were not so similar as to deceive persons of ordinary intelligence, using ordinary care. The court approved the following conclusion of the trial court: "The defendant is not deprived of the right to use his own name in connection with the conduct of his business simply from the fact that his surname is a portion of the trademark used by the copartnership of which he was formerly a member, and whose business has been continued by plaintiffs." But the court also approved the following: "He has no right to use said name for the purpose of misleading the public, or to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with, or acquiring the product of, the old firm, or its successors in business."

In an extended note in 20 C. C. A. 165, upon unfair competition in trade, which reviews many authorities, it was said: "The principle which governs in the case to which this note is appended is one which has long been recognized in the courts both of this country and of England. Stated in brief, and in its most comprehensive form, it is that no man has a right to pass off his goods upon the public as and for the goods of another, and thereby work a fraud upon both the public and his rival in trade. This principle is broader than the rules applicable to strict, technical trademarks, but it is not something separate and apart from trademark law. Rather, it may be said, it lies at the very foundation of trademark law, and covers, besides, a large field to which some of the technical trademark rules do not extend. . . . Independently of the existence of any technical trademark, no manufacturer or vendor will be permitted to so dress up his goods, by the use of names, marks, letters, labels, or wrappers, or by the adoption of any style, form, or color of packages, or by the combination of any or all of these indicia, as to cause purchasers to be deceived into buying his goods as and for the goods of another."

The defendant company should not be prevented from a just and proper use of its corporate name, although embracing the surname of the Kramers, former proprietors of the Ætna mills; but in such use it cannot be allowed, by any artifice or device or otherwise, to induce the customers of the Ætna mills or others who may desire to purchase plaintiff's products, to deal with it upon the supposition that they are dealing with or buying the wares of the plaintiff. W. R. Lynn Shoe Co. v. Auburn-Lynn Shoe Co. 100 Me. 461, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 960, 62 Atl. 490; Regent Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Haaker, 75 Neb. 426, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 447, 106 N. W. 595; Nolan Bros. Shoe Co. v. Nolan, 131 Cal. 271, 53 L.R.A. 384, 82 Am. St. Rep. 346, 63 Pac. 480; Goodyear's India Rubber Glove Mfg. Co. v. Goodyear Rubber Co. 128 U. S. 598, 32 L. ed. 535, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 166; N. K. Fairbank Co. v. Luckel, K. & C. Soap Co. 42 C. C. A. 376, 102 Fed. 327.

The court cannot say as matter of law that the use of the labels shown in exhibits K and L was such that persons of ordinary intelligence, exercising usual care, would not be misled into the supposition that the flour was that produced by the plaintiff. The petition presented questions of fact whether the brands, labels, and methods used by the defendant resulted in unfair competition within the principles stated in this opinion, and therefore stated a cause of action.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and proceed with the cause.

MAINE TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(104 Me. 440, 72 Atl. 175.)

Highway — obstruction — reel of pipe.

1. A reel of lead pipe needed for its work, which is placed by a telephone company in line with its poles near the curb of a street in which it is engaged in stringing its wires, under lawful authority from the municipality, is not an unlawful obstruction to travel, which will render it liable for injuries caused by a traveler's horse becoming frightened at it, although it is of such appearance as would be likely to frighten well-broken horses not accustomed to it.

28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — frightened horse — duty of driver.

2. The driver of a horse approaching an appliance which a telephone company is lawfully using in a highway is bound to foresee that the horse may be frightened at it, and to take measures to avoid or prevent the possible consequences.

Appeal — motion to set aside verdict.

3. A verdict not directed can be set aside on motion if from the whole record it is clearly wrong, and it is not necessary, in order to get the case before the reviewing court, to except to the rulings of the trial judge rather than to move to set aside the verdict.

(November 19, 1908.)

MOTION by defendant to set aside a verdict of the Supreme Judicial Court for Somerset County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Butler & Butler for defendant.
Mr. Bernard Gibbs for plaintiff.

Emery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant telephone company had acquired from the proper authority the right to erect and maintain in Main street and other streets in Madison village, "telephone poles and wires to be placed thereon, together with such supporting and strengthening fixtures and wires as the company might deem requisite." In the erection of its plant there, the company made use of cables or groups of wires inclosed in lead pipe a little over an inch in diameter, and strung upon its poles. The lead pipe used came from the factory wound on wooden reels 3 feet in length and 4 feet in diameter, and so constructed that they could be mounted on axles, and the pipe be unwound from them into its proper place in the plant. On May 11, 1907, the defendant's foreman of construction in Madison sent men to Main street to prepare for stringing

Note. — Liability of public service company for frightening horses by construction apparatus in street.

It was held in Lewis v. Ballston Terminal R. Co. 45 App. Div. 129, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1035, that evidence that a corporation organized for operating an electric railroad permitted a steam locomotive which, without statutory authority, it used in the construction of its road, to stand upon its tracks in a narrow part of a highway, is, in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained in consequence of the plaintiff's horse being frightened by the escape of steam from the loco-and to string such wires and cables on the poles already erected in that street. For this work some of the men under his direction placed one of these reels of lead pipe on the side of the street next the sidewalk and in the line of the poles upon which the cables were to be strung. While the men were at work upon the poles and wires preparing to string the cables and pipe, but before they had begun to unwind the pipe from the reel, the plaintiff came driving his horse along the street toward the reel, when the horse became frightened from the appearance of the reel, or of the lead pipe wound round it, and ran away, to the plaintiff's injury.

The plaintiff's horse was an ordinarily well-broken horse, and was being driven with ordinary care. The reel and pipe were inert, not in operation, and were placed close to the sidewalk, leaving ample room for the public travel, but were of such appearance as would be likely to frighten well-broken horses unaccustomed to them, though in this case it is uncertain whether it was the appearance of the reel or the brightness of the pipe that caused the fright. There was no evidence that the company was any more aware than the plaintiff that the reel was likely to frighten horses.

Upon the foregoing facts established by the evidence, the plaintiff contends in support of the verdict that the reel and pipe were at the time and place per se an unlawful obstruction to public travel in the street. In his declaration and in his evidence he bases his claim for damages on that proposition alone. He does not complain of any negligence in the operation or care of the reel and pipe.

We do not think the proposition can be sustained. Having the right to erect and maintain its poles and string on them its wires and cables where it did in the street, the company had the concomitant right to use suitable appliances therefor and in reasonably needful places. For the work of stringing on the poles and the wires and lead pipes inclosing them, some kind of a reel was appropriate and needful, and it needed to be in the street in the line of the poles.

motive, sufficient to warrant a jury in finding that the corporation was guilty of negligence; such evidence imposing upon it the duty of establishing that the locomotive was necessarily placed in the position in which it was, and that it did not unreasonably interfere with the right of the public.

Attention is called to Heinmiller v. Winston, 131 Iowa, 32, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 150, 117 Am. St. Rep. 405, 107 N. W. 1102, and Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Farver, 111 Ind. 195, 60 Am. Rep. 696, 12 N. E. 296, for cases involving the liability for the use of a steam shovel and a steam engine in

There is no suggestion in the evidence that any other kind of a reel, larger, smaller, or of different shape or color, would have been less likely to frighten horses, or that it could have been so located as to be still serviceable and less startling to horses. Indeed, so far as appears, the horse would have been equally frightened by the bright lead pipe coiled on the ground or in a cart.

It is not the law that economic progress is to be arrested or even turned aside, whenever a well-broken horse, carefully driven, is frightened or likely to be frightened thereby. To say that well-broken horses, carefully driven, must not be frightened, is to say that no new appliance, however useful, shall be used on or near highways. It is common knowledge that all horses, even those well broken and carefully driven, are liable to be frightened by any unaccustomed appearance or noise, and indeed by accustomed appearances and noises in unaccustomed situations; that they are susceptible to fright from the most trivial things; that their vagaries are unforeseeable; and that it is practically impossible to guard against them. On the other hand, it is equally common knowledge that well-broken horses can ordinarily be so accustomed to appearances and noises as not to be at all frightened by them.

In this age of economic progress, it is the more reasonable and workable, and hence the legal, rule that owners and drivers of horses should recognize that the highways are not exclusively for their use; that other and new instrumentalities for transportation and transmission, and appliances for their construction and maintenance, are often legally allowed upon the highways; and that they should early accustom their horses to whatever new conditions thus arise, and be on their guard against them. In this case it was as much incumbent on the plaintiff as on the defendant to foresee that his horse might be frightened by the reel or the lead pipe, and have taken measures to avoid or prevent the possible consequences. The reel and the lead pipe being otherwise lawfully where and when they were in the street, the mere fact that they were likely to frighten horses unaccustomed to them did not make their presence there unlawful. The consequences of the fright must therefore remain where they fell. *Farrell v. The plaintiff further claims, however, that the defendant should have brought the case to the law court upon exceptions to the rulings of the presiding justice, instead of upon a motion to set aside the verdict, and cites in support of his claim Stephenson v. Thayer, 63 Me. 143. It was not necessary for the defendant to except and rely upon exceptions to the rulings of the presiding justice, no verdict having been directed. A verdict not directed can be set aside on motion if from the whole record it appears clearly wrong.

Motion sustained.

Verdict set aside.

(— Mass. —, 92 N. E. 327.)

Highway — collision of bicycle and automobile — negligence.

It is not negligence per se for a man riding a bicycle along a street in front of an automobile to attempt to cross the road in front of the machine, if it was so far behind him that it might reasonably have been expected that the driver would see him, and could and would, by the exercise of proper care, so manage the machine as to avoid a collision; but the question is one for the jury under all the circumstances of the case.

(June 27, 1910.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after directing verdicts in defendants' favor of consolidated actions brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant Annie M. Phillips. New trial granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Herbert Parker and Henry H. Fuller, for plaintiff:

A traveler is not necessarily negligent because he attempts to cross a street without first looking or listening to ascertain whether an automobile is approaching. Such a traveler has a right to assume that other persons using the highway with him will exercise a proper degree of care.

Purtell v. Jordan, 156 Mass. 573, 31 N. E. 652; Hennessey v. Taylor, 189 Mass. 583, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 345, 76 N. E. 224, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396; McDonald v. Bowditch, 201 Mass. 339, 87 N. E. 585; Shapleigh v. Wyman, 134 Mass. 118; McGourty v. De Marco, 200 Mass. 57, 85 N. E. 891.

Whether or not an omission to look behind before crossing the street is evidence of a lack of due care is a question for the jury.

Bowser v. Wellington, 126 Mass. 391;

Note. — Liability for collision of automobile with bicyclist.

For other notes involving the negligent operation of automobiles in general, see the title "Automobiles" in "Index to Notes" of this series.

The reciprocal duties of a bicyclist and automobilist when approaching one another at street intersections are governed by the common-law rule that each is bound to exercise reasonable care so as not to collide with the other. Weber v. Swallow, 136 Wis. 46, 116 N. W. 844.

The owner of an automobile was properly found guilty of negligence, where he drove it up behind and ran into one who was proceeding on a bicycle in the same direction. Heath v. Cook (R. I.) 68 Atl. 427.

So, where an automobile which was being turned about at the junction of two streets struck and injured a bicycle rider, the jury was properly instructed, in substance, that the driver of the automobile might rightfully turn it, using any part of the street therefor, subject, however, to the right of others to use the street; that it was the duty of vehicles in meeting to pass to the right, and that the fact that an accident happened on the right-hand side of a street might be considered in evidence, and that the jury should consider all the facts and circumstances, and determine therefrom whether the driver of the automobile at the time of such collision was doing anything he should not have done. Johnson v. Shaw, 204 Mass. 165, 90 N. E. 518.

And under such circumstances, it was not error to refuse to an instruction that a statute declaring the law of the road had no application to the place where such accident occurred. Ibid.

The questions of negligence and com-

The defendant was negligent.

Gifford v. Jennings, 190 Mass. 54, 76 N. E. 233.

Messrs. Curtis G. Metzler and William L. Pullen, for defendant:

The plaintiff failed to show that her intestate was in the exercise of due care.

tributory negligence are for the jury, where, at the time a bicyclist was about to cross an intersecting street, there was on his left a wagon with a high box upon it, and an automobile which approached from the opposite direction and instead of keeping to the right, as required by law, was driven diagonally across the street intersection in front of the wagon and the bicyclist, who was unable to avoid a collision with it. Reed v. Martin (Mich.) 125 N. W. 61.

So, where a boy sixteen years of age riding a bicycle was struck by an automobile which attempted to pass in front of him from one side of the street to another, when so close that a collision was inevitable, and the defendant claims that the boy ran into the automobile in spite of all the former could do to prevent it, it is for the jury to determine who was to blame for the accident. Campbell v. Dreher, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 444, 110 S. W. 353.

And the question of negligence and contributory negligence was held to be for the jury in McGee v. Young, 132 Ga. 606, 64 S. E. 689, where the plaintiff claimed that the defendant, who apparently started to turn at a street intersection, suddenly changed the course of his automobile, and ran into the bicycle the plaintiff was riding, while the defendant claimed that the plaintiff deflected his bicycle, and in spite of all the former could do, collided with the automobile.

Where, while riding a bicycle westward on the north side of a street, at an intersection of a cross street, the rider collided with an automobile which had just crossed from the south side of the street, behind an east-bound street car, for the purpose of going north on the cross street, and the evidence is conflicting as to whether the plaintiff was riding his bicycle rapidly while leaning over the handle bars, and had an opportunity when 25 or 30 feet distant from the point of collision to observe the approaching automobile, he will be held guilty of contributory negligence either in failing to keep a proper lookout or in riding too near to the street car at a speed which rendered a collision inevitable. Weber v. Swallow, supra.

It is contributory negligence for a bicycle rider, upon approaching a much-traveled intersecting city street, to look but once for approaching vehicles, where, had he exercised due care, he might have seen the automobile which struck him, in time to have avoided it. McCarragher v. Proal, 114 App. Div. 470, 100 N. Y. Supp. 208.

On the question of contributory negligence the jury may consider the fact that a municipal ordinance required the plaintiff, as he approached an intersecting street, to give right of way to vehicles thereon, notwithstanding the violation of the ordinance did not, of itself, constitute negligence, it being for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances, including the violation of the ordinance, whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Ibid.

Whether the violation of a municipal ordinance will in general constitute negligence or contributory negligence, see the note to Sluder v. St. Louis Transit Co. 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 230.

A declaration is good upon demurrer, where it alleges in substance that the plaintiff, while riding a bicycle with due care along a public street, was injured by the negligent and careless driving of an automobile in the opposite direction, between the plaintiff and a vehicle standing near the curb, which shut off the latter's view, the space between it and the plaintiff being too short to permit the stopping of either the bicycle or automobile, so as to avoid a collision. Hughes v. Connable, 5 Penn. (Del.) 523, 64 Atl. 72.

But a declaration which, in addition to averring such facts, alleges that the defendant did not give reasonable notice of the approach of his automobile, so that the plaintiff, who was exercising due care, could get out of its way, is not sufficient. Ibid.

So, a count in a declaration is bad which alleges that such automobile was run at a rapid rate of speed, and that the defendant careless and negligently omitted to give reasonable notice of its approach in time for the plaintiff to avoid injury. Ibid.

And there can be no recovery under a declaration alleging in substance that the defendant negligently ran his automobile into and collided with a person riding a bicycle in a public street, which resulted in the latter's death, where it appears that the accident was caused solely by the slipping of the bicycle, which threw the rider to the pavement without coming into collision with the automobile. Merklinger v. Lambert, 76 N. J. L. 806, 72 Atl. 119.

If deceased saw the automobile and attempted to cross and chanced it, he was not in the exercise of due care.

Madden v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 194 Mass. 491, 80 N. E. 447.

The plaintiff's intestate did not exercise due care.

Murphy v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 188 Mass. 8, 73 N. E. 1018; Holian v. Boston Elev. R. Co. supra.

Hammond, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The collision occurred upon a straight, broad, smooth road in open daylight. There were no other travelers, either vehicles or pedestrians, to obstruct the view or distract the attention. The whole road for the time being was, for the use of each of the vehicles in question, subject only to the right of the other; and yet the collision occurred. Was there evidence of due care of the deceased, who was upon the bicycle? That is the only question raised upon this record.

The case is close. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show due care of the deceased. And she does not meet this burden simply by showing that there was an accident and that thereby the deceased was injured. It is to be noted, however, that this is not a case where the physical movements of the injured leading up to the accident are purely of conjecture, as in a class of cases of which Ralph v. Cambridge Electric Light Co. 200 Mass. 566, 86 N. E. 922, is a type; nor where the movements are such as, by their very nature, to show negligence, as in the familiar class of cases where it is held that entering upon a railroad track at a highway crossing without looking or listening is of itself evidence of negligence; nor yet where an approaching car is so near that stepping upon the track is plainly a careless act. On the contrary there is considerable evidence as to the movements of the respective parties. While it is unquestioned that the collision would not have occurred if the deceased had not attempted to cross the road, yet it cannot be ruled as a general proposition of law that a traveler is necessarily negligent because he attempts to cross a street even without first looking or listening to ascertain whether a vehicle is approaching. Such a traveler has a right, in the absence of anything to the contrary, to assume that other persons using the highway will exercise a proper degree of care toward him. Bowser v. Wellington, 126 Mass. 391; Purtell v. Jordan, 156 Mass. 573, 31 N. E. 652; Hennessey 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v. Taylor, 189 Mass. 583, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 345, 76 N. E. 224, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396, and cases cited. When there is a collision upon the highway, the question whether there is negligence on the part of either of the actors is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury. Hennessey v. Taylor, supra, and cases cited.

The evidence in the present case was somewhat conflicting, but we think the jury might properly have found that while the deceased was riding his bicycle on the right side of the road near the curbstone, and while the automobile was behind him going in the same direction, he determined to retrace his steps, and for that purpose began to cross the road; that the automobile was so far behind him that it reasonably might have been expected that the defendant would see him, and that if she should see him she could and would, by the exercise of proper care on her part, so manage the automobile as to avoid a collision. Crossing the road under such circumstances would not necessarily be negligent as matter of law. The question of the negligence of the act would be one of fact for the jury. Nor do we see in the other circumstances of the case anything absolutely conclusive in law against the existence of due care on the part of the deceased. Upon the whole evidence this question, as it ordinarily is in cases of collision between travelers upon the highway, was one of fact for the jury.

It follows that the ruling was wrong. In accordance with the terms of the report, the entry is new trial granted.

BOARD OF CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS OF HUDSON COUNTY.

(— N. J. —, 76 Atl 1014.)

Bridge — duty to light.

1. Lighting a bridge by artificial light is no part of its erection, rebuilding, or repair.

Same — guard rail at right angle — negligence.

2. Proof that a guard rail has been placed at right angles to the side of a bridge.

Headnotes by VOORHEES, J.

Note. — Duty to light highway bridge.

It does not appear that the duty of a municipality or private proprietor in regard to lighting highway bridges is differ-where the highway is broader than the width of the bridge, running from said bridge toward the side of the highway, assuming that such rail was so placed by the board of chosen freeholders, and forms a part of said bridge, is not evidence of wrongful neglect on the part of such board to erect, rebuild, or repair the bridge, to sustain a recovery, under § 9 of the bridge act (Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 307), for damages resulting from a vehicle running into such guard rail at night.

(June 20, 1910.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Colby & Whiting for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John Griffin, for defendant in error:

The defendant is not bound by law to light its bridges.

Weeks v. Somerset County, 68 N. J. L. 622, 54 Atl. 826; Macomber v. Taunton, 100 Mass. 255; Randall v. Eastern R. Co. 106 Mass. 276, 8 Am. Rep. 327.

Voorhees, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's intestate, while riding at his son's invitation in an automobile driven ent from the duty to light other parts of the highway.

Thus, in Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169, 89 Am. Dec. 418, it was held that a bridge within a city is a part of the street, and the city having power to light its streets, it is its duty to light the bridge as part of the street, so as to protect persons using it. And in Chicago v. Thomas, 141 Ill. App. 122, this decision is approved to the effect that it is the duty of a city to light a bridge as much as any other part of a street.

And the duty to light bridges may rest upon the assumption by a municipality of the duty of lighting streets generally, in which case it is only required that they be so lighted as to be reasonably safe for ordinary travel. Chicago v. Apel, 50 Ill. App. 132; Chicago v. McDonald, 57 Ill. App. 250; Chicago v. Wright, 68 Ill. 586.

It may, because of circumstances, become the duty of the proprietor of a bridge to light it in order to make it reasonably safe for travel at night, as where the bridge may be opened to permit the passage of water craft or covered so that natural light is excluded. Thus, in Stephani v. Manitowoc, 89 Wis. 467, 62 N. W. 176, where a city 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

by his son, on March 22, 1908, at about 7:15 P. M., on Harrison avenue, was injured by reason of the vehicle coming in contact with a guard rail at a bridge over Frank creek in said highway. The bridge in question was a county bridge. It was not of the full width of the highway, at the time of the accident; the proof being that some two years before the highway had been widened and curbed on one side, so that there was a space of about 7 feet on the side of the bridge between it and the line of curbing. It was also shown that from the side of the bridge, extending at right angles toward the curb, there had been erected, by whom does not appear, a fence or barrier composed of 2 x 4 uprights carrying a top rail of 4 x 6 timber. This fence or barrier extended some 3 or 4 feet from the side of the bridge, the remaining space up to the curb being without any guard, so that a person driving along the curb would meet with no physical barrier to prevent him going into the creek. The automobile in question had proceeded from Paterson to Newark, where the side oil lamps were lighted; but the large gas lamps were not. The journey was continued on the highway in question toward Jersey City. It was dark when the bridge was reached, and there was no light on the fence or railing; but there were lights along the highway, one arc light being within 70 feet of the bridge. The driver describes the occurrence as follows: "When we came to the bridge, it was dark, and there was no light there at all. We came along and we heard a crash of our machine." They maintained a drawbridge, the court said that it was its duty to make the bridge reasonably safe for travel both by day and by night, and if it was not reasonably safe in the nighttime without being lighted, it was the duty of the city to light it.

And in Manley v. St. Helens Canal & R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & N. 840, Watson, B., in writing a concurring opinion, says, if a bridge is so constructed as to be opened at night, it ought to be lighted and watched.

In Com. v. Central Bridge Corp. 12 Cush. 242, it was held that a provision in the charter of a toll bridge company that the bridge should at all times be kept in good, safe, and passable condition, requires the company to light the bridge, if the jury find it necessary in order to make it safe for travel by night.

And in Conowingo Bridge Co. v. Hedrick, 95 Md. 669, 53 Atl. 430, where the keeper of a covered toll bridge let the rider of an unlighted bicycle on the bridge behind a pedestrian who was injured from the resulting collision, it was held that failure of the bridge company to light the bridge was to be considered in determining if it was negligent.

came within 5 or 10 feet of the bridge before they saw the railing and ran into it, going through it a few feet, tearing it away. The declaration avers negligence in the defendants in the erection, rebuilding, and repair of the bridge, whereby the same was dangerous, because vehicles "were likely to come suddenly, unexpectedly, and unavoidably in contact with the railing;" that the defendants failed to "light the bridge by artificial lights," and erected the bridge so negligently that "it was unsafe . . . for the persons to draw near to and enter upon the bridge." At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, a nonsuit was granted. To review this judicial action, this writ is being prosecuted.

As negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to the decedent, the question of contributory negligence does not arise. The sole question, therefore, to be disposed of, is the negligence of the defendants.

It is conceded that in the daytime the bridge was perfectly safe. Section 9 of the bridge act (Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 307) provides that if the "board of chosen freeholders shall wrongfully neglect to erect, rebuild, or repair . . . [any bridge] by reason whereof, any person or persons shall receive injury or damage in his or their persons or property, he or they may bring his or their action of trespass on the case against . . . against said board of chosen freeholders . . . and recover judgment." The scope of this act has been narrowed by this court to those cases in which injuries have been sustained, for failure of the bridge safely to perform its appropriate functions where of right there is a reliance upon them. Jernee v. Monmouth County, 52 N. J. L. 553, 11 L.R.A. 416, 21 Atl. 295. It is also settled that the above act gave a private remedy for the neglect of a public duty, which at common law did not exist. Maguth v. Passaic County, 72 N. J. L. 226, 62 Atl. 679. Therefore, to warrant a recovery, the case must be brought within the scope of this act.

The plaintiff's claim that the bridge should have been lighted by the freeholders must fail. Lighting a bridge by artificial light is no part of its erection, rebuilding, or repair.

The remaining allegations of negligence are that the defendants had repaired the highway, over which they had control, whereby it became wider than the bridge, and had neglected to provide guard rails or a wing fence, running at a proper angle from the curb to the bridge.

It is at once perceived that a barrier placed at an acute angle to the curb, if not seen by a passing carriage, would be dangerous. So this railing was dangerous, if at all, simply because not seen. It is not argued that there was any defect either in the bridge proper or the railing. The latter was placed there for the purpose of warning and protection, and appears to have been sufficient for that purpose. There is no provision of law that bridges should be constructed to the full width of the highway, and I apprehend it is a matter of common knowledge that they ordinarily do not extend to such width. This, therefore, did not constitute a wrongful construction. Nor can the fact that the barrier extended from the side of the bridge at a right angle, instead of being at an acute angle with the creek, be considered wrongful construction. The ordinary rule must be applied to boards of freeholders, regarding the building of bridges; that is, a breach of duty must be demonstrated by proof.

No proof has been offered that the construction was different from ordinary construction, or that it was not sufficient for the purpose for which it was intended. The case is not unlike Feil v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 77 N. J. L. 502, 72 Atl. 362, which arose over the construction of a railroad platform across which passengers were accustomed to pass. The court there said: "There is nothing in the present case to support the conclusion that the defendant company failed to observe the degree of care indicated in the construction of its platform at the Millville station. There is no proof that it differs in its character from platforms in general use by the defendant and other railroad companies; and no presumption of want of due care arises from the fact that a railroad company, presumably to meet the requirements of its traffic, has constructed its platform in such a way that one portion of it is lower than another, when the difference of level is not greater than the height of an ordinary step. Negligence must be proved, and, in a case like the present, that can be done only by showing that the platform is of a design which a reasonably careful judgment would disapprove as being likely to cause accident to persons using it as a way to and from trains. To hold otherwise would be to leave railroad companies to the mere caprice of juries, and subject them to the danger of being found guilty of negligence no matter what plan of construction they might adopt." See also Weeks v. Somerset County, 68 N. J. L. 622, 54 Atl. 826.

Proof that a guard rail has been placed at right angles to the sides of a bridge, where the highway is broader than the width of the bridge, running from said bridge toward the side of the highway, assuming that such rail was so placed by the board of chosen freeholders, and forms a part of said bridge, is not evidence of wrongful neglect on the part of such board to erect, rebuild, or repair the bridge, to sustain a recovery, under the bridge act, for damages resulting from a vehicle running into such guard rail at night.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEE J. TAYLOR.

(151 N. C. 284, 66 S. E. 135.)

Negligence — exploding bottle — res ipsa loquitur.

1. The mere explosion of a bottle of carbonated beverage to the injury of a purchaser is not sufficient to carry to the jury the question of the negligence of the one who bottled it, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

Evidence — negligence — exploding bottles.

2. Evidence of the explosion to the injury of the purchaser of a bottle of carbonated beverage, accompanied by evidence that other bottles put up by the same bottler had exploded during the several preceding months, is sufficient to carry to the jury the question of the latter's negligence, in an action to hold him liable for the injury.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Pamlico County granting a nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Plaintiff, a retailer in soft drinks, was injured by the explosion, while he was removing it from a crate, of a bottle of car-

Note. — Applicability of rule res ipsa loquitur in action for personal injuries from defects in articles manufactured or sold by the defendant.

That negligence on the part of a seller or manufacturer is not made out from the mere fact that personal injury resulted from the use of the article sold or manufactured was, with little or no discussion, declared to be the law in Standard Oil Co. v. Murray, 57 C. C. A. 1, 119 Fed. 572; Leavitt v. Fiberloid Co. 196 Mass. 440, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 855, 82 N. E. 682; Talley v. Beever, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 675, 78 S. W. 23. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) J. A. C.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas W. Davis, D. L. Ward, and H. L. Gibbs, for appellant:

Any evidence that plaintiff might give showing negligence upon the defendant in its bottling works, as that other bottles similarly charged had exploded, would be some evidence to go to the jury, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in this case was the purchaser of the goods, or one of them, and therefore the many authorities cited as to when and to what extent a vendor is responsible to third persons for negligent default in the sale of goods do not in strictness apply, and, there being no evidence tending to show a breach of warranty, express or implied, the appeal presents the question whether there is sufficient evidence of actionable negligence as between vendor and vendee to carry the case to the jury; that is, has there been legal evidence offered tending to show a breach of some legal duty on the part of defendant incident to the contract relation between them, and not contained within the terms and stipulations of the agreement? Such breach of duty could be said to exist when a vendor sells goods having a latent defect of a kind likely to cause some physical injury to the vendee, and of which the vendor was aware, or which he should have ascertained by proper care and attention (Wharton, Neg. § 774; 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 430, 431), and may be referred to the general principle announced in the notable case of Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503, where it was said that "whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that everyone of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that, if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger."

Considering the case in this aspect, it is very generally held that in a claim of this character a plaintiff is not required to establish his case by direct or positive proof, but the issue must be submitted to the jury whenever facts are shown forth in evidence from which a fair and reasonable inference of negligence may be made. Speaking to this question in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 58, the authors say: "The plaintiff is not bound to prove more than enough to raise a fair presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant, and of resulting injury to himself. Having done this, he is entitled to recover unless the defendant produces evidence to rebut this presumption. It has sometimes been held not sufficient for the plaintiff to establish a probability of the defendant's default, but this is going too far. If the facts proved make it probable that the defendant violated his duty, it is for the jury to decide whether he did so or not. To hold otherwise would be to deny the value of circumstantial evidence. As already stated, the plaintiff is not bound to prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt, though the facts shown must be more consistent with the negligence of the defendant than with the absence of it. It has never been suggested that evidence of negligence should be direct and positive. In the nature of the case, the plaintiff must labor under difficulties in proving the fact of negligence, and, as that fact itself is always a relative one, it is susceptible of proof by evidence of circumstances bearing more or less directly on the fact of negligence,—a kind of evidence which might not be satisfactory in other classes of cases open to clearer proof. This is on the general principle of the law of evidence, which holds that, to be sufficient or satisfactory evidence, which satisfies an unprejudiced mind." This statement is cited with approval in the opinion of the court in Fitzgerald v. Southern R. Co. 141 N. C. 530-534, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337, 54 S. E. 391, and in that case it was held as follows: "(2) Direct evidence of negligence is not required, but the same may be inferred from acts and attendant circumstances, and, if the facts proved establish the more reasonable probability that the defendant has been guilty of actionable negligence, the case cannot be withdrawn from the jury, though the possibility of accident may arise on the evidence." There are instances where this requirement is met by simply proving the occurrence and the resultant injury, a doctrine which finds expression in the phrase res ipsa loquitur, and which has been considered and applied in several recent decisions of this court, as in Fitzgerald's Case, supra; Ross v. Double Shoals Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 115, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298, 52 S. E. 121; Stewart v. Van Deventer Carpet Co. 138 N. C. 60, 50 S. E. 562; Womble v. Merchants' Grocery Co. 135 N. C. 474, 47 S. E. 493.

Plaintiff insists that these authorities apply in his favor here, and that he should have been allowed to go to the jury on proof of the occurrence and the injury without more, but we do not think this position can be sustained. The principle only applies to cases where, on proof of the occurrence and the injury, the existence of negligent default is the more reasonable probability; and should not be allowed to prevail where, on proof of the occurrence without more, the matter still rests only in conjecture. As said in Labatt on Master and Servant, § 843, quoted with approval in some of the cases referred to: "The rationale of the doctrine is that in some cases the very nature of the occurrence may of itself, and through the presumption it carries, supply the requisite proof. It is applicable when, under the circumstances shown, the accident presumably would not have happened if due care had been exercised. Its essential import is that on the facts proved the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, without direct proof of negligence." While coca-cola seems to be a recognized article of merchandise not usually or necessarily dangerous under ordinary conditions, the evidence shows that it is put up in glass bottles, charged with gas to a pressure of not less than 60 pounds to the square inch, in this instance shipped in cases or crates for quite a distance, and handled in various ways and by different parties; and the facts present a case where it would be entirely unsafe to permit the application of the principle contended for, or to hold that the explosion of one single bottle of such an article under such circumstances should of itself rise to the dignity of legal evidence sufficient, without more, to carry a case to the jury. Glaser v. Seitz, 35 Misc. 341, 71 N. Y. Supp. 942.

While we hold this to be a correct position as to mere proof of the occurrence, we are of opinion that there was error in sustaining defendant's motion of nonsuit, for the reason that there was additional testimony tending to show a want of proper care on the part of the defendant. The witness Mark Hargett testified that he bought coca-cola of plaintiff, which was bottled by defendant, the latter part of the week before plaintiff received his hurt. On Saturday some customers came, and in taking a bottle out the neck came off, and on the following day, Sunday, in taking another bottle from a crate, it exploded, and a piece of glass cut witness's arm, another piece struck a little girl's shoe standing by, went through the shoe, and cut her foot to the bone. Another witness, C. S. Weslett, testified "that all along for the last two years witness had seen these bottles from defendant's works explode in the store." True, the witness seems subsequently to have given evidence qualifying this statement, but we are not at liberty to select the more favorable portion of a witness's statement and act on it for defendant's benefit. In a motion of this kind we have repeatedly held that the evidence making for plaintiff's claim must be taken as true and interpreted in the light most favorable for him, and, applying this rule, we think the additional testimony indicated, with the evidence describing the occurrence, presents a case which requires that the issues raised should be submitted to the jury, and that the order directing a nonsuit was erroneous. There was testimony offered on part of plaintiff purporting to be expert evidence and tending to show additional circumstances indicating negligence on the part of defendant; but, as the court made no finding on the question of the witness being an expert, and the facts are not fully set out, we purposely refrain from expression on this question.

There is error, and this will be certified to the end that the order of nonsuit be set aside, and the cause restored to the docket for trial.

Reversed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

LOUISA EASTERLY, Appt.,

v.

JOHN MILLS et al., Respts.

(54 Wash. 356, 103 Pac. 475.)

Trial — jury — waiver.

1. The verdict of a jury is waived by motions by both parties for directed verdicts, where there is no conflict in the evidence as to any material fact and the court is authorized to enter such judgment as the evidence warrants.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Broker — secret commission — duty to account.

2. A real-estate broker who, to secure the terms on which he is authorized to sell, effects an intermediate sale to one who for a bonus is willing to comply with the owner's terms and hold the property subject to such terms as the true purchaser can meet, thereby securing a commission of which his principal is ignorant, is bound to account to him for it.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County dismissing an action brought to recover a portion of the proceeds of a sale of real estate made by defendants as plaintiff's agents. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bates, Peer, & Peterson, for appellant:

An agent who has his principal's property listed with him for sale at not less than a given price cannot sell it at a greater price than the list price, and, concealing

Note. — Right of principal to recover from broker or other agent commissions which he received from other party to the contract.

This note does not purport to cover the general question concerning the rights of the principal when his agent makes secret profits out of the transaction for the performance of which he is employed, but is limited strictly to cases such as the EASTERLY v. MILLS, in which the question arose whether the principal has the right to recover from his agent commissions which the latter, known or unknown to him, received from the party with whom the agent negotiated.

In accordance with the EASTERLY CASE it has been held in a number of cases that an agent who, while employed by his principal, secretly accepts a commission from the other party to the contract, cannot be permitted to retain it, but must account to his principal therefor. Commercial Club v. Davis, 136 Mo. App. 583, 118 S. W. 668, (purchaser's agent secretly receiving commissions from seller); Morrison v. Ogdensburg & L. C. R. Edwards, 11 Leigh. 213 (agent of seller being also agent of buyer, and having made contract with latter for half the profits on a resale); Powell v. Jones [1905] 1 K. B. 11 (subagents taking commission from other party); Fawcett v. Whitehouse, 8 L. J. Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by Louisa Easterly against John Mills and Fred Mills, copartners as John Mills & Son, to recover a portion of the proceeds of a sale of real estate made by the defendants as her agent. On trial and at the close of the evidence, the defendants moved the court to discharge the jury and enter judgment in their favor. Thereupon the plaintiff moved for a directed verdict in her favor. The defendants' motion being sustained, the action was dismissed. The plaintiff has appealed.

The appellant contends that the trial court erred in denying her motion for a directed verdict. The respondents insist that the proper judgment was entered, and contend that, even though there had been sufficient evidence in favor of appellant to warrant its submission to the jury, the ap-

In Barber v. Martin, 67 Neb. 445, 93 N. W. 722, it was held that the general manager of a corporation, in effecting a sale of the entire capital stock of his company, acts as the agent of all the stockholders, and he cannot retain a secret compensation received from the vendee.

The fact that the land was afterwards used for lottery purposes does not alter the rule. Commercial Club v. Davis, supra.

In Cohen v. Kuschke, 83 L. T. N. S. 102, it was held that if the agent of a purchaser receives a secret commission from the seller, the purchaser is entitled to recover either from the agent or the donor or both.

But when a purchaser's agent accepts commissions from the seller, the relation between the purchaser and his agent is that of debtor and creditor, and not that of trustee and cestui que trust, and the purchaser, therefore, cannot follow the moneys so received by the agent into the investments thereof. Lister v. Stubbs, supra.

Where an owner of land fixed his own price, and did not employ the agent to secure the best price he could obtain, but only to secure the acceptance of his proposition, and the seller received all that he agreed to take, the fact that the agent for the purchaser divided his commissions with the seller's agent does not entitle the seller to demand from his agent the commissions so received. Law v. Ware, 238 Ill. 360, 87 N. E. 308.

When the principal acceded to the receiving by the agent of commissions from the party with whom he negotiated, or had knowledge thereof, he cannot recover. Culverwell v. Campton, 31 U. C. C. P. 342; Webb v. McDermott, 3 Ont. Week. Rep. 644.

So, in Holmes v. Cathcart, 88 Minn. 213, 60 L.R.A. 734, 97 Am. St. Rep. 513, 92 N. W. 956, it was held that an agent employed to exchange real estate, who is told by his principal that the amount received on the exchange must include all commissions to be received or claimed by such agent, is not liable to the principal for commissions received from the other party on making the exchange on the terms and for the price fixed by the principal.

pellant and respondents, by their joint motions, withdrew the cause from the jury. When the two motions were interposed, there being no conflict in the evidence as to any material fact, the parties in effect waived a verdict of the jury, and submitted the cause for determination by the trial judge, who was then authorized to enter such judgment as the evidence warranted; and we will on this appeal dispose of the case on the same theory. Knox v. Fuller, 23 Wash. 34, 44, 62 Pac. 131; Grigsby v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 5 S. D. 561, 59 N. W. 734.

The following facts appear from the evidence: That on February 18, 1907, the appellant, being the owner of certain improved real estate in Puyallup, entered into a written contract whereby she authorized the respondents to sell the same for $4,000, one-half cash, and agreed to pay them a commission of $150. That on or about April 29, 1907, one T. Shenkenberg approached the respondent John Mills with a proposition to buy the place for $4,500, paying $500 cash and the remainder in instalments. That thereafter Mills effected an arrangement with one J. H. Williams, by which he was to purchase the property from the appellant for $4,000 cash, and immediately sell to Shenkenberg for $4,500, payable in instalments. That, before seeing Williams, Mills placed Shenkenberg in possession of the property and accepted $50 from him as a deposit, with the understanding that, if he finally bought, it should apply on the purchase price, otherwise he was to become appellant's tenant, the deposit to be then applied on rent. That, after separate negotiations with Williams and Shenkenberg, the respondent John Mills went to Everett, where Mrs. Easterly lived. That he told her he could sell the place for $4,000, and effect an arrangement whereby the sale would be for cash, but that he could not sell for any larger sum. That, relying on these statements, appellant finally agreed to sell for $4,000, executed a deed to Williams reciting a consideration of $10, and on June 11, 1907, received from respondents a draft for $3,838, as proceeds of the sale, less commission and expenses incurred. Immediately thereafter a written contract of sale was executed by Williams to Shenkenberg for $4,500, which was antedated to April 29, 1907, the day upon which the original interview occurred between Shenkenberg and the respondent John Mills. Williams then paid respondents an additional commission of $150. The respondents did not inform the appellant that they could sell to Shenkenberg for $4,500, that they had placed Shenkenberg in possession, or that Williams was about to sell to Shenkenberg for $4,500 and pay them an additional commission of $150. In September, 1907, the appellant first learned of the sale to Shenkenberg, and commenced this action to recover the extra $500, less commission thereon. The respondents have shown that the appellant expressed herself as satisfied with the sale at the time it was closed, and that they were authorized by their written contract of employment to sell for $4,000. They contend that they could not sell for $4,500 and secure $2,000 cash; that the appellant at the time needed more money than the $500 cash payment Shenkenberg was willing and able to make; that they carried out appellant's specific instructions; that they first made the sale to Williams for appellant; and that, after their relation to her as agent had been thus terminated, they made the second sale to Shenkenberg.

These contentions are not fully sustained by the evidence; but, conceding them all to be true, and assuming that no fraud was intended, respondents nevertheless ignored and failed to perform duties which devolved upon them as appellant's agents. "The relation between a broker and his principal is a fiduciary one, calling for the exercise of the utmost good faith. It is the duty of the broker to serve his principal to the latter's best advantage, and all profits which are the result of the relation belong to the principal." 11 Current Law, 450, and cases cited. "A broker is not permitted to deal with the subject-matter of his agency for his own advantage, but must give the principal the benefit of any profit he may make in the transaction. Thus, where a broker employed to sell sells at a higher price than that authorized by the principal, or than that represented by the broker as the price received, or where a broker employed to purchase buys at a less price than that limited by or represented to the principal, he must account to his principal for the difference." 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 969. In Holmes v. Cathcart, 88 Minn. 213, 216, 60 L.R.A. 734, 97 Am. St. Rep. 513, 516, 92 N. W. 956, 957, the supreme court of Minnesota said: "The principal may authorize his agent to sell or exchange his property; but it does not necessarily follow that the agent, by carrying out the specific instructions given him, fully performs his duty, and is relieved from liability. He is bound to the exercise of the most perfect good faith, and to keep his principal informed of facts coming to his knowledge affecting his rights and interests. If, after receiving instructions to sell property on certain specified terms, the agent learns that other and more advantageous terms can be obtained, it is his plain duty, and he is under every legal and moral obligation, to communicate the facts to the principal, that he may act advisedly in the premises." If a real-estate broker sells for a price in advance of that stipulated by his principal, and fails to account to the latter or inform him of the true facts, he becomes liable to his principal for the excess. A broker is not entitled to realize any financial benefit in addition to his stipulated commission, as the result of secret negotiations which he conceals from his principal. Such profits in equity and justice belong to the principal, and some of the authorities hold that, if the agent realizes a profit from concealed negotiations, he must not only account to his principal therefor, but that he will forfeit his right to the stipulated commission. Jameson v. Kempton, 52 Wash. 106, 100 Pac. 186; Stearns v. Hochbrunn, 24 Wash. 206, 64 Pac. 165; De L'Archerie v. Rutherford, 54 Wash. 134, 102 Pac. 1033; Collins v. McClurg, 1 Colo. App. 348, 29 Pac. 299; Humphrey-Gibson Co. v. Robinson, 134 N. C. 432, 46 S. E. 953; Cotton v. Holliday, 59 Ill. 176; Jansen v. Williams, 36 Neb. 869, 20 L.R.A. 207, 55 N. W. 279; Eidson v. Saxon (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 957; Dodd v. Wakeman, 26 N. J. Eq. 484; Deter v. Jackson, 76 Kan. 568, 92 Pac. 546; Helberg v. Nichols, 149 Ill. 249, 37 N. E. 63.

Without regard to the respondents' intentions, they were at least guilty of a constructive fraud.

John Mills, the active partner, in part testified as follows:

Mr. Shenkenberg liked this place very much, and they decided to take it, if he could get it on his terms at $4,500. . . . We told Mr. Shenkenberg we could not sell it to him, that Mrs. Easterly would not sell it to him under those conditions, that she required half, or approximately half, cash. "But," I said, "it is possible we can get a third party to carry this title and sell it to you on these terms," and I took the deposit from him with the perfect understanding on his part that we might not be able to get the deal through at all. If we were not able to do that, we would either refund his money, or the money he paid would apply as rental. Mr. Shenkenberg thoroughly understood that. We had some of his money, and we had something to tie to, so that we went out and tried to find somebody that would take that title. . . . We finally found Mr. Williams, who, for the $500 bonus, was willing to buy this property, inasmuch as we had Mr. Shenkenberg in tow and could resell it for him immediately after for $4,500 on terms. Under these conditions Mr. Williams was willing to take the place, and did take the place. When we sold the place to Mr. Williams, we were acting for Mrs. Easterly. . . .

Q. Now, then, you may explain to the jury why that contract of sale was dated back until April, if you know.

A. I know exactly why. Money was hard to get, and our experience had shown that it was difficult to find a purchaser for that place, and, as an additional inducement to Mr. Williams, we told him that the interest on this contract would start back from the time that Mr. Shenkenberg made his deposit or to that day. Now, this was agreeable to Mr. Shenkenberg. We talked with him, and he was agreeable to that, and that brought the first annual payment of interest on Mr. Williams's contract that much nearer, and was an additional incentive to him to pay out the money and buy this place. . . . I will say that we were using every effort at our command to effect this sale for Mrs. Easterly, and after we had a tentative agreement with Mr. Shenkenberg, that was a very great help in that transaction. In fact, it would have been impossible to have gotten the deal through without the preliminary contract with Mr. Shenkenberg. . . . I told Mrs. Easterly the best we could do—the best sale we could make—was $4,000 cash, which was exactly the case. . . . The sale could not have gone through without the preliminary arrangement with Mr. Shenkenberg. . . .

Q. You got a commission from Mr. Williams for making that sale?

A. Part of a commission, yes. . . .

Q. You got your commission all right from Mrs. Easterly for making this sale?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Part of commission,—how much of a commission from Mr. Williams?

A. $150.

In Kingsley v. Wheeler, 95 Minn. 360, 104 N. W. 543, the court said: "An agent to sell land does not fulfil the measure of legal requirements by merely carrying out his specific instructions. He owes the duty of making a full, fair, and prompt disclosure of all facts affecting the principal's rights or interests, or pertaining to the sale of land by him. He is denied the right to profit at the expense of his principal by concealment of facts which he ought to have revealed. Whatever advantage accrues to him by violation of his duties, he must make good to his principal, whom he has wronged." Although it was their duty to do so, respondents never communicated to appellant the fact that they could sell to Shenkenberg for $4,500 on his terms. Had they done so, she, being thus advised, might have effected a more satisfactory and less expensive arrangement for realizing the cash which she then needed. She was at least entitled to the chance of doing so. Respondents had negotiated with Shenkenberg, and placed him in possession in contemplation of a sale for $4,500. As the result of their negotiations with him and Williams, they collected an additional commission of $150, of which appellant was ignorant. This they were not entitled to do, and any profit thus secretly earned by them must inure to her benefit. There is no evidence showing that Williams was in collusion with the respondents, or that he knew of their concealment of the actual facts from appellant. Although some courts have announced the rule that in cases of this kind the agent loses his right to a commission, we cannot apply any such rule here, as the appellant in her complaint has conceded respondents' right to the stipulated commission on the original sale. Their additional profit, realized from secret negotiations, was the $150 received from Williams without appellant's knowledge, and we now hold that they must account to appellant for that sum, she being entitled to a directed verdict therefor.

Respondents, as evidence of their good faith, contend that they conducted no negotiations for a sale to Shenkenberg until after their agency for the appellant had been terminated. There is no question, however, but that their original negotiations were with Shenkenberg, and that they would not have entered into any arrangement with Williams had they not relied on such original negotiations with Shenkenberg and the deposit of the $50 made by him, which they concealed from appellant. They were undoubtedly appellant's agents when dealing with Shenkenberg.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in favor of appellant for $150, with interest from June 11, 1907, and costs. The appellant will recover her costs in this court.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE W. REESE and Wife, Appts,
v.
SIMON P. WESTFIELD et al., Respts.

(56 Wash. 415, 105 Pac. 837.)

Land contract — forfeiture — return of instalments.

The vendor in a land contract providing for payment in instalments, and reserving the right of forfeiture for default, making time of the essence of the contract, may enforce the forfeiture for default in the last instalment, and retain the payments made, if he is not himself in default with respect to the contract obligations as to abstract of title and delivery of deed.

(December 18, 1909.)

Note. — Tender of deed or abstract of title as condition of enforcing forfeiture for failure of vendee to pay last instalment of purchase money.

REESE v. WESTFIELD makes a distinction between the right of the owner of land, who has contracted to give a deed or abstract on payment of the purchase price, to enforce a forfeiture where the default is made in payment of the last instalment, and where the default is in earlier instalments; and holds that tender of the deed or abstract and payment of the last instalment are dependent and concurrent, that the tender of the deed is as much a part of the contract as the payment of the last instalment, and hence, that the vendor cannot enforce a forfeiture without tender of performance on his part. But in the case of earlier instalments, the giving of the deed is independent of the payment of such earlier instalments, since to compel him to tender a deed before all payments are made would jeopardize his security.

In Mix v. Beach, 46 Ill. 311, the owner of land gave an obligation to convey it on payment of a specified sum in two instalments, which obligation contained the following clause: "And it is expressly agreed by and between the parties, that a non-fulfilment on the part of said . . . [vendee] in any part of the aforesaid undertaking shall operate as a complete forfeiture." The first instalment was paid when due, but not the second, nor was any deed tendered, as the vendor had not good title. Notwithstanding the comprehensive language of the forfeiture clause quoted above, it was held in an action by the vendee for specific performance that the vendor was not in a position to avail himself of it. The court said: "As a general rule, there must be mutuality in agreements to enable parties to place each other in default. Before . . . [the vendor] could urge that the holder of his obligation was in default on the last pay-

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William B. Bridgman, for appellants:

It is not necessary, in case of final payment not being paid at the time specified, that the vendor offer the vendee a deed and demand said final payment before declaring a forfeiture.

Messrs. Stephen E. Chaffee and Roberts & Udell, for respondents:

The vendor must tender a deed, and, in the case at bar, an abstract of title to the property sold to the vendee before he is entitled to receive the payment of the final instalment under the contract, and before he can declare a forfeiture or bring an action to cancel the contract, where time is of the essence of the contract.

ment, he should have been able and willing, if required, to comply with his part of the agreement. Had it been an intermediate instalment, it might have presented a different question. . . . The payment of the last instalment and the conveyance of the land were simultaneous and concurrent acts, and neither could demand a performance by the other, unless ready and willing to perform on his part. . . . Had . . . [the vendor] procured a conveyance and tendered a deed, or perhaps only notified . . . [the vendee] of the fact, and the latter had failed to make payment, then he would have been in default. The doctrine of equity is compensation, and not forfeiture."

In Kessler v. Pruitt, 14 Idaho, 175, 93 Pac. 965, under an agreement by which the owner of land was to furnish an abstract of title upon payment of the balance of the purchase price, the court held that, whether the agreement be regarded as a contract of sale or a mere option, the stipulations for the payment of the balance of the purchase price and the furnishing of the abstract were mutual, concurrent, and dependent, and that the purchaser, therefore, could not be put in default until the abstract had been tendered to him, and he had had an opportunity to examine it.

It would seem that there is no difference in principle between the necessity of the vendor tendering a deed before enforcing a forfeiture in case of default in payment of the last instalment, when there are several, and failure to pay the purchase money on time when it is a lump sum. Accordingly it has been held that where the vendor of land executes a bond for title, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

conditioned to make title upon payment of the purchase money, and the purchase money is not paid when due, the covenants are mutual and dependent, the payment of the money and the conveyance are to be concurrent acts, and hence the vendor cannot rescind without first tendering a deed. The following is a partial list of cases so holding, given for the light they throw on the main question: Arther v. Pearson, 32 Miss. 131; Cranwell v. Clinton Realty Co. 67 N. J. Eq. 540, 58 Atl. 1030; Leaird v. Smith, 44 N. Y. 618; Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 235; Gregg v. English, 38 Tex. 139; Mudgett v. Clay, 5 Wash. 110, 31 Pac. 424; Tacoma Water Supply Co. v. Dumermuth, 51 Wash. 609, 99 Pac. 741 (whether there is a forfeiture clause or not).

If, when the last instalment is past due, other instalments are also unpaid, the vendor cannot forfeit the contract unless a deed is tendered and payment demanded. Peck v. Brighton Co. 69 Ill. 200; Brentnall v. Marshall, 10 Kan. App. 488, 63 Pac. 93.

A purchaser of property to be paid for in instalments, where there is no time fixed for the delivery of the deed, is not entitled to receive his deed until the last payment is made; nor is a purchaser obliged to part with his money before he receives the deed. Gray v. Meek, 199 Ill. 136, 64 N. E. 1020 (see other cases there cited).

In Claude v. Richardson, 127 Iowa, 623, 103 N. W. 991, it was said that when a land contract provides for the payment of the balance of the purchase price upon the execution of a deed and abstract, neither party can put the other in default without a tender.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves only one question of law. In November, 1903, plaintiff George W. Reese entered into an agreement in writing, whereby he agreed to sell to defendant Simon P. Westfield certain lands at Sunnyside, in Yakima county. The contract was the usual time contract for the sale of lands, and provided for the payment of the purchase price in instalments; the last payment becoming due May 1, 1907. Defendants Milton and Door have succeeded to the interests of Westfield. A request for an extension of time was asked after the last payment had become due, but was refused. On October 1, 1907, a forfeiture was declared, and this action was begun to recover possession of the property. The contract contained the following clause: "Time is the essence of this contract, and in case of failure of the said party of the second part to make either of the payments or perform any of the covenants on his part, this contract shall be forfeited and determined at the election of the said party of the first part; and the said party of the second part shall forfeit all payments made by him on this contract, and such payments shall be retained by the said parties of the first part in full satisfaction and liquidation of all damages by them sustained; and they shall have the right to re-enter and take possession of said land and premises and every part thereof. The parties of the first part hereby agree to give an abstract of title to said lot, continued to the date of delivery of deed to second party." The court made, among others, the following finding: "That the two last payments above mentioned (being intermediate payments) were made subsequent to the time on which they became due, and were accepted by the plaintiffs." This forbearance, coupled with the time elapsing between the 1st of May, 1907, and the 1st day of October, 1907, might possibly bring this case within the rule of Douglas v. Hanbury, 56 Wash. 63, 104 Pac. 1110, but the facts are not before us, and for the sake of security in our judgment of the case, we have deemed it best to meet the main contention upon which appellant relies to defeat the judgment of the court below. The question is whether a forfeiture can be declared as against a purchaser who had met all payments under his contract except the last payment; when the contract provides for the giving of an abstract and delivery of the deed. Appellant seeks to distinguish the case of Stein v. Waddell, 37 Wash. 634, 80 Pac. 184, upon which he says the judgment of the lower court was based, saying: "In the case of Stein v. Waddell, the seller had accepted a portion of that last payment which was in default after default was made, and then a few days later declared the forfeiture." But the decision in that case was not made to depend alone upon the payment of a part of the last instalment. It rested in the stronger equity that the agreement to tender a deed was mutual, concurrent, and dependent upon the payment of the last instalment due on the purchase price. This rule was there said to be firmly established by the authorities. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 686, 687. Such contracts are mutual and dependent when it appears that the payment and delivery of the deed are to be made at the same time. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 689.

It is contended that the broad rule laid down in Stein v. Waddell was explained by the later cases. Voight v. Fidelity Invest. Co. 49 Wash. 612, 96 Pac. 162; Garvey v. Barkley, 56 Wash. 24, 104 Pac. 1108, and Sleeper v. Bragdon, 45 Wash. 562, 88 Pac. 1036. In the first case it was pointed out that there was no obligation to tender a deed until all the payments had been made, and that the last payment was not due until two years after the commencement of the action to forfeit the contract. The point here involved was not before the court. In the second case the purchaser had wholly failed to perform the conditions of his contract, and forfeiture had been promptly asserted. In Sleeper v. Bragdon the purchaser had made default and obtained an extension under an understanding that, if payment was not made within the time given, the forfeiture would be insisted upon. She was notified in advance that the vendor had elected to forfeit the contract, and she knew that, by her own act in failing to meet the extended payment, the cancelation of the contract was completed, and that she was not entitled to any further consideration or notice. Notwithstanding this, she sought to tender the amount due, and demanded performance. The court held, and properly, considering the facts of the particular case, that her rights had ceased. The cases really in line with the case of Stein v. Waddell are Bruggemann v. Converse, 47 Wash. 581, 92 Pac. 429, and Tacoma Water Supply Co. v. Dumermuth, 51 Wash. 609, 99 Pac. 741. In the first case it was said: "The appellants, not having complied with the requirements of the contract in tendering a deed which was, by the terms of the agreement, made a condition precedent to receiving the purchase price, will not be heard to complain that the other party to the contract has violated its conditions." In the latter case, after citing Stein v. Waddell and other cases, the court said: "Under the above authorities, the respondents could only claim a forfeiture and put the appellant in default by tendering a deed and demanding payment of the purchase price, and this they failed to do." If the case of Stein v. Waddell and the succeeding cases to which we have referred have been hitherto misunderstood, we desire now, for the sake of certainty, to lay down the rule that where land is sold under a time contract calling for payment by instalments, and every instalment has been paid except the last one, the vendor may, if he act with reasonable promptness, declare a forfeiture, unless by the terms of the contract he has agreed to perform some act necessary to the complete performance of his agreement; as, for instance, the giving of an abstract or the tender of a deed, in which event his power to forfeit depends upon his offer and ability to perform; for, as this court has said, his duty to tender performance depends upon, and is concurrent with, the duty of the vendee to meet the final payment. While we admit that the conditions providing for forfeiture in contracts of this character are usually held to be for the benefit of the vendor, and we have been hitherto, and are now, willing to give the vendor the full benefit of all the conditions of his contract, and say that all payments prior to the last payment are conditions precedent, we have no sympathy with the holding of some courts to the effect that the whole duty is upon the purchaser, and, unless he tenders the last payment, the vendor is entirely released from any obligation to convey or tender conveyance. The covenants are independent so long as no duty is imposed on the vendor, but if any covenant puts both parties to action and concurs in time, it must be held to be dependent and concurrent. It seems that the logical sequence of the rule allowing a forfeiture for intermediate payments without tender of performance is that the last payment should not be forthcoming until the abstract and deed are tendered, when it is so provided in the contract; for it is primary law that a failure of title will relieve the vendee. Warvelle, Vendors, 813.

There is nothing in the assertion that any other rule will interfere with, or destroy, or invite a breach of, the contract as 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the parties have made it. What we have undertaken to show is that a tender of performance, when stipulated in the agreement, as well as a tender of payment, is a part of the contract. The two engagements make the contract. The one is dependent on the other.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

McGRAW OIL & GAS COMPANY et al.
v.

R. W. KENNEDY et al., Appts.

(65 W. Va. 595, 64 S. E. 1027.)

Gas — lease — forfeiture.

1. A lease for oil and gas is for five years, "and as long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced by the party of the second part." The lessor cannot forfeit it because he thinks the gas not in paying quantity; the lessee claiming that it is, and willing to pay the sum stipulated for the well. It is for the lessee to say whether the gas is in paying quantity, acting in good faith.

Same — failure to market.

2. When a producing gas well is developed, but its product not marketed, that fact does not authorize the lessor to forfeit the lease; the lessee being willing to pay the agreed sum for a gas well.

Same — failure to drill additional wells.

3. An oil and gas lease cannot be canceled in equity only for failure to drill additional wells.

Same — estate created.

4. Under the lease in this case, a well producing gas is drilled, and the lessee elects to consider it in paying quantity. An estate has thus vested in him.

A PPEAL by R. W. Kennedy, the Crystal Ice Company, and the South Penn Oil Company, from a decree of the Circuit Court for Taylor County in consolidated cross suits to cancel two leases of different date of the same oil and gas lands, each of which was alleged to constitute a cloud on title as to the other; R. W. Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company complaining of so much of the decree as dismissed their bill filed to cancel the lease of later date, and the South Penn Oil Company complaining of so much as sustained a demurrer to its cross bill filed to obtain the same relief. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. F. Bailey and Davis & Davis, for appellants Kennedy and Crystal Ice Company:

The discovery of gas in paying quantities, under the original lease, converted the lessee's estate from a mere right to search, into a vested estate in the oil and gas underlying the land, with the right in them and their assigns to extract the same at their pleasure.

of parties under an ordinary contract or lease of land to be searched and developed for oil and gas after either or both of these minerals have been found and produced, and such rights prior to development and production. In the latter case the right of the licensee or lessee is inchoate, and no estate in the land is vested in him, while in the former case the finding and production of either of these minerals gives the lessor a vested leasehold estate in the leased premises. This distinction is of importance as affecting the right of the lessor to the aid of equity to forfeit or cancel an oil or gas lease for breach of condition express or implied. Where the right is inchoate and no leasehold estate is vested, courts of equity are inclined to enforce the forfeiture of a contract or lease of this character for the failure of the lessee or licensee to comply substantially with the express conditions thereof, and in many jurisdictions also for a failure to comply substantially with conditions implied from the nature of the lease, the character of the mineral, and other circumstances. This line of cases has no important bearing upon the right of the lessor in such a lease to enforce forfeiture of the same for breach of condition, express or implied, after discovery and production of oil or gas by the lessee. Under such circumstances the right of the lessor to forfeit the lease for breach of any of its conditions, unless such right is expressly given, is generally denied, at least, where there is an adequate remedy by action for damages for the breach.

This note does not deal with the general question as to forfeiture, but it is limited to the right of the lessor to enforce a forfeiture of such a lease for failure of the lessee to market the product after discovery and production. There is a distinction as to the right of the lessor to have the product marketed where gas has been discovered rather than oil. Undoubtedly as to either of these minerals it is competent for the lessee to contract expressly that the lease shall be forfeited for failure to market the product, but where the lease does not contain an express provision authorizing the forfeiture for breach of an express or implied agreement by the lessee to market the product, a distinction exists between the rights of the parties where forfeiture is sought for failure to market gas and for failure to market oil. In the absence of an express forfeiture clause for breach of agreement to market the product, generally no implied agreement authorizing a forfeiture for the failure to market either of these minerals arises where the premises are located in what is termed "wild cat territory," where there are no pipe lines and no means to market the product. As to gas, however, even where there are pipe lines and a market for the product, ability to market depends considerably upon the volume and pressure, and though gas may exist in large quantities, yet if, by reason of over-development or for any other cause, the flow is not sufficiently strong to insure its transportation, the failure to market would not be a ground for forfeiture. In this connection it should be remembered that a number of gas wells are usually connected with the same pipe line for transportation to the consumer, and no well can be connected with the pipe if the pressure is below the average.

As remarked by the court in Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co. 72 C. C. A. 213, 140 Fed. 801: "It is only to the end that the oil and gas shall be extracted with benefit or profit to both that reasonable diligence is required. Whether or not in any particular instance such diligence is exercised depends upon a variety of circumstances, such as

Whether the gas was in paying quantities or not is a question left to the judgment of the lessee, and the quantity discovered is not material in deciding whether any estate vested under the lease.

Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 505, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433.

The remedy of the lessor when a sufficient number of wells are not drilled is not a forfeiture of the lease, but an action for damages, unless the contract itself otherwise clearly specifies.

Ammons v. South Penn Oil Co.; Harness v. Eastern Oil Co.; Core v. New York Petroleum Co.; and Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co.,—supra.

There can be no abandonment of a lease without both the intention to abandon and an actual relinquishment of the leased premises.

Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 500, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433.

the quantity of oil and gas capable of being produced from the premises, as indicated by prior exploration and development, the local market or demand therefor or the means of transporting them to market, the extent and results of the operations, if any, on adjacent lands, the character of the natural reservoir,—whether such as to permit the drainage of a large area by each well,—and the usages of the business. Whatever, in the circumstances, would be reasonably expected of operators of ordinary prudence, having regard to the interests of both lessor and lessee, is what is required. A plain and substantial disregard of this requirement constitutes a breach of the covenant for the exercise of reasonable diligence."

In Poe v. Ulrey, 233 Ill. 56, 84 N. E. 46, it was held not to be a ground for forfeiture that a lessee of an oil and gas lease did not continue to develop land and market oil or gas therefrom, where the land was not located in the vicinity of a pipe line into which oil or gas might be delivered.

But where the only rental or benefit accruing to lessor from the lease is a royalty based upon the quantity of oil or gas produced and marketed, inability to market this product has been held not to be an excuse where abandonment by the lessee for failure to operate and market is claimed.

An interesting case in which it is so held is Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 501, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433. There the lessees under an oil and gas lease abandoned the same after completing two oil wells, which they only partially operated, left the oil in a tank to be marketed, so that it went to waste, and allowed the derrick and other parts of the rigging to decay. The court said: "It is argued that there were no pipe lines nearer than 10 miles to convey oil, and 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The mere failure to market off the premises the gas from the well in question constitutes no evidence whatever of its abandonment.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hugh Evans, on September 20, 1899, leased a tract of 528 acres of land in Taylor county to U. S. Ditman and J. C. Gawthrop for production of oil and gas. The lease provided that Evans have free of charge gas for use in his residence; the lease to continue for the term of five years "and so long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced therefrom by the party of the second part, heirs, executors, ad-that the company made fruitless efforts to get the Eureka Pipe Line Company to extend a line to that section. This would put in the lease a condition for excuse not in it. The first lease gave Metz not a cent of return except a share of oil. His motive in making it was therefore only development. It is not reasonable, but unjust, that an oil company should thus bore two wells, discontinue work, remove implements, do nothing for a year, give plain sign of no intent to go on, and yet hold Metz's land tied up. How long would it remain bound up so as to prevent him from contracting with others to develop? True, this may not alone show intent to abandon; but it tends to show that we ought not demand any more evidence than is manifest in the case to establish abandonment. If, as is claimed now for the purpose of this case, oil in paying quantity was found, where did the company get the right to indefinitely suspend, and not pay Metz his share of oil? Not from the lease. His right was to have the well worked or surrendered."

In Indiana the rule has been asserted that while forfeitures are usually against conscience and without equity, and courts of chancery will ordinarily refuse to relieve in such cases, yet an exception to the rule exists where it is against equity to permit a party longer to assert his title.

In Gadbury v. Ohio, & I. Consol. Natural & Illuminating Gas Co. 162 Ind. 9, 62 L.R.A. 895, 67 N. E. 259, where the grantee of oil and gas rights who by the terms of the contract was required to pay $100 each year for the product of each gas well while the same was being used off the premises, after completing a well and discovering gas in paying quantities, closed the well and declined to market the gas, the court, after holding that there was an implied condition ministrators, or assigns." The lease deed provided that the lessee deliver into pipe line to the credit of Evans one eighth of oil produced and pay $200 yearly for "each gas well the product from which is marketed and used off the premises." The lease provided that the lessees drill a well within twelve months or pay thereafter $132 quarterly until one should be drilled. No well having been drilled within twelve months, the sum of $132 was paid Evans, extending the lease to December 20, 1900. Before the 20th of December the Southern Oil Company, under some agreement with Ditman and Gawthrop, drilled a well and produced gas in December, 1900. The casing was drawn from the well, and the well prepared for use by the insertion of a wall packer and 1,400 feet of tubing, and a cap at the top, with a gate through which the gas could be removed. This was done to save all gas. Tests of the gas produced in the well were made at various times; the tests varying in quantity from 331,700 to 1,140,500 cubic feet. No gas from the well was marketed; but it was closed so as to save the gas from waste. The Southern Oil Company sold its interest in the well to the South Penn Oil Company, and then Ditman and Gawthrop assigned the lease to the South Penn Oil Company. Later the South Penn Company assigned the estate in the gas to the Hope Natural Gas Company, reserving the estate in the oil. Later the Hope Natural Gas Company assigned the gas right to R. W. Kennedy to hold in trust for the Crystal Ice Company, a corporation engaged in manufacturing ice in the city of Grafton. The well was bought to give fuel to this and other plants, and a franchise from Taylor county and Grafton to lay pipes from the well to the plant was obtained by the ice company. This was subsequent to develop the property, further held that it was a proper case for a court of equity to enforce a forfeiture by a decree quieting the owner's title, in view of the facts that the gas might be withdrawn through wells on other land, that specific performance could not be enforced, that the completion of the well cut off liquidated damages expressly stipulated for in the event of noncompletion, and that there was no measure of damages available in an action at law, since the damages, while substantial, would be speculative.

And in Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co. supra, it was said that even if there was no express engagement upon the part of the lessee to operate the well and market the product if oil or gas were found in paying quantities, yet an intention so to do would be implied from an engagement to pay royalties to be gauged according to the production of oil or gas; the rule being that whatever is necessary to the accomplishment of that which is expressly contracted to be done is part and parcel of the contract, though not specified. This implied condition being necessary to give effect to the express terms of the lease, it would come within the purview of a forfeiture provision of the lease authorizing its forfeiture by the lessor for the breach by the lessee of any of the mentioned conditions. The court said: "The conclusion is that compliance with the covenant to continue with reasonable diligence a work of exploration, development, and production after the expiration of the five-year period if during that time oil and gas, one or both, be found in paying quantities, is by the terms employed made a condition the breach of which entitles the lessor to avoid the lease."

But it has been held not to be a ground for forfeiture for a lessee to hold onto his lease and fail to so operate the premises as to produce reasonable results, where the lease contained an express provision for forfeiture for breach of certain conditions, which did not include a right to forfeit for breach of an implied condition reasonably to operate the premises. Harri v. Ohio Oil Co. 57 Ohio St. 118, 48 N. E. 502.

A gas lease containing a provision that it shall remain in force so long as the lessee diligently develops the land and markets the product becomes inoperative and of no effect where the lessee, after having drilled and developed a gas well containing sufficient gas to market, does not market same, although he had an opportunity so to do, also fails to further develop the premises, but drills and completes gas wells upon adjoining premises and markets the product therefrom. Buffalo Valley Oil & Gas Co. v. Jones, 75 Kan. 18, 88 Pac. 537.

Where, however, an oil and gas lease is "for and during the term of two years, or as much longer as oil and gas are found in paying quantities or the hereinafter described rental is paid," the lessor is not entitled to terminate the lease because gas or oil have not been found in paying quantities, where the lessee has completed a well containing a large volume of gas, which, however, he does not market, where he complies with the lease by paying the agreed rental. Summerville v. Apollo Gas Co. 207 Pa. 334, 56 Atl. 876. The court said: "It may be that for some time the lessee was not able to find a purchaser for the gas, but that was not the affair of the lessors; they were not interested in the proceeds of the sale of the gas. Their rights under the agreement extended only to the receipt of a stipulated annual rental for each well, and the free use of gas for domestic purposes. Beyond this, the question of whether or not the quantity of gas was profitable, was for the decision of the lessee. It may be that the final disposition of the product of the well was such as to amply remunerate it for the delay in finding a market."

under the authority of the directors of the ice company, and the purchase money was paid out of its treasury. The well was in "wild cat territory." There was no pipe line near it. When the well was drilled, Evans, the lessor, piped gas from it to his residence, and has ever since used the gas for his domestic purposes. He received $132 for failure to drill the first year, and after the well was drilled he received seven payments of $200 each, the annual payments stipulated for each gas well. He was tendered the $200 for the year ending December 20, 1907, but refused to receive it. On March 20, 1907, Evans leased the same tract to the McGraw Oil & Gas Company. The latter company had full notice of the first lease, when it leased, and notice was served on it by Kennedy of his claim of title, and warning the McGraw Oil & Gas Company and John T. McGraw not to go on the premises, and warning them that, if they should produce oil or gas on the land, Kennedy would claim for the same. Notwithstanding this notice, the McGraw Company entered and drilled a well producing gas. The McGraw Company brought a chancery suit against Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company to declare the lease made by Evans to Ditman and Gawthrop forfeited and cancel it as a cloud upon its title under the second lease. Later Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company brought a chancery suit against the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, the South Penn Company, and Evans, setting up the first lease,—that from Evans to Ditman and Gawthrop,—claiming under it title paramount to that conferred by the second lease,—that from Evans to the McGraw Oil & Gas Company,—and to cancel the latter lease as a cloud upon the title conferred by the first lease, and to make the McGraw Company responsible for gas taken from the premises. The South Penn Company filed in the case of the Crystal Ice Company an answer, containing also cross bill matter against the McGraw Company, Evans, and others, seeking to have declared void as to the first lease the lease from Evans to the McGraw Company. The cases were heard together, and a decree was pronounced, sustaining a demurrer to the cross bill of the South Penn Company, and dismissing the bill filed by Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company, and canceling the right of Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company, and enjoining them from asserting any right against the McGraw Company, and from doing anything to interfere with or prevent the McGraw Company from developing and using the land for gas. The Crystal Ice Company, Kennedy, and the South Penn Oil Company appeal.

It cannot be said that the first lease is forfeited by any express forfeiture clause found in it. The theory of the McGraw Company is that such a lease confers no vested estate in oil or gas in the earth, but at most confers only a right to search for oil and gas, and that only when oil or gas shall be found in paying quantity and marketed does any estate vest in the lessee, and that no estate ever vested under the first lease, because the gas found was not in paying quantity. This lease does not limit its term by requiring that oil or gas shall be found in paying quantity, as leases usually do. It says that the lease shall endure "five years from this date and as long thereafter as oil and gas, or either of them, is produced therefrom by the party of the second part." So this lease contains nothing in terms allowing the lessor to end it because oil or gas is not found in paying quantity; and, if there were such provision, I should regard it as made in the interest of the lessee to protect him from payment of the annual sum for a gas well, if insufficient in quantity, and not as intended to give the lessor right to terminate the lease against the lessee's will, he treating the quantity as sufficient and electing to pay. What right has Evans to say that no estate vested by reason of insufficiency of gas, when the lease makes no such provision, and the lessee chooses to regard it as sufficient and pay as if it were? And again it has been held, even when such a clause is in the lease, that it is with the lessee to say whether the product is in paying quantity. Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 501, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433; Thornton, Petroleum & Gas, § 119. So held in Summerville v. Apollo Gas Co. 207 Pa. 334, 56 Atl. 876, and by Judge Goff in Kellar v. Craig, 61 C. C. A. 366, 126 Fed. 630; Young v. Forest Oil Co. 194 Pa. 243, 45 Atl. 121, is notable for this construction of such a clause. It says that the operator has election to say whether it will pay. It is useless to argue that a lease does not vest right to oil and gas in place, and therefore no right vests of any character, if the quantity is too small to pay. No one says that the lease carries title to these minerals, even after a paying well has revealed them; but an estate, a right of value then vests, that is, right to retain possession of the land for operation and to go on to sever the minerals from the land and convert them into personalty. When this well was found, the lessee had right, if he chose, to keep possession and pay the annual rental. He had a vested right. Evans was only entitled to the rental. Title vested. He gets the same pay as if the well produced a larger quantity. There is really no evidence that it was not a paying well. The cross bill alleges that it was, and this is to be taken as true on demurrer. Evans for seven years so treated it, for he received seven annuals of $200, knowing that the gas was not being marketed, knowing the status of the well. Though the gas was not marketed, the well was being used to comply with the lessee's covenant to furnish Evans gas for his use. The law is that "the right to declare a forfeiture must be distinctly reserved, that the proof of the happening of the event on which the right is to be exercised must be clear, that the party entitled to do so must exercise his right promptly." Thompson v. Christie, 138 Pa. 230, 11 L.R.A. 236, 20 Atl. 934. Will equity allow Evans to wait and wait, drawing large sums of money yearly, and then at the eleventh hour suddenly forfeit? Is he not estopped? Such acceptance of money by Evans, knowing all the facts, is forcible against him as an estoppel in a court of equity. Hukill v. Myers, 36 W. Va. 639, 15 S. E. 151. As to the suit by the McGraw Company, it is virtually, really, a suit in equity to enforce a forfeiture. Equity will not take affirmative, active steps to enforce a forfeiture. Pheasant v. Hanna, 63 W. Va. 613, 60 S. E. 618, where the subject is discussed by Judge Poffenbarger. So held in Pyle v. Henderson, 65 W. Va. 39, 63 S. E. 762. That clause in the lease by which the lessees were to pay $200 yearly for each gas well "the product from which is marketed and used off the premises" was designed to protect the lessee from demand unless he marketed the gas. It is not a stipulation to market or give up. That is for the lessee's protection, and that has been waived and royalty paid. Moreover, there is evidence going to show that the gas was, in fact, in paying quantity.

Title having vested, the lease contains no clause that forfeits it. It is argued not definitely, but virtually, that failure to drill other wells forfeits. We have frequently held that, where there is no express provision requiring additional wells, but only an implied one, this will not forfeit. Core v. New York Petroleum Co. 52 W. Va. 276, 43 S. E. 128; Kellar v. Craig, supra. I have never been reconciled to the doctrine that for failure to drill additional wells the lessor must sue at law for damages, and equity will not cancel unless for draining from nearby territory, and thus exhaust oil in the leasehold involved. I have asked: How many actions must the landlord bring? How can damages be measured? How can we see into the depth of the earth? But it has been so held. The reason is that equity will not, as a rule, enforce a forfeiture of an estate. It will not especially insert such a clause when the parties have not inserted it, especially when they did insert forfeiture for failure to drill or pay commutation, but did not insert forfeiture for failure to drill additional wells. As to duty to drill additional wells for gas, the Pennsylvania supreme court has held, practically, that it does not exist in gas as in case of oil, because of the difference. A small oil well can be used; a gas well of slight pressure will not enter the gas line. McKnight v. Manufacturers' Natural Gas Co. 146 Pa. 185, 28 Am. St. Rep. 790, 23 Atl. 164. That was for both oil and gas, but development seemed to show the section to be gas territory, as in this case; but we express no opinion as to this. We only say there can be no forfeiture for mere failure to drill more wells.

It is argued that failure to market the gas forfeits the lease. So it was claimed in Summerville v. Apollo Gas Co. 207 Pa. 334, 56 Atl. 876, as to a lease for two years "and as much longer as oil and gas are found in paying quantities," and the court said that the lessor had no right to forfeit at the end of two years because during that time no oil or gas had been marketed. "It may be that for some time the lessee was not able to find a purchaser for the gas, but that was not the affair of the lessors. They were not interested in the proceeds of the sale of the gas. Their rights under the agreement extended only to the receipt of a stipulated annual rental for each well, and the free use of gas for domestic purposes. Beyond this the question of whether or not the quantity of gas was profitable was for the decision of the lessee. It may be that the final disposition of the product of the well was such as to amply remunerate it for the delay in finding a market." There is no evidence that the well was not in paying volume.

Is it claimed that the well and lease have been abandoned? As said in Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 506, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 434; "The loss of valuable property by mere abandonment is not easily shown or readily held by the courts." To constitute abandonment by the lessee of a lease for oil, there must be both an intention to abandon, and an actual relinquishment of the leased premises. Sult v. A. Hochstetter Oil Co. 63 W. Va. 317, 61 S. E. 307, says the tenant must quit and the landlord take possession to work abandonment. Abandonment is not only not established, but plainly negatived, in this case. The lessees paid, and Evans received, for seven years, the rental money for the well. The lessees tendered for the year 1907. The leasehold was assessed with taxes to Kennedy. The lessee put in the well 1,500 feet of tubing, wall packer, and casing head. The lease was at different times conveyed from one to another as an existing lease. The Grafton Ice Company in December, 1904, paid $1,000 for the lease, and made preparation to pipe the gas from the well to Grafton to its ice manufactory. They have cared for the well, blown and tested it, and never been out of possession; nor has Evans ever tried to expel that company from his premises. He says he never hindered it from going on the premises to attend to the well, and that "they always had that right."

Therefore we reverse the decree, and dismiss the bill filed by the McGraw Company, and we decree that the lease in the record specified, dated the 20th day of March, 1907, from Hugh Evans and wife to the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, be canceled, annulled, and set aside as to the rights of the Crystal Ice Company, Robert M. Kennedy, the South Penn Oil Company, and all other parties having rights derived under and by virtue of the lease in the record specified, dated the 20th day of September, 1899, made by Hugh Evans and wife to U. S. Ditman and J. C. Gawthrop; and this cause is remanded to the Circuit Court of Taylor County for further proceedings.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

v.

WILLIAM GIBSON, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 68 S. E. 295.)

Indictment — cutting and wounding — specification of instrument.

1. An indictment for malicious cutting and wounding, with intent to maim, disfigure, and kill, need not specify the instrument with which the injury was inflicted.

Criminal law — "wound" — what constitutes — weapon.

2. To constitute a "wound" within the meaning of § 9, chap. 144, Code 1906, an injury must have been inflicted with a weapon other than any of those with which the human body is provided by nature, and must include a complete parting or solution of the external or internal skin.

Evidence — indictment — assault with intent to kill — malicious cutting and wounding — proof.

3. Though said statute makes it a felony for a person maliciously to cause another bodily injury by any means, with intent to maim, disfigure, or kill him, an indictment charging only malicious cutting and wounding with such intent is not broad enough to let in proof of such injury inflicted otherwise than by cutting or wounding.

Indictment — assault with intent to kill — means of injury.

4. An indictment for maliciously or unlawfully causing bodily injury otherwise than by shooting, stabbing, cutting, or wounding, should specify the means by which the injury was caused.

Trial — criminal prosecution — presence to accused — presumptions.

5. The presumption of the continuance of a fact or state of things shown to exist applies to a record showing the presence of a prisoner in court at the commencement of each day's proceedings in the trial.

Appeal — admission of hearsay evidence — harmless error.

6. Admission of hearsay evidence without objection and exception affords no ground for complaint in the appellate court.

Same — exclusion of proper testimony — subsequent admission.

7. Error in sustaining an objection to a

Note. — Internal hemorrhage as evidence of statutory wounding.

There is but little authority upon this question. The decision in the foregoing case is supported by R. v. Jones, 3 Cox, C. C. 441, where it was held that evidence of a violent kick inflicted upon the body of a woman, followed by a flow of blood mingled with urine, would not sustain an indictment charging "wounding," where there was no evidence as to the precise part or parts of the body from which the blood came.

As is stated in STATE v. GIBSON, the rule is that, in criminal cases, there can be no statutory "wounding" unless the skin is broken. Moriarty v. Brooks, 6 Car. & P. 684; R. v. Wood, 4 Car. & P. 381; State v. Leonard, 22 Mo. 450; State v. Nieuhaus, 217 Mo. 332, 117 S. W. 73. A wound is any injury breaking the skin. Shaddock v. Alpine Pl. Road Co. 79 Mich. 7, 44 N. W. 158. And a breaking of the cuticle or outer skin only is not a wounding. Com. v. Gallagher, 6 Met. 565; R. v. M'Loughlin, 8 Car. & P. 635.

But it seems that it is not necessary that the external skin be broken. Thus, in R. v. Waltham, 3 Cox, C. C. 442, it was held that a violent kick in the private parts of a man, causing the internal membranous lining of the urethra to break and bleed, was a wounding, although the external skin was not broken. And in R. v. Smith, 8 Car. & P. 173, the breaking of the internal skin of the mouth was held to be a wounding.

The difficulty in both STATE v. GIBSON and R. v. Jones, supra, was, apparently, not that evidence of internal bleeding will not satisfy a charge of wounding if it results from the assault, but, rather, there was no proof that the internal bleeding was the result of the assault. It might have resulted from some other cause.

proper question is cured by admitting an answer to another question covering the same subject-matter.

(May 17, 1910.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Pocahontas County to review a judgment convicting defendant of unlawfully wounding. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. C. McNeill and Price, Osen-ton, & McPeak, for plaintiff in error:

A wound is an injury to the person by which the skin is broken or cut.

30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1296; Com. v. Gallagher, 6 Met. 568; State v. Leonard, 22 Mo. 450.

Messrs. William G. Conley, Attorney General, and D. E. Matthews for the State.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon an indictment for feloniously and maliciously wounding one Cleveland Slavin, the plaintiff in error, William Gibson, was convicted of the milder offense of unlawful wounding, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for a period of five years. On the writ of error allowed him, he makes a number of assignments of error.

Gibson and several others were employed in a mill at Dunlevie, West Virginia. Practical joking was a custom among these men. Slavin, without the knowledge of Gibson, put oil on the handle of the latter's oil can, so that, in picking it up, his hand became greasy. He also oiled an iron bar used by Gibson. Having ascertained from the other men who had played the prank on him, Gibson began to throw oil on Slavin's back, and, when he turned around, threw it in his face. Thereupon Slavin threw a stick at Gibson, who responded with another, which broke in two. Slavin returned a piece of this stick. Then Gibson threw an iron bar at him, which struck him on the right side of the back over the kidney, injuring him to such an extent that he was confined to his bed for two weeks or more, and his bladder had to be relieved, by artificial means, of the urine, which, when extracted, was found to be bloody.

The sufficiency of the indictment is challenged because it omits designation of the instrument with which the wound was inflicted. This assignment of error is not well taken. The indictment need not set forth or describe the instrument. Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510; Canada v. Com. 22 Gratt. 899; Jackson v. Com. 90 Va. 107, 30 S. E. 452; Erle's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 133; State v. Ladd, 2 Swan, 226.

As the evidence fails to show any solution or breaking of the skin of the prosecuting witness, lack of an essential element of the offense charged in the indictment is asserted, under the technical rule that there can be no wound, within the meaning of the maiming statute, without a solution or fracture of the skin. This position seems to be well sustained by authority. There must be a complete breaking of the skin, external or internal. Our statute (§ 9, chap. 144, Code 1906), in so far as it uses the terms "stab, cut or wound," is the same as the English statute of 9 Geo. IV., and the term "wound" in that connection has been limited in its meaning to the extent above stated. R. v. Wood, 4 Car. & P. 381. In order to inflict a wound within the meaning of that statute, it was necessary to use an instrument of some sort, wherefore it was not effected by biting off a finger, nose, or ear, or causing any other injury with the teeth or hands. R. v. Jennings, 2 Lewin, C. C. 130; Elmsly's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 126; R. v. Stevens, 1 Moody, C. C. 409; R. v. Harris, 7 Car. & P. 446. But the instrument need not be a sharp or pointed one. Anything with which the skin is broken is sufficient, though blunt, provided it is a weapon other than those with which the human body is naturally provided. R. v. Smith, 8 Car. & P. 173; R. v. Withers, 1 Moody, C. C. 294; R. v. Hughes, 2 Car. & P. 420; R. v. Sheard, 2 Moody, C. C. 13, 7 Car. & P. 846; R. v. Payne, 4 Car. & P. 558; R. v. Briggs, 1 Moody, C. C. 318. But a fluid working injury not by the force of its contact, but only by its effect when applied to the body, was not regarded as a weapon, wherefore a wound inflicted by throwing oil of vitriol in the face was not within the statute. R. v. Murrow, 1 Moody, C. C. 456; Henshall's Case, 2 Lewin C. C. 135. For these principles, see the following additional authority: 1 Russell, Crimes, 3d Eng. ed. 731; Bishop Statutory Crimes, 314; State v. Leonard, 22 Mo. 449, 450; Com. v. Gallagher, 6 Met. 565, 568.

Our statute has been broadened somewhat by the use of the term, "or by any means cause him bodily injury with intent," etc. Under a proper indictment, any sort of bodily injury, inflicted by any means, with intent to maim, disfigure, or kill, is an offense under this statute, punishable as a malicious or unlawful wounding; but it is not a technical wounding, and an indictment merely for cutting and wounding does not cover it. This addition to the statute does not alter the meaning of its original terms. It simply introduces a new offense, made up of new elements. The indictment in this case charges that the prisoner cut and wounded the prosecuting witness, with the intent to maim, disfigure, and kill, thereby causing him great bodily injury. There is no averment of any bodily injury caused otherwise than by cutting and wounding. Under it, therefore, no other sort of injury can be proved. The indictment gives no notice of intent to charge any other malicious or unlawful act.

Admitting lack of proof of any fracture of the external skin, the attorney general is forced to the contention that the presence of blood in the urine justifies an inference of fracture of the covering or skin of the kidney, there being some authority for the position that the solution of an inner lining of any portion of the body constitutes a wound. In R. v. Smith, supra, it was held that a blow on the face with a hammer, breaking the lower jaw and parting the internal skin, was sufficient. Two cases, R. v. Waltham, 3 Cox, C. C. 442, and R. v. Jones, 3 Cox, C. C. 441, are cited, in Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 314, as holding that the parting of the membrane lining of the urethra constitutes an offense; but these two reports are not in our library, for which reason we are unable to see what the evidence was. The fracture may have been shown by positive and direct evidence. It was susceptible of proof in that way in the case of the broken jaw, and may have been in the other two cases. Here we have nothing but a mere uncertain inference, arising from the presence of blood in the urine. We think this is too remote and uncertain to sustain a verdict.

The next important assignment of error is the omission from the record of any plea and joinder of issue. After the writ of error was allowed by this court, an attempt was made to cure this by the entry of a nunc pro tunc order, showing that, before the jury was impaneled and sworn, the defendant had entered his plea of not guilty, and placing the same upon the record as of the 7th day of October, 1909, the date of the trial. Upon what evidence the entry of such plea before the trial was ascertained, the record does not show. The defendant objected to the entry of the order, but did not take any bill of exceptions showing the character of evidence upon which it was made, nor in any way place such evidence upon the record. Hence the action of the court, in entering the order, does not seem to have been objected to on account of the insufficiency of the evidence. The court having had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, there is a presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment. McClure-Mabie Lumber Co. v. Brooks, 46 W. Va. 732, 34 S. E. 921; Griffith v. Corrothers, 42 W. Va. 59, 24 S. E. 569; Reed v. Nixon, 36 W. Va. 681, 15 S. E. 416; Rams- berg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 787; Harris v. Lewis, 5 W. Va. 575. For aught that appears in the record here, there may have been a formal plea of not guilty in the file of papers or a minute of its entry upon the clerk's docket. The only inquiry, therefore, is whether the court had power, after the end of the term at which the judgment was rendered and after the allowance of a writ of error by this court, to enter such an order. It was a mere interlocutory order, placing upon the record what had actually transpired, by way of amendment, to sustain the judgment. Both reason and authority sustain the action of the court in making such amendment at a subsequent term. Re Wight, 134 U. S. 136, 33 L. ed. 865, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 487; Galloway v. McKeithen, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 12, 42 Am. Dec. 153; Curling v. Hyde, 10 Mo. 374; State v. Clark, 18 Mo. 432; Nelson v. Barker, 3 McLean, 379, Fed. Cas. No. 10,101; Bilansky v. State, 3 Minn. 427, Gil. 313; Weatherman v. Com. 91 Va. 796, 22 S. E. 349, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 93; Black, Judgm. § 126; Freeman, Judgm. § 156; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1005; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1343. That it was done after the allowance of a writ of error is also immaterial. It is an amendment, made by the trial court and certified here, to sustain its judgment, and comes fully within the reasoning of our decisions. Gauley Coal Land Asso. v. Spies, 61 W. Va. 19, 55 S. E. 903; McClure-Mabie Lumber Co. v. Brooks, supra; Hopkins v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 42 W. Va. 535, 26 S. E. 187; Capehart v. Cunningham, 12 W. Va. 750.

In response to the complaint that the record does not show the prisoner was in court when the verdict was rendered, it suffices to say the order shows he was there when the jury was impaneled and after the verdict was rendered, from which the presumption of his presence during the intervening period arises. The continuance of a fact or state of things once shown to exist is presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. State v. Nethken, 60 W. Va. 673, 55 S. E. 742; State v. Goodrich, 14 W. Va. 834, 846; Moore v. Gilliam, 5 Munf. 346.

The hearsay evidence of the witness Slavin was not excepted to. Hence the court did not err in admitting it.

While the court sustained an objection to a question propounded to the witness Copeland, concerning the attitude of Arbrogast and Jennings, and the prisoner excepted, the evidence, desired and sought by the question, was admitted in response to another question. Hence the error, if any, was cured.

As it does not appear what it was expected the witness Bodin would say, in response to the question propounded to him concerning a weapon in the hands of Arbrogast, the action of the court in sustaining the objection to the question is not shown to have been prejudicial, even if erroneous.

It is said the court abused its discretion in sentencing the prisoner to five years' imprisonment; but, as the judgment will have to be reversed for insufficiency of the evidence, we do not deem it necessary to pass upon this question.

For the reasons stated, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

BOISÉ VALLEY CONSTRUCTION COMPANY, Limited, Respt.,

v.

THEODORE KROEGER, Appt.

(17 Idaho, 384, 105 Pac. 1070.)

Contract — railroad — right of way — bonus.

1. Agreement sued on in this action considered, and held that it embodies two separate and independent contracts.

Same — certainty — parol evidence — construction.

2. A contract whereby the obligor promises and agrees to pay a railroad company the sum of $600 "as soon as said first parties [the railroad company] or their assigns have constructed and put into operation an electric railway line from the city of Boise to the strip of land above described, said first parties to give street car service of intervals of not more than thirty minutes, and to charge a fare from the city of Boise to said strip of land of not more than 5 cents," is certain and definite as to the time the obligation becomes due; and, while parol evidence is admissible to explain what was meant by "other considerations" named in the contract, it cannot vary the specific terms as to the time at which the obligation becomes due. Held, also, that the term "to the strip of land above described" does not mean "upon or over the strip of land above described."

Eminent domain — appropriation without right — remedy of owner.

3. Where K.'s land has been appropriated by a railroad company for its right of way, and a road has been built thereon, K. may elect to waive his remedies in ejectment, injunction, and trespass, and may sue as upon an implied promise and contract to pay reasonable compensation for the lands taken. In such case, the landowner has a right to assume that the company could acquire his land by proceedings in condemnation, and he may therefore waive such proceeding, and assume that the railroad company will pay him reasonable compensation therefor. If it fails to keep its implied contract in this respect, he may have his action for the value of the land taken as upon contract.

Same — acquiescence — effect — instructions.

4. Instruction given by the court as to acquiescence examined, and held that, while the conduct set forth and enumerated in the instruction would preclude the landowner from thereafter resorting to the action of ejectment against the railroad company, and also preclude him from obtaining an injunction against the company continuing its work and operations, still such conduct would not divest him of the title to his property, and would not be inconsistent with the assumption on his part that the

Note. — Right of one whose property has been taken for public use without his consent and without condemnation proceedings, to maintain action for compensation or for permanent damages.

The limitation of this note excludes all questions as to the remedies available to one whose property has been taken under the circumstances indicated, except the single remedy by action for compensation or permanent damages. And so the question whether statutory remedies are exclusive is treated only in so far as it bears on the point whether the statutory remedies exclude an action in this form.

Legal remedies.

It seems to be the general rule where private property has been taken for a public purpose without the consent of the owner and without condemnation proceedings, that the owner may maintain some form of common-law or equitable action to recover just compensation. The right of the owner to compensation when private property is taken for a public use is secured by the Constitutions of the United States and of most of the states, and in case private property is so taken without compensation and without the consent of the owner, a direct action to recover such compensation seems to be the simplest and most logical remedy available to the owner.

In some cases the right of the owner to maintain an action for compensation has been based upon an implied promise or contract to pay the reasonable value of the property taken. United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 112 U. S. 645, 28 L. ed. 846, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306; United States v. Lynah, 188 U. S. 445, 47 L. ed. 539, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; United States v. Russell, 13 Wall. 623, 20 L. ed. 474; Chicago League Ball Club v. Chicago, 77 Ill. App. 124.

In United States v. Lynah, supra. Mr. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion company would pay him reasonable compensation for the land taken.

Same — sale of land — damages recoverable.

5. Held that the following instruction was erroneous: "If you believe from the evidence as alleged in the answer that plaintiff committed injuries to the lands of the defendant in the building of the railway grade mentioned in the pleadings and the evidence, and you further believe from the evidence that since the commission of such injury defendant has sold and disposed of his said lands, then the court instructs you that the defendant may not recover for any injuries to said lands, save such as may have accrued to the same as you may believe from the evidence accrued thereto, between the building of such grade or embankment and the time of the sale of such lands."

Held, further, that where the acts of the tortfeasor have been completed and con-of the court, after reviewing the authorities, says, page 464, L. ed. 546: "The rule deducible from these cases is that when the government appropriates property which it does not claim as its own, it does so under an implied contract that it will pay the value of the property it so appropriates."

The right of an owner to recover compensation in an action based upon an implied promise or contract to pay the reasonable value of the property taken for a public purpose without his consent and without condemnation proceedings has often been affirmed or acknowledged by the Federal courts in cases where he has sought other relief which, under the circumstances, has been refused, or where judgment has been adverse to the claimant on other grounds.

In Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. (Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Garland) 124 U. S. 581, 31 L. ed. 527, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631, denying an injunction to restrain United States officials from using lands taken for the purpose of supplying water to the city of Washington, the court said that where the United States by its agents takes and retains private property for a public use, without the owner's consent and without condemnation proceedings, the owner may recover compensation in the court of claims as upon an implied contract.

The case of Schillinger v. United States, 24 Ct. Cl. 278, involved the use upon the Capitol grounds of a patent for improvement in pavements, and the court of claims held that it had not jurisdiction, as such use under the circumstances involved no contractual rights, but after an examination of the authorities the court said, page 298: "Careful examination of these cases shows that a contract to pay is implied whenever the government, acting through a competent agent, takes or uses individual property, acknowledging explicitly or tacitly that the property is individual property. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

summated, and the causes from which the injury must necessarily flow are patent and obvious, in such case the injury is of such a permanent nature that the whole damages, past, present, and prospective, may be recovered in one action, and that one recovery only should be allowed.

Damages — construction of railroad — measure.

6. Actions against railroad and other public service corporations for damages committed by them in the construction of their roads differ from actions for damages sustained by reason of the maintenance of a nuisance, and should not be governed by the rule applicable to nuisance cases.

Same — real property — total loss — permanent injury — temporary injury.

7. The rule in this state as to the measure of damages to real property is as follows: "If land is taken or the value

No formal proceedings in condemnation are necessary to this result. Where, however, there is a denial of private right in an alleged patent, and the invention is nevertheless appropriated or used by the government, the appropriation or use is in the nature of a tort, and an action thereon is not within the general jurisdiction of this court."

In Hollister v. Benedict & B. Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 59, 28 L. ed. 901, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 717, another patent case decided adversely to the plaintiff on the ground that he had not a patentable invention, the court nevertheless said: "If the right of the patentee was acknowledged, and without his consent an officer of the government, acting under legislative authority, made use of the invention in the discharge of his official duties, it would seem to be a clear case of the exercise of the right of eminent domain, upon which the law would imply a promise of compensation, an action on which would lie within the jurisdiction of the court of claims."

In a greater number of cases, however, actions to recover compensation have not proceeded upon the specific ground of implied promise or contract to pay the reasonable value of property taken, but they have been actions to recover compensation by way of permanent damages for the wrongful use and appropriation; and such actions have been very generally allowed where private property has been taken for a public use without the consent of the owner and without condemnation proceedings and compensation. Parkdale Corp. v. West, 12 L. R. App. Cas. 602; Blanchard v. Kansas City, 5 McCrary, 217, 16 Fed. 444; Hollingsworth v. Tensas Parish, 4 Woods, 280, 17 Fed. 109; *Archer v. thereof totally destroyed, the owner is entitled to recover the actual cash value of the land at the time of the taking or destruction, with legal interest thereon to the time of the trial.

"If the land is permanently injured, but not totally destroyed, the owner will be entitled to recover the difference between the actual cash value at a time immediately preceding the injury and the actual cash value of the land in the condition it was immediately after the injury, with legal interest thereon to the time of the trial."

"If the land is temporarily, but not permanently, injured, the owner is entitled to recover the amount necessary to repair the injury and put the land in the condition it was at the time immediately preceding the injury, with legal interest thereon to the time of the trial."

In some cases the question of the passing of title to the property involved has arisen in actions of this kind, and in Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Fechheimer, supra, the court said that the owner is at liberty to choose any one of several appropriate remedies, and if the railroad in its nature, dein plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover upon a contract whereby defendant agreed to pay a certain sum upon fulfillment of certain conditions which plaintiff alleged he had complied with. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. D. Williams, Gustave Kroeger, and J. C. Johnston for appellant.

Mr. Ira E. Barber, for respondent:

The injury, if any, accruing to the land by reason of the digging of the ditch upon the right of way of the railroad is a continuing injury, and one for which the successor in title would have a right of action.

sign, and use, is of a permanent character, and the injuries permanent in their nature, the owner may sue for compensation for permanent appropriation and injury; but that in such case it should appear that the verdict and judgment include damages for the entire injury, and it should also clearly appear, from the pleadings or from the evidence, findings, and judgment, what interest in the land the owner has parted with, and also what interest has been acquired by the company.

In the case of White v. Northwestern North Carolina R. Co., supra, an action for damages to plaintiff's property resulting from the construction of a railroad on a street in front thereof, the court said: "It will be observed that the defendant did not introduce its charter or show that it had condemned any part of the street or the rights or easement of the abutting proprietor. It justifies its conduct solely upon the mere license of the city of Winston, and in this view of the case its occupation, in so far as it affects the plaintiff, must be regarded as unlawful. If this be so, the plaintiff may maintain a common-law action for damages to be assessed up to the time of the trial, or it seems she may sue for the permanent damage, if any, which has been inflicted upon her property by reason of the location and construction of the defendant's road, and by so doing confer upon the defendant (so far as she is concerned) an easement to occupy the street."

Where a municipal corporation appropriates private property for a street, without notice to a mortgagee whose mortgage is duly recorded, the latter may maintain an action against the municipal corporation to recover damages for the conversion of his interest in the property, and in such an action evidence is not admissible of the condemnation proceedings to which the mortgagee was not made a party, and of which he had no notice. Harrison v. Sabina, 1 Ohio C. C. 49.

In the following cases of unlawful taking of property for a public use, the owners maintained actions of trespass to recover damages for the taking and use: Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Fuller, 48 Ga. 423; Hall v. Pickering, 40 Me. 548; Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Currie, 62 Miss. 506; Littleton v. Berlin Mills Co. 73 N. H. 11, 58 Atl. 877; Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. River R. Co. 18 Wend. 9, 31 Am. Dec. 313; Rusch v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 54 Wis. 136, 11 N. W. 253. These cases are to be distinguished from the cases not within the scope of this note, where the owner has maintained the ordinary action of trespass, and recovered damages as for a trespass, as distinguished from a taking or a permanent injury.

In Republican Valley R. Co. v. Fink, 18 Neb. 82, 24 N. W. 439, an action to recover damages for injury to real estate unlawfully taken by the railroad company, in which it was contended by the defendant company that the plaintiff's statutory remedy was exclusive, and that an action of trespass would not lie, this form of action was sustained, but a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed on the ground of an erroneous instruction in the court below as to the measure of damages, the appellate court saying that, though either the owner or the company may institute proceedings to condemn, yet, as the award must be made and the money paid or deposited before the corporation has any legal right to appropriate the property, if this is not done, an action for injury to the possession will lie, because the corporation has no legal right to occupy the premises. "In an action for trespass, however, the corporation will only be liable for such damages as result from the wrongful appropriation 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) at length in the complaint, and reads as follows: "This agreement, between H. P. Ustick, trustee, parties of the first part, and Theodore Kroeger, party of the second part, is to the effect: First.—That for and in consideration of the sum of \$1, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and other considerations, I hereby agree to deliver unto said first parties, by good and sufficient warranty deed, a strip of land described as follows: The north 30 feet of the southeast quarter (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the southeast quarter (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of section twenty-two (22) T. 3 N. R. 2 E., in the county of Ada, state of Idaho, for the purpose of and as a right of way for an electric railway to be built upon standard gauge, and operated by said first parties or their assigns, said deed to be delivered by me to said first parties or their assigns, as soon as the track of such electric railway is laid upon the above-described property; and for and in consideration of the sum tion. The value of the land must be ascertained in the mode pointed out in the statute. . . . The corporation does not acquire an easement in the right of way by the verdict in this case; that can only be done by condemnation proceedings. . . . Until the land is condemned and the damages paid, the corporation is a trespasser, and is liable for the actual injury sustained, but that does not include the value of the land taken."

In Keil v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. 131 Pa. 466, 17 Am. St. Rep. 823, 19 Atl. 78, where the original entry was through mistake and condemnation proceedings were subsequently instituted, pending which an action to recover damages was brought by the owner, it was held that trespass would lie for the breach of the close, although the condemnation proceedings transferred the adjustment of the damages necessarily consequent upon the entry under the right of eminent domain, from the common-law action to the statutory proceeding. "The right to sue, however, vested at the commission of the trespass; . . . and damages for the breach of the close, and for any deprivation of use, or other injury sustained prior to the tender of the bond, are recoverable in this action. But for the permanent injury by reason of the appropriation . . . and the effect of such appropriation on the remainder, the damages are secured by the bond, and will be assessed in the proceeding instituted for that purpose, and now pending."

In the case of Sherman v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 40 Wis. 645, it was held that where a railroad company takes possession of land for which it is liable to make compensation, without the consent of the owner, and without having ascertained and paid the compensation under the process given by the statute, it is liable to an action of ejectment or to an action of $1, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and other considerations, I further agree and contract to pay to said first parties the sum of six hundred and ²⁰/₁₀₀ dollars, as soon as said first parties or their assigns have constructed and put into operation an electric railway line from the city of Boise to the strip of land above described, said first parties to give street car service of intervals of not more than thirty minutes and to charge a fare from the city of Boise to said strip of land of not more than 5 cents. This contract binds the heirs, successors, and assigns of the parties hereto."

The defendant answered, admitting the execution of the agreement, but denying that the plaintiff in the action had performed the contract on its part, and by way of further defense alleged that, as part of the consideration for the execution of the contract to pay the sum of $600 mentioned therein, Ustick, as trustee, or his assigns, were to construct the electric railway mentioned in the contract so that it would extend the full length of the north side of the tract of land described in the agreement, and that both the plaintiff and Ustick have failed, neglected, and refused to so construct the line of road. It is further alleged in the answer that the plaintiff's agent, Ustick, knew and understood that defendant entered into such contract and agreement to pay the sum of $600 for and in consideration of the road being built upon the strip of land men-of trespass, in which the owner may recover the damages accruing before suit brought, but not permanent damages as for the taking of the land.

There are also numerous cases of action to recover compensation for property taken without the consent of the owner and without condemnation proceedings or compensation, where the right to maintain such an action did not seem to be disputed, but in which there were various other questions involved.

In Cohen v. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. 34 Kan. 158, 55 Am. Rep. 242, 8 Pac. 138, the court said: "It seems to be admitted by the parties that an action of this kind may be maintained; or, in other words, it seems to be admitted that where a railroad company has constructed and is operating its railroad through a piece of land belonging to another, without having first obtained a right of way by any formal condemnation proceedings, and without having procured any title to the land or any easement therein, the owner of the land may waive formal condemnation proceedings and all formal modes of transfer, and elect to regard the action of the railroad company as taking the property under the right of eminent domain, and may commence an ordinary action to recover compensation for all the damages which he has sustained by reason of the permanent taking and appropriation of the right of way by the railroad company. We think such an action may be maintained."

Other cases of this kind at law are Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Chicago, 26 Fed. 415; Bentonville R. Co. v. Baker, 45 Ark. 252; Porter v. Midland R. Co. 125 Ind. 476, 25 N. E. 556; *Donald v. Blackwell, E. & S. W. R. Co. v. Rebout, 19 Okla. 63, 91 Pac. 879, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1150, was a case of condemnation proceedings by the company, consolidated with an action for damages by the owner, the petition in the latter action having been filed before, but valid service of summons therein not having been effected until after, the condemnation proceedings were instituted by the company; and while it seems to be admitted that an owner might maintain such an action where his property had been taken without his consent and without any condemnation proceedings to acquire the right of way, yet it was held in this case that the action at law could not be maintained to recover damages for the injury after condemnation proceedings had been instituted by the company, for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of the parties for an appropriation of a right of way and fixing the compensation of the landowner.

In Rio Grande & E. P. R. Co. v. Ortiz, 75 Tex. 602, 12 S. W. 1129, it was held that where a railroad company takes private land for its right of way without payment therefor and without the consent of the owner, and the law provides that payment shall be made for lands taken for public use before the right to such use can be acquired, the title remains in the owner until the money is paid, unless such payment is waived, and he may bring a direct action to recover his damages for the appropriation. A judgment for the owner in such an action should be regarded merely as an assessment of the amount due him and a demand therefor until paid. It does not affect his title until the railroad company, by payment of the sum due, acquires the legal right to use the land or the right of way, and while the judgment remains unpaid the owner may demand and sue for compensation from another railroad company which has succeeded to the rights of the original company, and continues to use the land.

There are also cases in which other forms of relief have been sought, wherein the right of the owner whose land has been illegally taken for a public use, to maintain an action to recover compensation for all damtioned and described in the agreement, and that it was the purpose and intention of the defendant to subdivide his tract of land into smaller tracts and build houses thereon for rent and sale, and that the failure on the part of the plaintiff to build and erect its railway on such ground amounted to a failure of consideration for the promise to pay the said sum of $600. It is also alleged that in building its line of road plaintiff had dug and excavated a large ditch on the south side of its track, partly on the land of defendant, and partly on the 30-foot right of way above referred to, and that the ditch or excavation had been so made and maintained that the water used by the defendant in irrigating the remainder of his tract of land adjoining the right of way would flow and run off into the ditch, and in so doing cut deep ditches or gullies on defendant's land, and otherwise damage the lands of defendant adjoining the said right of way, and render a part of defendant's land worthless, to his damage in the sum of $600. For a further and second defense and counterclaim the defendant set up the contract sued upon, and alleged that he had promised and agreed to convey a 30-foot right of way along the north side of his place for the purpose of building and constructing plaintiff's line of railway, but that, instead of using and occupying the same and building the road thereon, the plaintiff had used and occupied a portion of defendant's land contiguous to the proposed right ages which he sustained by reason of the permanent taking and appropriation, has been affirmed or suggested. Zimmerman v. Kansas City Northwestern R. Co. 75 C. C. A. 425, 144 Fed. 622; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Nye, 113 Ind. 223, 15 N. E. 261; Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Clifford, 113 Ind. 460, 15 N. E. 524; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Soltwedde, 116 Ind. 258, 9 Am. St. Rep. 852, 19 N. E. 111; St. Julien v. Morgan's L. & T. R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 924; St. Julien v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 39 La. Canal Co.* 18 Ohio St. 169, 98 Am. Dec. 95.

A rare instance where the court has refused this form of relief is the case of Johnson v. Alameda County, 14 Cal. 106, an action founded on implied assumpsit, to recover a compensation for land illegally taken by the county for a road, in which case the court held that where the compensation for land taken by a county for a public use, as for a road, does not precede or accompany the taking, the entire action of the county authorities is void, and a suit against the county for compensation does not lie.

In Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. v. Robbins, 35 Ohio St. 531, the court said: "Our conclusion, therefore, is that the unlawful and wrongful conversion and use of land, against the will of the owner, and under such circumstances that he is not prevented or estopped from recovering possession, will not entitle such owner, where the title still remains in him, to maintain an action to recover a judgment for the value of the land, and to an order of sale of the same to pay the judgment; and that, in such case, the owner has his election to proceed under the [statute] to recover the compensation and damages to which he is entitled to under the Constitution, or by action for the unlawful entry and possession, to recover the possession and damages for use and occupation."

Equitable remedies.

In the case of Thornton v. Sheffield & B. R. Co. 84 Ala. 109, 5 Am. St. Rep. 337, 4 So. 197, a railroad company had taken possession of land under an agreement with the owner for a right of way across his land, upon certain conditions which it did not fulfil, and the court held that the owner was entitled to maintain a bill in equity to recover compensation from the company for the right of way, and such bill would be made effective by injunction, if necessary, until the damages were properly ascertained, or until the company obtained the right of way in legal form.

In Organ v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 51 Ark. 235, 11 S. W. 96, the owner maintained a claim for compensation in equity in the nature of a vendor's lien.

In Florida Southern R. Co. v. Hill, 40 Fla. 1, 74 Am. St. Rep. 124, 23 So. 566, it was held that where a railroad company possessing the power of eminent domain takes land without the consent of the owner and without condemnation proceedings, the latter may elect to regard the act of the company as done under the right of eminent domain, and may resort to equity in the first instance to establish the amount due him for compensation, and to enforce payment thereof by charging it upon the company's interest in the land and improvements as a lien thereon, and to foreclose such lien.

In the case of Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Hughes, 105 Ga. 1, 70 Am. St. Rep. 17, 30 S. E. 972, where the railroad company had taken lands by condemnation proceedings against the assignee of a life tenant, without making the remainderman a party, the remainderman, upon the death of the life tenant, sought equitable relief, and the court held that equity would determine the compensation to be paid in such a case, and give time to the railroad company within which to settle, before allowing the owner to recover the premises in ejectment.

of way, and was occupying the same with its track and right of way to the damage of defendant in the further sum of $600. Defendant prays judgment for the sum of $1,200 for the damages sustained by reason of the acts set out in his answer and counterclaims. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $580, and defendant has appealed.

A great many errors have been assigned, but we shall not undertake to treat them separately or in detail, as a consideration of a part only of the assignments will dispose of all and settle this appeal.

In the first place, it was contended by the defendant that he was not liable to pay the $600 under this contract until the plaintiff should complete the construction of its line of road the full length of this strip of land agreed to be conveyed by defendant as a right of way. The court construed the agreement as embodying two separate and distinct contracts, the first for the conveyance of a right of way as set out and described in the agreement, and the second as a separate and distinct contract to pay the sum of $600 at the time and in the manner specified in the agreement, viz., "as soon as said first parties or their assigns constructed and put into operation an electric railway line from the city of Boise to the strip of land above described," and on the condition that the company should give a street car service at intervals of not more than thirty minutes, and charge a fare of not to exceed

S. E. 1022, holds that a landowner or his successor in interest may maintain an equitable action for the assessment and recovery of permanent damages, and compensation for land taken for and used by a telegraph company.

Kendall v. Missisquoi & C. River R. Co. 55 Vt. 438, holds that a court of chancery has jurisdiction of a bill to have plaintiff's damages ascertained, and for injunction if the damages are not paid, where the railroad company has taken plaintiff's land without his consent and without any compliance with the statutes as to taking lands for railroads.

In Ashley v. Little Rock, 56 Ark. 391, 19 S. W. 1058, it is said that one whose land is taken by a railroad company without his consent and without condemnation proceedings has an equitable quasi vendor's lien, the enforcement of which is in fact specific performance.

The owner of a mortgage interest in land taken by a railroad company for its right of way, without its making compensation therefor, the land being taken after the condition in the mortgage was broken, but before foreclosure, has a lien thereon enforceable in equity for its equivalent in money, which lien holds although the mortgagor has agreed with the company as to the amount of damages, and although the company is insolvent, and the railroad is owned and operated by a new company formed by the mortgagees of the former company after foreclosure of their mortgage. Adams v. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. 57 Vt. 240.

The case of Bridgman v. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. 58 Vt. 198, 2 Atl. 467, also holds that where a railroad company took private land for railroad purposes, the owner has a lien on the land enforceable in equity for his damages, which lien is not affected by bringing suit at law against such company to recover damages for the taking, and obtaining judgment therein under a statute; and such judgment is conclusive as to the amount of damages to be recovered in a proceeding to foreclose the lien against a subsequent company which succeeded to the rights of the first company.

Statutory remedy as exclusive of action for compensation or permanent damages.

There are many cases of actions to recover compensation by way of damages for the unlawful taking of property for a public purpose, without the consent of the owner and without condemnation proceedings, in which the form of action has been objected to on the sole ground that a statutory remedy was provided, which remedy was alleged to be exclusive of the common-law remedy.

In this connection, it is necessary to distinguish those cases where there has been a "taking" or injury of private property in strict compliance with, and pursuant to, a statute specifically authorizing a particular public work, and providing the method of compensation for those injured thereby, but where, such compensation not having been made, an action is brought at common law to recover damages. Such cases are not within the scope of this note.

To constitute a legal taking (under express statutory authority), by which those acts which cause the damage can be justified, and thereby remit the party to such exclusive statutory remedy, it must be shown that the requirements of law have been strictly complied with. Hamor v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 78 Me. 127, 3 Atl. 40.

In the cases, however, where the "taking" is unlawful because, if specially authorized by statute, such statute has not been strictly complied with, or because, if assumed to be effected under mere general charter powers to exercise the right of eminent domain, no condemnation proceedings have been had or compensation made, nor the consent of the owner obtained to such taking, any statutory remedy provided has been generally held not to be exclusive of the pre-existing common-law remedy, unless the statute providing such new form of relief specifically provides that it shall be exclusive.

Where a city is specially authorized by statute, by and through the agency of a certain water board, "to take, hold, and convey to, into, and through said city" the

5 cents, between Boisé City and the strip of land described in the agreement. The court accordingly took the view, and so instructed the jury, that this $600 became due as soon as the company completed its line of road "to" the strip or tract of land described in the agreement to be conveyed for a right of way, and the maintenance of a thirty-minute service at a 5-cent fare. We are satisfied that the court placed the correct construction on this contract. It embodied two separate and distinct contracts, and under its terms the company might have earned the right to collect this sum of money, and yet not be in a position to demand the right of way. It was clearly entitled to collect the sum agreed to be paid upon completion of its road to the boundary line of defendant's premises as described in the agreement, and instituting the service as stipulated. Appellant contends that he was entitled to show by parol what the "other consideration" was as mentioned in the agreement. That position is correct, and was so recognized by the trial court, but that does not affect, alter, or modify the stipulation in the agreement that the money should be paid "as soon as said first party or his assigns have constructed and put into operation an electric railway line from the city of Boisé to the strip of land above described," etc. This fixes the maturity of the obligation to pay.

The inquiry as to whether the road has been built over the lands proposed to be water of a certain stream, but the board does not strictly comply with the provisions of the statute in so taking the water, they and the city are each liable in an action of tort in the nature of trespass, though if the statute had been strictly complied with, the owner's statutory remedy for compensation would have been exclusive. Wamesit Power Co. v. Allen, 120 Mass. 352; Lund v. New Bedford, 121 Mass. 286.

In the following cases of unlawful taking of private property for a public use, common-law actions to recover compensation by way of damages for the unlawful taking and appropriation have been maintained over the objection that, while the owner was entitled to compensation, his only method of obtaining same was pursuant to some statute providing a remedy, but not declaring it to be exclusive: Cator v. Lewisham Dist. 5 Best & S. 115; Turner v. Sheffield & R. R. Co. 10 Mees. & W. 425; North Shore R. Co. v. Pion, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 612; Saunby v. Water Comrs. [1906] A. Other cases to the same effect on this point, though in each a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed on other grounds, are: Pratt v. Saline Valley R. Co. 130 Mo. App. 175, 108 S. W. 1099; Blesch v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 183.

Where condemnation proceedings have been instituted, and there has been a taking of private property for a public use thereunder, but such proceedings are for some reason void, either as a whole or as to some particular person, and such person has brought a common-law action to recover his compensation or damages, it has been held, where the point was raised, that the owner is not obliged to seek his remedy by appeal in such void proceedings, or is not in any way barred thereby, but may maintain his common-law action for the recovery of the compensation to which he may be entitled. Overmann v. St. Paul, 39 Minn. 120, 39 N. W. 66; Badgely v. Hamilton County, 1 Disney (Ohio) 316. In the latter case, the court said: "The whole case may be summed up thus: The property of the plaintiff has been taken and appropriated to the use of the county, by its properly authorized agents, and for a lawful purpose. It has been thus taken without the plaintiff's consent and without being paid for. The law says it shall be paid for, and has provided a remedy; but the special remedy thus provided has failed the plaintiff, without fault on his part. He is, therefore, remitted, of necessity, to his action against given, and in accordance with the contract, will properly arise at such time as the company demands a conveyance for the right of way. It is not involved in this action.

In the progress of the trial the defendant asked leave to amend his second alleged counterclaim so as to set out the contract entered into between the parties, and to allege the corporate capacity of the plaintiff, and more fully plead the fact that the plaintiff corporation had taken and occupied and used a portion of defendant's land not embraced in the right of way which defendant had contracted to convey. The record is not entirely clear as to the extent of the proffered amendment, but the position taken is clarified by the ruling of the court denying the application of the defendant to amend. The court said: "You have apparently attempted to set up that they had taken an additional tract of land to this 30-foot strip, and the allegation does not support the fact, although your evidence, perhaps one view of it, will show that; but I am satisfied, even if that was true, that there would not be a good cause of action for a counterclaim here, because if they have taken land that did not belong to them, why the defendant still owns the land, and would own the land. If you recovered judgment, it would not settle the question of title here to the property, and I do not believe defendant can sell that strip of land in that way. If they have taken land he has not conveyed to them, or agreed to convey to them, the defendant's action would probably be by ejectment, and with that view of the case I don't see any necessity for granting permission to amend, because it would be necessary for you to amend further, and that additional amendment the court will still hold is not a subject of counterclaim, the taking of additional land, because you are asking for the full value of it, and if the court should award it, you would still own the land after you had the value of it, the title would still be in your client or his grantee, whoever it might be." It will thus be seen from the ruling of the court that the court took the view that a person whose land has been taken by a railroad company for a right of way, without being taken under a conveyance, dedication, or in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, cannot maintain an action against the company for the value of the property taken. This necessarily leads to an inquiry as to the rights of a landowner whose lands have been seized and entered upon by a public service corporation without first obtaining the right to do so, either by contract or by pursuing the statute conferring the power of eminent domain.

In United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 112 U. S. 645, 28 L. ed. 846, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306, the Supreme Court of the United States was considering a case where the agents of the government had appropriated private property for a public use, without any previous conveyance, dedication, or condemnation, and the court in passing on the question said: "The law will imply a promise to make the required compensation where property, to which the government asserts no title, is taken pursuant to an act of Congress, as private property to be applied for public uses. Such an implication being consistent with the constitutional duty of the government, as well as with common justice, the claimant's cause of action is one that arises out of implied contract, within the meaning of the statute which confers jurisdiction upon the court of claims, of actions found-the county as at common law, for the damages he has sustained."

In Hull v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 21 Neb. 371, 32 N. W. 162, an action of ejectment by the owner of land taken by the railroad company after void condemnation proceedings, the court said: "While the manner of ascertaining the damages is exclusive, yet if a railroad company takes and occupies real estate without taking the necessary legal steps to condemn the land, and thus making its possession rightful, it is, as all others under like circumstances, a trespasser, and cannot justify its possession. Therefore the usual common-law remedies are available to the owner."

In the case of Pettis v. Providence, 11 R. I. 372, the city of Providence had instituted statutory proceedings relative to opening highways, and this was a petition for a jury trial to determine the amount of damages due to the petitioner. The petition was dismissed on the ground that the statute provisions had not been strictly complied with by the city,—the court saying: "His property, therefore, though it has been taken from him, cannot be regarded as having been duly taken or condemned under the act, and, consequently, it would be premature to impanel a jury under the act to determine the damages. The city of Providence, in disposing of his property, inasmuch as it did not proceed in pursuance of the act, must be regarded as a wrongdoer, and we see nothing to prevent the petitioner from suing it as a trespasser."

But even when the other party has not proceeded regularly, the owner may be remitted to the statutory remedy, and lose his right of action at common law to recover compensation, in consequence of his assent to the proceedings and waiver of the irregularities. Woolard v. Nashville, 108 Tenn. 353, 67 S. W. 801; Strickford v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 81, 59 Atl. 367.

ed 'upon any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States.'" In Cohen v. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. 34 Kan. 158, 8 Pac. 138, 55 Am. Rep. 242, the supreme court of Kansas considered the right of a landowner to waive the remedies of ejectment, injunction, and trespass, and to sue for the value of the land taken, and the rule adopted is stated in the syllabus as follows: "Where a railroad company has constructed and is operating its railroad through a piece of land belonging to another, without having obtained a right of way by any formal condemnation proceedings, and without having procured any title to the land over which it operates its railroad, or any easement therein, the owner of the land may waive formal condemnation proceedings and all formal modes of transfer, and elect to regard the action of the railroad company as taking the property under the right of eminent domain, and may commence an ordinary action to recover compensation for all the damages which he has sustained by reason of the permanent taking and appropriation of the right of way by the railroad company." 2 Elliott, Railroads, § 1048, says: "In many of the states a suit at common law may be maintained upon the implied promise to pay a just compensation for the lands taken. And for any taking or injury for which the statute does not provide a remedy the landowner may sue at common law. Some of the courts hold that, even though the original taking was wrongful, the landowner may affirm the taking and sue for compensation, and a recovery in such a suit vests the right to the lands in the defendant." Many cases are cited in the notes to this text sustaining the principle as stated. For authorities to the same effect, see Central Branch Union P. R. Co. v. Andrews, 26 Kan. 702; Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Fechheimer, 36 Kan. 45, 12 Pac. 362; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Nye, 113 Ind. 223, 15 N. E. 261; Lawrence v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 39 La. Ann. 427, 4 Am. St. Rep. 265, 2 So. 69; Zimmerman v. Kansas City Northwestern R. Co. 75 C. C. A. 424, 144 Fed. 622; Southern R. Co. v. Hood, 126 Ala. 312, 85 Am. St. Rep. 32, 28 So. 662; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Pfeuffer, 56 Tex. 66.

It must be remembered that in this case the company which is alleged to have appropriated appellant's land is a corporation that is granted the right of eminent domain by both the Constitution and statute of this state. Const. art. 1, § 14; Rev. Codes. § 5210; Portneuf Irrigating Co. v. Budge, 16 Idaho, 116, 100 Pac. 1046. Appellant, knowing, therefore, as he must have, that the respondent company had the right to take his property by proceedings under the power of eminent domain, might have concluded to waive the condemnation proceedings and take the value of the premises appropriated, without any controversy over the right to take the same. He likewise had a right to assume that the company would pay him a reasonable compensation therefor. If it failed to do so, he would be clearly entitled to sue on the implied promise and contract to pay him the reasonable value of the land taken. If the company entered upon appellant's land with his consent and acquiescence, and thereafter constructed its railroad and began operating its trains, it would then be engaged in a lawful business of a quasi public character in serving the public, and it would then be too late for appellant to pursue his remedy against the company by way of ejectment or injunction. Southern R. Co. v. Hood, and Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Nye, supra; 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 768, and cases cited in note. Whether it entered and took possession of his lands, either with or without his consent or acquiescence, he would still have a right to assume, in the absence of an agreement or understanding to the contrary, that the company would pay him the reasonable value of the lands taken. If A steals B's horse, B may pursue the property in claim and delivery, or he may waive the tort and sue as upon contract for the reasonable value of the animal, and A will not be heard in a court of justice to answer and deny the contract, and set up as a defense that he stole the animal. So, in a case of this kind, if A should seize and appropriate B's real estate for an easement authorized under the Constitution and statute of the state, B may maintain his action to oust and eject the trespasser, or he may enjoin him from using and occupying the land, or he may waive both such remedies, and sue upon an implied contract to pay reasonable compensation for the property taken. In the latter event title to the easement vests in the company appropriating the property when the judgment is paid, in the same manner as it does upon condemnation under the statute.

While the court's statement as to the appellant's rights with reference to any additional land the company had taken for its right of way was erroneous as a matter of law, still it is doubtful if any error was committed in this respect on account of the defective and insufficient manner in which the second counterclaim had been pleaded, and but very little improvement was offered to the pleading by the proposed amendment. It may be said, however, that the defendant in the action was forestalled by the announcement of the court as to his view of the law. A complaint in such case, seeking to recover the value of land taken by a public service corporation where no condemnation has been had, should be specific as to the description of the premises, and also as to its allegations, showing that the pleader is proceeding on the theory that the land has been wholly taken, and that he is seeking the entire value thereof, so that, after judgment and payment, the right to the easement may vest in the company. Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Fechheimer, supra. Since we have concluded that this case must be reversed on other grounds, we advise that the defendant be allowed to amend his counterclaim, if he so desires, in order to bring the same within the rule herein announced.

Appellant requested an instruction as to the effect of a boundary line which existed between his property and that of the adjoining owners, announcing the rule as to the relative weight and importance to be given to such boundary line and a survey establishing the true line after the disappearance of the government monuments. The court declined to give the requested instruction, but instead thereof gave the following instruction: "You are instructed that, if you find from the evidence that the row of trees testified to has been acquiesced in and adopted by the owners of the tracts of land as the dividing line between the land of the defendant and the land adjoining on the north for a long period of years, and the owners of the two tracts have cultivated and improved their respective land up to the said line for a period of time longer than five years, then such fact would be better evidence of the location of the line between the two tracts of land than any survey made since such row of trees was adopted as such line. If, however, you find from the evidence that the plaintiff when locating its line found that said trees were not the correct dividing line, and afterwards constructed its road on the true line, and that the defendant before said road was constructed had an actual survey made, and found thereby that the line adopted by plaintiff was correct, and thereafter stood by without objection and permitted the plaintiff to construct its works upon such line, then, in that event, he should not be permitted, after construction of said road, to complain that it was not constructed upon the true line." The first part of this instruction announcing the law as to acquiescence in the boundary line established by the coterminous landowners was as favorable to appellant as he was entitled to have given to the jury. That instruction is in substantial accord with the rule recently announced by this court in Bayhouse v. Urquides, 17 Idaho, 286, 105 Pac. 1066. Appellant assigns error against the giving of the latter part of the foregoing instruction as to his right to recover in the event he had permitted the plaintiff to construct its road upon his land, or had acquiesced therein. This part of the instruction was erroneous. While such conduct on the part of the appellant would have precluded him from subsequently maintaining the action of ejectment against the railroad company, and likewise have prevented him from maintaining injunction against the company continuing its construction and operation (Southern R. Co. v. Hood, 126 Ala. 312, 85 Am. St. Rep. 32, 28 So. 662; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Nye, 113 Ind. 223, 15 N. E. 261), still such conduct would not divest him of the title to his property, nor would it be inconsistent with the assumption on his part that the company would pay him for the land that it was appropriating for its right of way. See cases hereinbefore cited.

Appellant assigns the giving of the following instruction as error: "If you believe from the evidence as alleged in the answer that the plaintiff committed injuries to the land of the defendant in the building of the railway grade mentioned in the pleadings and the evidence, and you further believe from the evidence that since the commission of such injury the defendant has sold and disposed of his said lands, then the court instructs you that the defendant may not recover for any injuries to said lands save such as may have accrued to the same, as you may believe from the evidence accrued thereto, between the building of such grade or embankment and the time of the sale of such lands." It appeared from the evidence that appellant had sold this land and parted with the title some time prior to the commencement of this action, and that evidence is clearly what called forth this instruction. There seems to be a diversity of opinion among the courts as to the particular actions of this character in which one recovery only will be allowed, and that for past, present, and prospective damages, and the cases in which a separate recovery will be allowed, from time to time, for recurring damages that may be sustained by the party. There is a long line of authorities, however, holding that, where the acts of the tortfeasor have been completed and consummated, and the causes from which the injury must necessarily flow are patent and obvious, and the injury, if any, is permanent,—past, present, and prospective damages can as readily be estimated in advance as after successive damages have occurred, and that the better rule is to allow only one recovery, and permit it to embrace all damages for past, present, and future injury to the property. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Loeb, 59 Am. Rep. 341, and note (118 Ill. 203, 8 N. E. 460); Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. 112 Mass. 334, 17 Am. Rep. 106.

The general rule is well stated by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. as follows: "As a general rule, a new action cannot be brought unless there be a new unlawful act and fresh damage. . . . The case at bar is not to be treated strictly in this respect as an action for an abatable nuisance. More accurately it is an action against the defendant for the construction of a public work under its charter in such a manner as to cause unnecessary damage by want of reasonable care and skill in its construction. For such an injury the remedy is at common law. And if it results from a cause which is either permanent in its character, or which is treated as permanent by the parties, it is proper that entire damages should be assessed with reference to past and probable future injury." Sutherland, speaking of the general rule, says: "When a wrongful act is done which produces an injury which is not only immediate, but from its nature must necessarily continue to produce loss independently of any subsequent wrongful act, then all the damages resulting, both before and after the commencement of the suit, may be recovered in one action." 4 Sutherland, Damages, § 1042. Mr. Freeman states the rule as follows: "All the damages which can by any possibility result from a single tort form an indivisible cause of action. . . . For damages alone no action can be permitted. Hence, if a recovery has once been had for the unlawful act, no subsequent suit can be sustained. There must be a fresh act as well as a fresh damage." Freeman, Judgm. § 241. Mayne on Damages, p. 138, says: "Similar questions often arise in cases where a person by digging, mining, building, or the like, affects the plaintiff's land or house in such a manner as to produce injurious consequences which manifest themselves at a later period. Here it is now settled that all subsequent or recurring damage may be assessed, and can only be recovered in a suit brought upon the original cause of action." In Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 652, 24 Am. Rep. 792, the city cut a ditch along the side of the plaintiff's lot, and caused his lands to be overflowed, and it was held that the cause of action was complete when the unlawful act was committed, and that all of the damages accruing from the original wrong must be included in one action. The latter case 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

was approved in Stodghill v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 53 Iowa, 341, 5 N. W. 495. The strongest, and perhaps most exhaustive, case holding to the contrary rule, is that of Uline v. New York, C. & H. R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 54 Am. Rep. 661, 4 N. E. 536. See also note to same case in 53 Am. Rep. 123.

The diversity of opinion existing seems to have arisen out of the common-law rule allowing repeated and successive actions against a party maintaining a nuisance, but there is a distinction between cases of nuisance and those cases where the damage arises out of the construction or operation of a railroad, for the reason that such a work or improvement constitutes a public highway, and is authorized and recognized by law, and the right of way itself, and all necessary ground incident thereto, may be taken in condemnation, so that the road and the work necessary and incident to its maintenance cannot be abated as a nuisance. The theory on which actions were allowed to be prosecuted against one maintaining a nuisance was that continued and repeated actions would overcome the persistency of the party maintaining the nuisance, and would result in its abatement. No such a rule can exist in the case of a railroad company, and besides the law looks with disfavor on a multiplicity of actions, and rather favors the settlement and determination of all matters that can be settled in one action. The purchaser from appellant took whatever portion of the land he acquired as it existed after the construction of the road, and he could not recover damages for the original wrong. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Loeb, and Stodghill v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. supra.

Appellant assigns as error the action of the court in giving the following instruction with reference to the measure of damages to be applied in the event the jury found in favor of the cross plaintiff: "If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff in constructing its railway entered upon and made excavations upon defendant's land in the manner charged in the cross complaint and answer, then the measure of damages, if you find from the evidence that the defendant has been damaged, would be the diminution of the value of defendant's land thereby; and unless you find from the evidence that the defendant's lands have been diminished in value by the making of said excavations and the digging of said ditch mentioned in the pleadings and evidence, your verdict on the question of damages will be for the plaintiff." The most serious objection to this instruction is the uncertainty with reference to the character of taking, injury, or damages to which it is intended to apply.

We assume, however, that the court had in mind the evidence adduced with reference to the excavations and ditches dug by the railway company, constituting a permanent injury to cross plaintiff's land, in which event the rule announced by the court was substantially the same as has been announced by this court. The rule as to the measure of damages was announced by this court in Young v. Extension Ditch Co. 13 Idaho, 174, 182, 89 Pac. 296, and is as follows: "If land is taken or the value thereof totally destroyed, the owner is entitled to recover the actual cash value of the land at the time of the taking or destruction, with legal interest thereon to the time of the trial. If the land is permanently injured, but not totally destroyed, the owner will be entitled to recover the difference between the actual cash value at a time immediately preceding the injury and the actual cash value of the land in the condition it was immediately after the injury, with legal interest thereon to the time of the trial. If the land is temporarily, but not permanently, injured, the owner is entitled to recover the amount necessary to repair the injury and put the land in the condition it was at the time immediately preceding the injury, with legal interest thereon to the time of the trial." We are entirely satisfied with this rule, and will not pause to consider, at this time, the reasons for the rule, or open that question to further consideration.

A number of other assignments of error have been argued, but we do not find any further question that is likely to arise on the retrial of this case that deserves or requires our consideration here. From what has been said it appears at once that a new trial must be had in this case. A new trial is rendered particularly necessary by reason of the instruction to the effect that the appellant could not recover damages which had not been actually sustained up to the time of his conveyance of the property.

Judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered. Costs awarded in favor of appellant.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

A. MATHENEY

v.

CITY OF ELDORADO, Appt.

(82 Kan. 720, 109 Pac. 166.)

Accord and satisfaction — intent.

1. To constitute an accord and satisfaction, the agreement that a smaller sum shall Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be accepted in discharge of a larger one, originally claimed, must have been entered into by the parties understandingly and with unity of purpose.

Same — disputed claim — collateral security — right of holder to compromise.

2. A contractor undertook to build a bridge for a city, and arranged with a banker to furnish the money necessary to carry on the work, and he gave the banker a writing to the effect that all warrants for the construction of the bridge should be issued to and cashed by the banker. A dispute arose between the city and the contractor as to the amount due for certain extra work done on the bridge. Later an allowance was made by the city in full payment of the work, which the contractor refused to accept. He then informed the banker that the allowance must not be accepted. A warrant was drawn by the city for the allowance, and placed in the bank, where the funds of the city were kept in the custody of the son of the banker, who was deputy city treasurer. Some time afterwards the banker, without other authority than the writing mentioned, drew the money on the warrant, but neither the contractor nor the mayor and council of the city had any

Note. — Authority of pledgee to compromise obligations held as collateral security.

Very few cases have been found which, like MATHENEY v. ELDORADO, involve the right of the principal debtor to recover from the collateral obligor after the pledgee has attempted to compromise with the latter. Nearly all of the cases deal with the accountability of the pledgee to the principal debtor, — a somewhat different question. Cases passing on the latter question have, however, been included herein.

Neither the pledgee nor the pledgor of a claim can compromise with the debtor without the assent of the other; at least, where the debtor has notice of the pledge. Fairbanks v. Sargent, 117 N. Y. 320, 6 L.R.A. 475, 22 N. E. 1039.

As said in McLemore v. Hawkins, 46 Miss. 715, if the pledge be commercial paper, the pledgee's duty requires that he look to the interest of the pledgor, so as not to release any party by laches. His power extends to the collection of the entire debt, to be applied first to liquidate his demand, and to hold the surplus to the use of the pledgor. As to the excess, his power is that of agent to collect, but not to compromise, make a rebate, or to forgive in whole or in part.

The acceptance by the holder of a less sum than is due, in full satisfaction of the collateral notes, does not preclude the pledgor from recovering the balance due thereon from the maker. De Clarke v. Waters, 10 Wyo. 31, 65 Pac. 855.

So, the holder of collateral security in the form of notes secured by a mortgage is without power to accept from the maker of knowledge that the warrant had been cashed until long after this action to recover the amount of the claim had been brought. Held, that the banker had no authority to make settlements for the contractor, and that the drawing of the money on the warrant did not operate as an accord and satisfaction of the original claim, nor preclude the contractor from recovering the entire debt.

Municipal corporation — appointment of superintendent of construction — regularity — right to question.

3. The city having appointed a superintendent to supervise the building of the bridge, and having accepted the work done under his supervision, as well as the bridge, is not in a position to deny liability for the work done under the direction of the superintendent, because of irregularity in the appointment of the superintendent.

Trial — right to special findings — extent.

4. A party is entitled to have a jury make special findings of the ultimate facts of the case, but has no right to ask for mere evidentiary matters, nor that the jury shall file a bill of particulars as to each fact.

(June 11, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Butler County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover compensation for extra material and labor alleged to have been furnished under a building contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. K. M. Geddes and T. A. Kramer, for appellant:

Where a municipal body acts upon a claim that is presented to it, and allows a part of it in full payment, and rejects the balance, and the warrant is accepted by the claimant, it is a settlement in full, notwithstanding the fact that the claimant may attempt to take the warrant only as the notes and mortgage a conveyance of a part of the mortgaged premises, in discharge of the mortgage, and in case he attempts to do so, the principal obligor may sue to set aside the release of the mortgage, and to foreclose it (Chester v. Hill, 66 Cal. 480, 6 Pac. 132); or he may ratify the conveyance and release, and hold his creditor responsible (Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122, 24 Pac. 642).

As previously suggested, several cases hold that one holding commercial paper as collateral security cannot, except, perhaps, in very extreme cases, compromise with the maker of the collateral, and surrender the same for less than the amount due thereon, and that if he does so, he will be bound to account to the pledgee. E. F. Hallack Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Gray, 19 Colo. 149, 34 Pac. 1000; Fisher v. George S. Jones Co. 108 Ga. 490, 34 S. E. 172; Union Trust Co. v. Rigdon, 93 Ill. 458; Zimbleman v. Veeder, 98 Ill. 613; Foltz v. Hardin, 139 Ill. 405, 28 N. E. 786; Union Nat. Bank v. Post, 64 Ill. App. 404; Powell v. Ong, 92 Ill. App. 95; Depuy v. Clark, 12 Ind. 427; Rhomberg v. Avenarius, 135 Iowa, 176, 112 N. W. 548; Stevens v. Wiley, 165 Mass. 402, 43 N. E. 177; Garlick v. James, 12 Johns. 146, 7 Am. Dec. 294.

So, one holding a mortgage on an unfinished building, as collateral security, is accountable if he releases it to the mortgagor upon the latter's verbal promise to make a new mortgage upon completion of the building. Whittemore v. Hamilton, 51 Conn. 153.

And the holder cannot sell the collateral for less than its value, knowing that the purchaser buys it with intent to cancel it. Fletcher v. Dickinson, 7 Allen, 23.

And the pledgee of a bond and mortgage may be held liable for the conversion thereof, notwithstanding he is given a power 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of sale, where, without demanding payment of the principal debt, he transfers them for a grossly inadequate sum to one who has an interest in the mortgaged property, and who satisfies the mortgage of record. Campbell v. Parker, 9 Bosw. 322.

If the collateral paper is worthless, it is the duty of the holder to return it to the pledgee; and he has no authority to dispose of it for any purpose other than to reimburse himself for amounts advanced to the pledgee. Authority to collect the collateral paper does not include authority to surrender it to the maker for cancellation. Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. 477.

Authority to the pledgee to grant extensions, or enter into compositions or special arrangements, is subject to the dominant obligation that it be exercised in good faith, for the purpose of liquidating the pledgee's debt and paying the surplus over to him; and a compromise framed with an eye to the interests of the pledgee alone, in which the interests of the pledgee are recklessly disregarded or wilfully sacrificed, is a violation of duty, rendering the pledgee accountable to the pledgee. Canadian Bank v. Barrette, 41 Can. S. C. 561.

The holder is not authorized to compromise the collateral by virtue of express written authority given in the transfer, to sell the same or any part thereof at public or private sale. Union Trust Co. v. Rigdon and Zimbleman v. Veeder, supra.

Nor does such power of sale authorize the pledgee of notes to trade them for bank stock. Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 14 Utah, 305, 47 Pac. 147.

The pledgee may be compelled to account to the pledgee of an endowment policy of life insurance where, by the terms of the pledge, he is not authorized to surrender or sell it, and he nevertheless surrenders it before the maturity of the policy or of the part payment, and to insist on his claim for the balance.

principal obligation, without notice to the pledgeor. Manton v. Robinson, 19 R. I. 405, 34 Atl. 148, 37 Atl. 8.

So, damages for the conversion of an insurance policy may be recovered from one with whom it was deposited as collateral security for the payment of a note, under an agreement authorizing him to surrender it to the company without notice, upon default in payment of the note, where he waives the provision authorizing the surrender, and thereafter surrenders the policy to the company, without notice to the pledgeor. Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by A. Matheney to recover from the city of Eldorado for extra material and labor furnished in connection with the building of a bridge for the city,

So, one surrendering negotiable paper held by him as collateral security is accountable therefor to the pledgeor, where he surrenders it to the maker, and takes a new note in return. Farm Invest. Co. v. Wyoming College, 10 Wyo. 240, 68 Pac. 561; Greenwald v. Metcalf, 28 Iowa, 363.

Or takes in return part payment in cash and new notes for the remainder. Nexsen v. Lyell, 5 Hill, 466; Gage v. Punchard, 6 Daly, 229.

And a pledgee of a note as collateral security, who has received another note in payment thereof, cannot reinstate the pledgeor's liability upon the principal obligation, and deprive his assignee of his rights in the proceeds of the former note, by receiving back such note, and returning the other, without the consent of the pledgeor or his assignee. Post v. Union Nat. Bank, 159 Ill. 421, 42 N. E. 976.

In Newell v. Sexton, 61 Cal. 645, the lower court found that the pledgee of notes as collateral security was guilty of conversion where he surrendered them to the obligors therein, in consideration of a conveyance of land, for which he credited the principal obligation with a sum considerably less than the face value of the collaterals. The supreme court affirmed the judgment of the lower court, but concerned itself only with the right of recovery of the assignee of the transferee of the pledgeor's equity.

It has been held that where, by a comproin pursuance of a contract. On October 21, 1907, the city of Eldorado, by its mayor and council, made a contract with A. Matheney, by which the city agreed to pay $3,350 for the construction of a stone arch bridge in the city, according to certain specifications. It provided that the sum mentioned should be paid for the "bridge proper," and that "all other work required by the council to be done shall be considered extra, and shall be paid for at the following prices," specifying particular rates per cubic yard or foot for excavation and masonry. The material used and the manner of construction were "to be subject to the inspection and acceptance or rejection of the superintendent appointed by the mayor and council," and, from time to time during the progress of the work, the superintendent, as well as the mayor and council, ordered extra work to be done in connection with the building of the bridge. Matheney borrowed the money with which to furnish the material from J. E. Dunn, the president of a local bank, and, to protect Dunn, he gave the following instruction to the mayor: "You are hereby authorized, instructed, and directed to draw any and all warrants, issued to me for work on central avenue bridge in favor of J. E. Dunn. He is hereby authorized to receipt for and cash the same." In accordance with the terms of the contract, $3,350 was paid by the city for the construction of the bridge proper. Much extra work was done, and Matheney filed with the city clerk claims amounting to $2,713.50 for extra work and material, which included excavating, stonework, ornamental plates, cement walk on bridge, extra support for abutments, etc. The council questioned the amount of the bill, and after canvassing it for some time, authorized the payment of $1,982.93 in full settlement of the account. A warrant for this amount was delivered to Dunn, who, after holding it for some time, obtained the money on it. It was never accepted by Matheney as full settlement of the account, and he contends that Dunn did not so accept it, and, further, that he had no authority to do so. On this action to recover on his claim, the jury found in favor of Matheney and awarded a verdict for $546.53, being the difference between the amount of the warrant and the amount due for the extra work and material.

The petition of Matheney, although challenged for uncertainty, appears to have been sufficiently definite to advise the city of the nature of his claim, and to meet the requirements in pleading. The principal contention in the case is that, under the pleadings and the evidence, there was what amounted to an accord and satisfaction, a compromise and settlement of the controversy, which precludes appellee from mainmise advantageous to all parties, the pledgee releases the collateral paper to the obligor therein, upon part payment thereof, the former will not be held responsible for the face value of the collateral. Such was the view of the law where a compromise was made after the insolvency of the collateral obligor, and the return unsatisfied of execution issued on a judgment against him. Exeter Bank v. Gordon, 8 N. H. 66.

And where, due to the insolvency of makers and indorsers, and upon advice of counsel, the pledgee surrendered the note, and took another for a lesser sum, which counsel thought might be collected. Randolph v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 9 Lea, 63.

And where the pledgee of notes of a railroad company, which were practically worthless, surrendered them to the company, and accepted in their stead mortgage bonds, the court holding that the pledgee was accountable only for the actual value of the notes. Griggs v. Day, 136 N. Y. 152, 18 L.R.A. 120, 32 Am. St. Rep. 704, 32 N. E. 612; see, however, subsequent appeal in 158 N. Y. 1, 52 N. E. 692.

It was said in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187, concerning the duties and rights of pledgees: "The object of their duty was to realize out of the collaterals as much as possible at the earliest practicable period; and they were invested with all the powers which were necessary or proper to enable them to attain that object. The first thing to be looked to was the security of the collaterals, and the next, their collection. If a collateral was already secure, but was not paid on demand, it was their duty to bring suit upon it as early as convenient. If it was of doubtful solvency, and security could be obtained by giving reasonable time, it was their right, if not their duty, to give such time and obtain security. If a debtor could not, or would not, give security for his debt, and good policy required that he should not be sued, they were justifiable in not suing him. If more could be made by compounding or compromising a debt than in any other way, or if such a compromise was deemed advisable, in the exercise of a sound discretion, looking to the interest of the creditor, they had a right to make such compromise. New securities taken by them in the discharge of their duties might properly be taken in their own names. In determining whether it would be good policy to bring no suit for a debt, or to give time for its payment on obtaining security, or to accept a compromise, the fact that they acted under the advice of, and upon information derived from, their counsel, affords at least prima facie evidence that such action was bona fide and proper."

It should be stated that this note does not purport to cover the question of the effect of the compromise or release of the collateral security upon the obligation of sureties of the principal debtor.

taining his action or recovering an additional amount. The city insists that, when it made an allowance of $1,982.93 as full payment of the extra work on the bridge, and issued a warrant for that sum, which was cashed by Dunn, the original demand of Matheney was thereby satisfied and extinguished. To operate as a satisfaction and discharge in cases of this kind, the smaller sum must not only have been offered, but it must have been accepted with the understanding that it was in full satisfaction of the larger amount claimed. Was there a substitution of a later executed agreement for the earlier one? To make the later agreement effective, it was necessary that the minds of the parties should meet, and that it should have all the essential elements of an ordinary contract. In Harrison v. Henderson, 67 Kan. 194, 62 L.R.A. 760, 100 Am. St. Rep. 386, 72 Pac. 875, it was said: "An accord and satisfaction is the result of an agreement between the parties, and, like all other agreements, must be consummated by a meeting of the minds of the parties, accompanied by a sufficient consideration. If the creditor is to be held to abate his claim against the debtor, it must be shown that he understood that he was doing so when he received the claimed consideration therefor." P. 200. See also 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 331. There is no accord as to settlement unless the parties acted understandingly, and each has complete knowledge of the essential facts involved. There does not appear to have been an accord between the city and Matheney as to the discharge of the indebtedness for extra work and material. Matheney never consented to accept the money in discharge of his claim, and never authorized Dunn to make such an acceptance. When Matheney was informed by the council that it had only allowed a part of his claim, he declined to accept the allowance, and informed Dunn to that effect. The funds of the city appear to have been kept in Dunn's bank, and his son was deputy city treasurer. When the warrant was issued, on June 25, 1908, it was turned over to the son, who was acting for both the city and the bank. Dunn did not draw the money on the warrant until July 18, 1908, and he did so then without the knowledge of Matheney, and after he had been told that it would not be accepted. Matheney did not learn that Dunn had drawn the money on the warrant until the holidays, several months after this action was begun. The mayor and council, it appears, were not aware that Dunn had obtained the money on the warrant until long after it was cashed, for as late as November 12, 1908, they made Matheney an offer of $2,200 on his claim. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Aside from the direction of Matheney not to accept the allowance, Dunn had no authority to make compromises for Matheney. The only authority conferred on him was in the writing already quoted. It may be doubted if that writing related to warrants for extras or for more than those issued for the bridge proper, but, assuming that it did, he was certainly not vested with authority to make settlements between the city and Matheney. Apparently the sole purpose of the writing was to protect Dunn for the advancements made to Matheney during the progress of the work. It gave him no right to adjust disputes as to what was due on the contract, nor any authority except to receive warrants after disputes were adjusted and settlements made between the two contracting parties. Power to make settlements of that character by the acceptance of warrants or otherwise could not be exercised unless it was expressly conferred. The writing did not purport to make Dunn the agent of Matheney to settle controversies with the city, and there was nothing in the subsequent conduct of Matheney which precluded him from insisting on full payment of the entire debt.

Error is assigned on the admission of testimony to the effect that certain work was done by Matheney under the direction of a superintendent appointed by the mayor and council to superintend the building of the bridge. The contract between the parties contemplated the appointment of a superintendent by the city, and provided that Matheney should furnish material and perform work subject to the inspection and acceptance of the superintendent. It is a little late for the city to question its own authority for the appointment of a superintendent to oversee the building of the bridge. The mayor and council did appoint a superintendent, and he did direct the work, with the knowledge and approval of the city authorities. The city adopted the action of the superintendent, and more than that, the materials which were furnished and the work done by Matheney have been accepted by the city and its officers. It is therefore bound to pay for such material and work at the rate specified in the contract, and this, notwithstanding the superintendent may have been irregularly appointed. Ellsworth v. Rossiter, 46 Kan. 237, 26 Pac. 674; Mound City v. Snoddy, 53 Kan. 126, 35 Pac. 1112; Roberts v. St. Marys, 78 Kan. 707, 98 Pac. 211.

There are other objections to testimony and some criticism of the instructions, but nothing substantial is found in any of them, and the evidence in the case appears to be sufficient to support the verdict by the jury.

Complaint is made that the jury were not required to answer more fully one of the special questions submitted. The question was: "Did he (Matheney) object to or disavow the action of said J. E. Dunn, and, if so, in what manner? State fully." The answer was, "Yes." Appellant insists that the jury should have been compelled to state at length what the disavowal was. There was no error in the refusal. In effect, appellant asked for a recital of the evidence. A party is entitled to special findings as to ultimate facts, but has no right to ask for mere evidentiary matters, nor to require the jury to file a bill of particulars on each fact.

It is finally contended that the court should in any event have divided the costs. This is based on an offer which was made to confess judgment after the action was begun. The offer was for $2,200, and was manifestly made on the theory that the warrant had not been cashed, and that no part of the claim for extras had been paid. The amount awarded by the jury was $546.53, and this with the warrant previously cashed amounted to $2,529.46. As this sum was considerably more than the amount of the offer, there was no reason for dividing the costs.

We find no error in the record, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

Commerce—between intrastate points—passage into other state—effect.

The act requiring corporations and others operating railroads as common carriers to transport live stock within the state at a speed of not less than 15 miles per hour, unless prevented by some unavoidable cause (Laws 1907, chap. 276), does not apply to nor affect interstate commerce, and a shipment of live stock between points in the state, which passes for a short distance over the territory of another state, is interstate commerce, and noncompliance with the requirements of the statute in such a shipment affords no grounds for recovery against the carrier.

Headnote by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent failure promptly to transport certain live stock. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Madden and W. W. Brown, for appellant:

The shipment was interstate, and the state law has no application. Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 187 U. S. 617, 47 L. ed. 333, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214; Patterson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 77 Kan. 236, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 733, 94 Pac. 138.

Mr. Frank M. Sheridan, for appellee:

Continuous transportation between two points in a state, partly through another state, is intrastate commerce purely.

It was held in Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 672, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 87, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 806, affirming Monaghan (Pa.) 45, 17 Atl. 179, that a railroad corporation of a state is liable to taxation by such state upon its receipts for the mileage within the state, for transportation by continuous carriage from a point in the state to another point in the state, but over a line which, in its course between these points, passes out of the state and back again into the state.

In giving a reason for its conclusion, the court said: "It should be remembered that the question does not arise as to the power of any other state than the state of the termini, nor as to taxation upon the property of the company situated elsewhere than in Pennsylvania, nor as to the regulation by Pennsylvania of the operations of this or any other company elsewhere, but it is simply whether, in the carriage of freight and passengers between two points in one state, the mere passage over the soil of another state renders that business foreign which is domestic. We do not think such a view can be reasonably entertained, and are of opinion that this taxation is not open to constitutional objection by reason of the par-

The Federal power with reference to commerce among the several states does not comprise that commerce which is completely internal, but is carried on between man and man in a state, as between different parts of the same state, and which does not extend through or affect other states.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by C. E. Leibengood against the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company to recover damages resulting from an alleged negligent delay of the railway company in transporting two car loads of cattle from Beagle to Kansas City. The petition was in two counts. The first set forth a cause of action under the common law, and the second, a violation of an act requiring common carriers to transport live stock at a speed of not less than 15 miles per hour, unless prevented by some unavoidable cause. A recovery was had on the second count, which included damages for delay and attorney's fee, and the railway company appeals.

The contention of appellant is that the shipment of the cattle was interstate, and therefore that the act under which recovery was had is without application. It appears that the shipment in question was from Beagle, a point in Kansas, to and through Missouri for a distance of at least a mile to Kansas City, another point in ticular way in which Philadelphia was reached from Mauch Chunk."

In Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 187 U. S. 617, 47 L. ed. 333, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214, however, it was held that a state railroad commission cannot, without violating the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, fix and enforce rates for the continuous transportation of goods between two points within the state, where a large part of the route is outside of the state, through another state or territory.

Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, was distinguished on the ground, inter alia, that the tax was determined in respect of receipts for the proportion of the transportation within the state, and that "such proportioned tax had been sustained in the case of commerce admitted to be interstate." The reasoning of the court is sufficiently set forth in MISSOURI, K. & T. R. Co. v. LEIBENGGOOD.

As this is a matter on which the Supreme Court of the United States has the last word, and as this is its last utterance on the subject, it may now be laid down that transportation between points in the same state, over a route part of which is in another state or territory, constitutes interstate commerce. In addition to the cases from the Supreme Court of the United States, cited above, the following cases so hold: New Orleans Cotton Exchange v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 293; Milk Producers' Protective Assn. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 7 Inters. Com. Rep. 92; United States v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 152 Fed. 269; Poor v. Iowa C. R. Co. 81 S. C. 162, 62 S. E. 14.

But many cases, in deference to what was supposed to have been held in Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania,—a mistaken deference, as stated in Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. supra,—have held that transportation between points in the same state, though over a route which, for part of the distance, passes out of the state, does not constitute interstate commerce. United States ex rel. Kellogg v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 115 Fed. 373; Campbell v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 86 Iowa, 587, 17 L.R.A. 443, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 203, 53 N. W. 351; *Seawell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Although a railroad company has a line between two points in a state lying wholly within the state, over which it is accustomed to ship goods, yet if, owing to a defective bridge owned by another company, it is compelled to use another line, lying partly

Kansas. How far the cattle were transported through Missouri is not definitely shown; but the railroad over which the cattle were taken passes out of Kansas at or near Rosedale, and re-enters the state near the stock yards where they were delivered. The statute under which the recovery was had provides:

"Section 1. That all persons, firms, or corporations operating railroads as common carriers shall transport all live stock received by them for transportation within this state without delay, and shall transport the same in a period of time not less than one hour for each 15 miles of the entire distance over which said shipment of stock is transported by rail within this state, unless prevented by unavoidable cause; provided, the time consumed by stops for watering and feeding, occasioned by the requirements of law or the order of the shipper, shall not be considered a part of the time in which shipments are required to be made.

"Sec. 2. Any common carrier which fails or refuses to transport such live stock at the rate of not less than 15 miles per hour, as herein provided, shall be liable for all damages which may be sustained by any person on that account, which damages shall include the loss resulting from a depreciation on the market, shrinkage in weight of such live stock, the loss in time of shipper, his agent or employee, and any extra expense occasioned thereby, and all other damages which are the approximate result of such failure, together with the costs in case suit is brought to recover the same, and a reasonable attorney's fee, fixed by the court on the trial of said cause. All other statutory and common-law remedies, in addition to the remedies provided herein, are hereby preserved to the shippers." Laws 1907, chap. 276.

Was the shipment from one point in Kan-outside the state, the transportation is interstate commerce, and not subject to the control of the state railroad commission. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 87 Ark. 562, 113 S. W. 203.

Where two cities within a state are connected by two railroads, one wholly within the state, and one whose route for a part of the distance lies without the state, a state statute fixing maximum rates and fares on the route lying wholly within the state is not void, as an interference with interstate commerce, although competition between the two railroads will force down the fares and rates on the line which, by passing for a part of the distance outside of the state, does an interstate business. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Hadley, supra.

When goods are received for transportation between two points in a state, it will be presumed to be an intrastate shipment, in the absence of evidence that shipment by a route which would take the goods outside of the state is usual or necessary. Harter v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. (S. C.) 67 S. E. 290.

Telegraph companies

A somewhat similar question arises in relation to telegraph messages passing between two points in a state over a route part of which is in another state, for it has been settled by adjudications of the United States Supreme Court that telegraph lines, when extending through different states, are instruments of commerce which are protected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. See Western U. Telegr. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 40 L. ed. 1105, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934.

On the authority of Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, it was held in State ex rel. Railroad Comrs. v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 113 N. C. 213, 22 L.R.A. 570, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

18 S. E. 389, that telegraph messages between points in the same state do not constitute interstate commerce because of the fact that they traverse another state on the route, and, hence, the state might regulate the amount to be charged for such messages.

On the same authority it was also held in Leavell v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 116 N. C. 220, 27 L.R.A. 843, 47 Am. St. Rep. 798, 21 S. E. 391, that a telegraph company which has a continuous line between points in the same state, over which it might transmit a message received for that purpose, but which passes through another state on the route, cannot claim that the message is interstate commerce, and therefore exempt from state authority limiting the charge for transmission, although the company does not in fact transmit the message the whole distance, but delivers it at an intermediate point in another state, to another company, because its own line for the remainder of the distance is fully occupied by other business.

In Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 459, 93 Am. St. Rep. 971, 41 S. E. 856, a statute provided for a penalty of $100 for each failure of any telegraph company to deliver a message promptly. In an action to recover the penalty for failure to deliver promptly a message sent from East Radford, Virginia, to Tom's Creek, Virginia, the court, on the authority of Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, held the company liable, although the delay had occurred at Bluefields, West Virginia, where it had established a relay station. The court said: "Where the initial and terminal points are both in the same state, and the telegram is transmitted over the wires of the same company, and concerns only citizens of that state, the message is a domestic message, and its character in that respect is not altered by the circumstance that the line passes in nas, through a portion of Missouri, to another point in Kansas, interstate, and, if so, is a state regulation of such a shipment permissible? The shipment sought to be regulated is a single and indivisible thing. The statute purports to regulate the time which shall be consumed from the origin to the end of the transportation. If the carrier fails to transport for the whole distance within the specified time, the prescribed penalties and liabilities attach. It is a regulation of a single act of transportation as a whole, and not of a part of it, that may be wholly performed within the state. The effect of the regulation is direct and immediate upon a shipment that is interstate. It is unlike cases of regulating the speed of trains in cities within the state, or the receipt or delivery of freight at points in the state, or the imposition of some liability for some other default occurring entirely within the state. If the statute applies, it directly affects a single shipment which is partly within and partly without the state. According to a ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States, such a shipment is interstate, and a regulation of it is beyond the legislative power of the state. In Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 187 U. S. 617, 47 L. ed. 333, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214, the transportation of goods on a through bill of lading from a point in Arkansas to another point in the same state, over a road which passed a short distance through Indian territory, was held to be interstate commerce, subject to the regulation of Congress, and free from interference by the state of Arkansas, which had undertaken to regulate the shipment. It was there said that "the transportation of these goods certainly went outside of Arkansas, and we are of opinion that in its aspect of commerce it was not confined within the state." It was in effect held that, when the subject of regulation is indivisible, there can be no division of regulation, either as between states or as between the state and the nation; and that there can be no splitting of jurisdiction in proportion to the mileage in the state seeking to regulate interstate shipments. It was also said: "It is decided that navigation on the high seas between ports of the same state is subject to regulation by Congress (Lord v. Goodall, N. & P. S. S. Co. 102 U. S. 541, 26 L. ed. 224), and is not subject to regulation by the state (Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. [C. C.] 9 Sawy. 253, 18 Fed. 10); and although it is argued that these decisions are not conclusive, the reason given by Mr. Justice Field for his decision in the last-cited case disposes equally of the case at bar. 'To bring the transportation within the control of the state, as part of its domestic commerce, the subject transported must be within the entire voyage under the exclusive jurisdiction of the state.'" The route of carriage was out of the state a very short distance, it is true; but, as we have seen, the shipment is to be treated as a unit, and the rule in such a case would appear to be the same whether the act of transportation was outside of the state one or a hundred miles. In State v. Otis, 60 Kan. 248, 56 Pac. 14, an act regulating the transportation of live stock, and which required the railroad company to carry the part over territory of another state. Nor is it affected by the fact that the company has established a relay office in such other state. The statute deals with the company, not its agents. The company in this case undertook to transmit the message from one point to another in Virginia, and it cannot escape the penalty imposed by statute for its dereliction of duty on the theory that the statute has no extraterritorial force. The default complained of was not the stoppage of the message at Bluefields, but the failure to transmit it as promptly as practicable to Tom's Creek. And the response of the company that it was guilty, but guilty at a point beyond the limits of the state, constitutes no defense."

The doctrine of this case was reaffirmed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hughes, 104 Va. 240, 51 S. E. 225, although the case of Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. supra, had then been decided. Two judges dissented in a strong opinion, on the ground that although such a statute might be valid where the default took place in the state, it could not where it occurred outside of the state. A writ of error was dismissed in 203 U. S. 505, 51 L. ed. 294, 27 Sup. Ct. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rep. 162, on a ground not involving the merits.

High seas and navigable waters.

No attempt has been made to collect the cases dealing with the relative rights of the states and of the Federal government to regulate traffic by water between two ports in the same state, which passes over the high seas or navigable waters of the United States, since the question is affected by the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States. as well as by the interstate commerce clause.

But see Lord v. Goodall, N. & P. S. S. Co. 102 U. S. 541, 26 L. ed. 224, and Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 9 Sawy. 253, 18 Fed. 10, holding that under the clause of the Constitution giving Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes," and entirely aside from its admiralty jurisdiction, Congress may regulate the liability of owners of vessels navigating the high seas, although they are engaged in the transportation of goods and passengers between ports and places of one state only. R. A. E.

shipper free in certain cases, was under consideration. The shipment was originated in Luray, Kansas, and ended a few yards from the state line in Kansas City, Missouri, and it was held to be interstate commerce, and the regulation a violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. To the same effect is Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Sinclair, 77 Kan. 228, 94 Pac. 123.

Counsel for appellee contend that, as the transportation began and ended in the state, it was subject to state regulation, and rely on Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 672, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 87, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 806, and some other cases based on that decision. That case, however, relates to taxation rather than transportation. In transporting property from place to place in Pennsylvania, the railway company passed for a short distance through New Jersey; but the tax which was the subject of controversy was determined upon the transportation within the state. It was held that a state might tax the business done in the course of a continuous carriage from one point to another in the state, although the railway company, in accomplishing it, incidentally traversed over a part of another state. In Hanley v. Kansas City Southern R. Co., supra, Mr. Justice Holmes, who wrote the opinion, made it clear that the rule of the Lehigh Valley Case did not apply to a regulation of transportation. In speaking of the decisions of state courts which held that the Lehigh Valley Case was an authority for transportation which was partly outside of the state, he said: "These decisions were made simply out of deference to conclusions drawn from Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, and we are of opinion that they carry their conclusions too far. That was the case of a tax, and was distinguished expressly from an attempt by state directly to regulate the transportation while outside its borders. 145 U. S. 204. And although it is intimated that, for the purposes before the court, to some extent commerce by transportation might have its character fixed by the relation between the two ends of the transit, the intimation was carefully confined to those purposes. Moreover, the tax 'was determined in respect of receipts for the proportion of the transportation within the state.' 145 U. S. 201. Such a proportioned tax had been sustained in the case of commerce admitted to be interstate. Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163. Whereas, it is decided, as we have said, that when a rate is established, it must be established as a whole." The distinction between the imposition of a tax and the regulation of 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) transportation, as applied to a carrier doing interstate business, is commented upon in Leavenworth v. Ewing, 80 Kan. 58, 101 Pac. 664. It was there said: "The result of the authorities is that a rate on a continuous carriage from point to point within the state is to be regarded as a unit, and when it is applied to a shipment which passes through more than one state, it takes on an interstate character, and is beyond the regulation of the state; but a different rule obtains in the matter of taxation. The state may properly tax the property located within its borders of a corporation doing an interstate business, and may also tax that part of the business of such corporation which is done within the state." The language of the statute indicates a legislative purpose to limit its application to intrastate traffic. It refers to live stock received by carriers "for transportation within this state," and the time limit is applied to stock "transported by rail within this state." If, however, it were intended to apply to interstate commerce like the shipment in question, it would be necessarily invalid. In no event can there be a recovery under the statute for negligent delay in an interstate shipment.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

(June 30, 1910.)

A PPEAL by respondent from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Calcasieu, granting a writ of mandamus requiring him to place relator's name on the registration book as a qualified voter. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph Moore, E. F. Gayle, and T. Arthur Edwards for appellant.

Messrs. Robert R. Stone and David R. Rosenthal for appellee.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an application for a writ of mandamus, filed by David J. Reid in the district court, against the registrar of voters for the parish of Calcasieu, to compel him to place his (plaintiff's) name on the registration book as a qualified elector.

The registrar had refused to grant plaintiff's application to carry his name on the roll, and this application is to compel him to enter his name on that roll. The plaintiff is a citizen of the United States and a resident of the parish of Calcasieu. The registration book, containing the names of voters, was destroyed by fire on the 23d of April, 1910. A few days thereafter, the registrar gave official notice in the local papers to all voters to come forward and register anew. This was done in order to afford an opportunity to the voters to register their names anew. Some time after his office had been opened, he gave notice that in thirty days prior to a special election he would close his office. The special election referred to is to be held on the 14th day of July, 1910.

The parties to this litigation seek an interpretation of the statutes in order, so far as possible, to avoid all illegalities and irregularities. If the majority of the voters called upon to vote at the special election of July 14, 1910, so elect, bonds are to be issued, as a result of the election, aggregating $360,000. Other elections are to be held, primary and general, in the near future. It is probable that other voters, who had registered before the fire before mentioned, will also seek to exercise their franchise rights. The district court made the mandamus peremptory, and directed the registrar to enter the name of the relator. The registrar appeals.

The first objection urged (in argument only) by the respondent is one regarding the asserted failure of relator to make the required affidavit and take the required oath.

registrar procured another book, and entered therein the names of those who he knew had registered, together with those of subsequent applicants, and it appeared that no qualified person had been refused the right to vote. The court said: "The registration book should be present and used for the purposes prescribed by law at the voting place, while the election is in progress, and until all the votes are received. It should not—cannot—be dispensed with in any case, if it can be produced; but if it be lost, destroyed by accident, or made way with by fraud, or for fraudulent purposes, the mere fact that, by reason of such causes, it is not present at the election, as it should be, cannot deprive a registered voter of his right to vote. He had registered,—had perfected his right to vote by registration; he was a registered voter, as much so as if the registration book were present; and while the book is the proper and the better evidence of the fact, it is not the only evidence. He may offer evidence of the fact, if need be, by his own testimony, that of the registrar, and of such person or persons as were present and saw him registered. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

If, in such case, the judges of the election should be satisfied that he was then properly registered, he should be allowed to vote, and he should be, although it might turn out that the absence of the registration book might, in some way and for some cause arising, destroy the validity of the election at that voting place."

It is provided by statute in Kentucky that "any person who has registered, and whose certificate of registration has been lost or otherwise destroyed after the registration books containing his registration have been filed with the clerk of the county court, may, upon filing his affidavit before the county court clerk, showing that fact, obtain a duplicate certificate of registration, and, upon filing such an affidavit before the county court clerk, it is hereby made the duty of the said clerk to issue said certificate, for which he may charge the applicant a fee of 50 cents, and said certificate shall entitle the person named therein to vote as if issued by the officers of registration;" and this act is held valid. Yates v. Collins, 118 Ky. 682, 82 S. W. 282, 973. J. T. W.

Our answer to the contention of respondent is that he has not alleged these asserted grounds in his answer. The answer contains the general averment that relator came to respondent's office, and applied to place his name on the roll of registration, which was refused. Furthermore, the case is before us on an agreed statement of facts. No mention is made in this agreed statement of facts of a refusal on the part of the relator to take an oath or to comply with any direction of the registrar. As this objection is raised only in the written argument, it has every appearance of an afterthought. Relator must have taken the first registration oath at the time that he registered; i. e., any oath required at the time that he registered originally. As to any oath required of him (if any was required) when he appeared before the registrar the last time, the pleadings and the facts are silent on the subject. It is only mentioned in the brief.

There is really no issue before us as to either the failure to take an oath or to satisfy the registrar that he had previously registered at the time that he made his application to have his name placed on the roll. Respondent admits that relator registered. It must, in consequence, be held that he duly registered, in the absence of any showing to the contrary.

The next proposition of respondent is that a voter who fails to avail himself of the right to register cannot vote at an election held in accordance with act No. 98 of 1908. That is true. It does not apply to the case at bar. Relator did not fail to register. We have seen that he was duly registered, only the destroying flames burnt the written evidence of registration.

The next proposition of respondent is substantially to the same effect. Respondent, in support of this last proposition, urges that relator was negligent, indifferent, and for that reason he must be held to have voluntarily disfranchised himself. This proposition is not sustained, for the right sought is public. We will further state, in answer, the rule established should apply to all voters, without regard to laches or negligence, as there cannot be degrees of excellence in this matter or of indifference. It cannot reasonably be said to a voter, "Your right to have your name placed on the roll will be recognized, because you have been active enough," but to another, less active, or who may be guilty of laches, "You cannot register." That would not do. All must be treated alike,—the active, or the lame, the halt, and the blind. All have the right, or none have it. If they have it, it should be recognized, after reasonable inquiry in regard to the right of the voter to vote.

We may as well state here the office of registrar is not to be imposed upon, as respondent seems to apprehend, by all who may apply to place their names on the registration book, without regard to whether they have previously registered or not. That officer should certainly be equal under the law to the duty of protecting his office from imposition.

We are decidedly of the opinion that relator has the right to have his name carried on the registration book.

The next contention of the respondent registrar is that the name of the voter cannot, under the statute, be placed upon the precinct register or voting list by the registrar or voter within thirty days of an election, citing act No. 98 of 1908, in support of the contention.

We will begin by stating that the condition brought about by the destruction of the records is abnormal. Still, a voter who has previously registered should not be disfranchised, nor should the rule laid down tend to exclusion rather than inclusion of the voters who, in good faith, seek to exercise their rights as voters, although they may be a little tardy in their application. There is no question of registration, as we have before stated. But, having secured the right to vote, he should be permitted to retain the right.

Another ground of respondent is that, although the registration record had been totally destroyed by fire, no person ought to be permitted to vote under the statute on any oath or written affidavit on the day of the election. That question is not before us. We have naught to do with acts on the election day. We have no objection to state that, in our opinion, the contention that the precinct registration, or poll books for each precinct must be furnished within forty-eight hours before the time fixed for the opening of the poll is sufficiently before us to justify us in expressing an opinion upon the subject. We are inclined to the opinion that the names of voters who had previously registered cannot be placed on the registration books within the forty-eight hours preceding the opening of the polls. This is rendered necessary, in order that the registrar may comply with the statute, and send the necessary books and papers from his office to the different polls and precincts, or where ever they are needed under the law.

In conclusion: A voter who has duly registered cannot be disfranchised on the ground that he has not had his name placed on the registration rolls thirty days before the election. He is not to be treated and considered as one who had not registered at all, as in this instance the relator had registered and secured the right which the statute provides. He cannot, under the statute, have his name carried on the registration roll within the forty-eight hours just preceding the opening of the polls. If he complies with the statute as now interpreted, he has all the rights on the day of the election of a voter who had had his name placed on the registration rolls thirty days before the day preceding the election.

For reasons stated, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

MABEL B. WINANS

v.

ANTHONY V. WINANS.

(205 Mass. 388, 91 N. E. 394.)

Divorce — jurisdiction — residence in state.

A husband and wife lived together in the state within the meaning of a statute making that fact a prerequisite to jurisdiction of the state courts over a divorce proceeding, where they came into the state with the intention of making their home there, and after remaining a few days looking for apartments selected one and sent their belongings there, although, before taking up a residence in the apartment, the husband left the state on business and never returned.

(March 23, 1910.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Essex County for the opinion of the Supreme Court after dismissing a libel for divorce. Decree for libellant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Neal Barney, Henry T. Lummus, and Wilbert A. Bishop, for libellant:

Domicil in a state is acquired animo et facto.

Palmer v. Hampden, 182 Mass. 511, 65 N. E. 817.

Residence and intention are questions of fact.

Moor v. Harvey, 128 Mass. 219; Wright v. Boston, 126 Mass. 161.

The parties gained a domicil.

Palmer v. Hampden, supra; Wilbraham v. Ludlow, 99 Mass. 587.

If there is an intent to reside in a place, a residence in pursuance of that intention, however short, will establish a domicil.

Wharton, Conf. L. § 58; Dicey, Conf. p. 107; Stockton v. Staples, 66 Me. 197; White v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790, 13 Am. St. Rep. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

896, 8 S. E. 596; Williams v. Roxbury, 12 Gray, 21.

Domicil for the purposes of divorce may be acquired in the commonwealth without reference to any particular municipal division thereof.

Arnott v. Groom, 5 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 62; Re Craignish [1892] 3 Ch. 180; Jacobs, Domicil, § 133; Dicey, Conf. L. Am. ed. 1896, pp. 90-93.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel for divorce. The libellee was duly served and appeared, but was subsequently defaulted. Upon the evidence before him the presiding judge "found and ruled that the parties never lived together as husband and wife in this commonwealth within the meaning of the statute, and on that ground ordered that the libel be dismissed," and at the request of the libellant

Note. — Character of residence essential to give jurisdiction in divorce proceedings.

This question was treated in a note to Bechtel v. Bechtel, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1100, and this note is supplementary thereto.

Following the limitations in the earlier note, this note will be confined to cases discussing the standard by which the facts relating to the domicil must be measured, and does not include cases which merely pass upon the question whether or not there had been residence for the requisite length of time in the jurisdiction.

As is shown in the earlier note, the intention of the party to take up a residence in the place is one of the essential elements of a domicil for divorce purposes, and this intention must be bona fide, and not merely claimed. This intention is to be considered in connection with the acts of the party.

Thus, in Bradfield v. Bradfield, 154 Mich. 115, 129 Am. St. Rep. 468, 117 N. W. 588, the court said that, in determining whether a complainant was a resident of the state under the divorce law, and in any case where residence is to be determined, the intention, coupled with the acts of the party, must be considered. Intention is always to be given large consideration, but merely claimed intention without acts to support it is not controlling.

And in Duxstad v. Duxstad, 17 Wyo. 411, 129 Am. St. Rep. 1138, 100 Pac. 112, the court said that a change of residence does not consist alone in going to and living in another place, but it must be with the intention of making that place the permanent residence. A residence once acquired continues until a new one is acquired.

So, in Petty v. Petty, 42 Ind. App. 443, 85 N. E. 995, it was held that a wife who leaves her former home with her child, to join her husband, who had resided for sev-reported the case to this court. If, on the facts found by him, the finding was not warranted in law, then a decree nisi on the ground of desertion is to be entered; otherwise the libel is to be dismissed.

So far as the question is one of fact, the presiding judge has determined it adversely to the libellant. But the facts upon which he based his conclusion that the libel should be dismissed have all been reported by him, and the question whether he was wrong in ruling as he did becomes therefore a question of law.

The statute provides that "a divorce shall not, except as provided in the following section, be decreed if the parties have never lived together as husband and wife in this commonwealth." Rev. Laws, chap. 152, eral months in another state, loses her residence in the first state, although she remained but a short time in the second domicile, when she had no intention of establishing a legal residence apart from her husband until after her return to the first state.

And in Mason v. Mason, 69 N. J. Eq. 292, 60 Atl. 337, the court said that under the facts of the case the complainant was entitled to a divorce, provided that the court had jurisdiction of her matrimonial status, —provided, in other words, that she had not come into the state for the mere purpose of obtaining a divorce or for the accomplishment of any other transient purpose, but had come and had resided there animus manendi.

The temporary absence from this state of one domiciled here will not be held a change of residence, unless to the factum of residence elsewhere be added the animus manendi; for a domicile, having once been acquired, continues until a new one is actually acquired animus et facto. Watkinson v. Watkinson, 68 N. J. Eq. 632, 69 L.R.A. 397, 60 Atl. 931, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 326.

So, in Dulin v. Dulin, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 4, it was held that a man engaged in newspaper, political, and philosophical work as a writer and lecturer, and who had changed his residence in response to the various demands of his professional labors, did not acquire a domicile therein within the meaning of the divorce law, although he had actually been within the state for a period of time greater than required by the law, when there was no suggestion of any domiciliary intent or of an abandonment of a former domicile. The court said: "Our statutes and decisions require that it must affirmatively appear that there has been a clear intention to abandon a former residence, and to make this state a permanent one with domiciliary intent, coupled with an actual bona fide residence for one year within this commonwealth previous to the filing of the petition or libel."

And in Sworosi v. Sworosi, 75 N. H. 1, 70 Atl. 119, it was held that a married woman residing in a sister state may for cause acquire a domicile apart from her husband.

§ 4. The exception referred to is immaterial so far as this case is concerned. The libellant concedes that it must appear that the parties were domiciled in this commonwealth in order to satisfy the requirement that they shall have lived together here as husband and wife. Ross v. Ross, 103 Mass. 575; Weston v. Weston, 143 Mass. 274, 6 N. E. 557. The question then is whether the presiding judge was wrong in finding, as he must have found, that the parties were not domiciled in Massachusetts.

It is plain that the libellant never lost her domicile in this commonwealth, except by reason of her domicile following that of the libellee, and we therefore need not consider further the facts in regard to her status. Was the presiding judge wrong in find-band by removing to this state with the intention of permanently making it her home and actually residing here.

A mere residing for the requisite period of time is not sufficient to give a domicile. R. v. Woods, 6 Ont. L. Rep. 41.

Mere absence from a fixed home does not work a change in domicile. There must be an animus to change. Blondin v. Brooks (Vt.) 76 Atl. 184.

So, a wife who, upon being abandoned by her husband, leaves the city where she had lived with her husband, and goes into another state solely to earn her living, not acquiring a domicile therein, and still regarding the city as her home, does not lose her residence in the said city. Cummings v. Cummings, 133 Ky. 1, 117 S. W. 289.

Mere residence for the purpose of procuring a divorce has frequently been held insufficient to give a domicile within the meaning of the divorce law. Mason v. Mason, supra.

So, in R. v. Woods, supra, the court said that a mere "matrimonial domicile" is not sufficient.

A wife loses her residence in one state by going with her husband to another state, although she returned in about two months, where she had no other intention than to remain at the new place with her husband, unless a certain contingency should happen, which did not occur. Hoffman v. Hoffman, 155 Mich. 328, 118 N. W. 990.

To the same effect was the decision in Lamont v. Lamont (Ga.) 68 S. E. 96, where it was held that a woman who had been compelled by her husband's drunkenness to leave him, and who had established a domicile in a foreign jurisdiction, loses that domicile in going to live for a time with her husband, and, upon returning to the foreign jurisdiction again, must reside there the requisite length of time before she can maintain an action for divorce.

A traveling salesman who rents a room in a city which is the center of his activities thereby acquires a residence which satisfies the divorce law, although his business frequently calls him to other places. Stone v. Stone, 134 Mo. App. 242, 113 S. W. 1157.

ing that the libellee did not acquire a domicile here? The parties were married in New York city. The domicile of the libellee before marriage, as the judge has found, apparently had been in New York; and certainly, as he further found, it never had been in Massachusetts. The libellee had no business or family ties in New York and no fixed place of abode there or elsewhere, but roomed in various hotels in New York city, when not traveling with his mother, who spent her time in health resorts. He was upwards of forty years of age and had no occupation. The remainder of such fortune as he had was involved in litigation in New York city, and he was heavily in debt there. These are all the facts found in regard to the libellee's domicile before marriage, and his condition and circumstances, and they show conclusively, it seems to us, that he had no fixed place of abode in New York city and no family or business or other ties to keep him there. His domicile, if he had one there, would seem to have been of the most unsettled character. Indeed the presiding judge goes no farther than to find that his domicile before marriage "apparently" had been in New York, as though the matter was not free from doubt. Under such circumstances the acquisition of a new domicile or a change of domicile will be much more easily and readily inferred than when one has a fixed place of abode and a family and an established business, and associations more or less deeply rooted and permanent. A few days after the marriage the libellee and his wife came to Boston to the Hotel Touraine, where they stayed entertaining their friends and looking around for a house in which to live permanently. They examined various places in the suburbs, but made no choice. The libellee said that he liked Boston and expected to enjoy living there. After they had been in Boston less than two weeks, they went to a health resort in Virginia at the request of the libellee's mother, who was ill there. Before leaving Boston the libellee requested his wife's sister, who lived in Boston, to find a suitable apartment to be occupied by himself and his wife on their return. The sister procured an apartment in Brookline, to which the greater part of the libellee's clothing, which, so far as appears, was all the personal effects that he had, was sent, and for which he and his wife started when they left Virginia on their return about a month later. On the way back from Virginia the libellee, who had expressed uneasiness about his financial affairs and a desire to see his lawyer, stopped off in New York, at his wife's suggestion, to see the lawyer. He put the libellant and her daughter by a former marriage into the train for Boston, and told her he would be in Boston in two days. The libellant never saw him afterwards, although he wrote expressing his intention to come. The presiding judge found, as he could not very well have helped finding, it seems to us on these facts, that the parties intended to take up their residence in this commonwealth when they came to Boston to the Hotel Touraine. He found that they did not intend to live permanently in Boston, but in some suburb when a suitable place of residence could be found. He was not satisfied that the libellee had any intention of returning to this commonwealth to live with his wife when he parted from her in New York.

In Duke v. Duke, 70 N. J. Eq. 135, 62 Atl. 466, affirmed in 72 N. J. Eq. 434, 65 Atl. 1117, the court said that there might be a domicile without an actual present residence, and that there might be a present residence without a domicile. The court goes on to say: "Now, the marks of the domicile are numerous. They include the character of the place, and the acts and declarations of the party in connection therewith; provided, of course, the declarations are made in good faith, sincerely, and ante litem motam."

An interesting question is raised in WINANS v. WINANS, which does not appear to have been squarely passed upon by the court, or, at least, which does not appear to have necessarily been adjudicated by the court in reaching its conclusion. That is, whether or not a party may acquire a domicile within the meaning of the divorce law in a state without acquiring a fixed domicile in any particular locality within the state. A similar question arose in King v. King, 74 N. J. Eq. 824, 71 Atl. 687. In this case a wife who had been deserted by her husband went into New Jersey from another state, and resided for a short time at various places in an effort to find an inexpensive place to live. She finally located in a city permanently, and filed a petition for divorce in less than the statutory period thereafter. The court, however, held that, although she had not been a resident of that particular locality for the requisite length of time, she had been a resident of the state for that period, which satisfied the requirements of the law. The mere fact that she had moved from place to place in an effort to find an inexpensive place to live was immaterial where there was a bona fide intention of remaining a resident of the state. The court said: "Notwithstanding a frequent change of habitation may create a situation by which the proof of an animus manendi becomes difficult, yet, if proved, this, coupled with residence, although migratory, within the territory of the nation or state, equips the resident with a domiciliary status."

W. M. G.

In order to acquire a domicile, both the fact and the intent must concur. Actual residence and the intention to remain either permanently or for an indefinite time, without any fixed or certain purpose to return to the former place of abode, are required to constitute a change of domicile. The length of the residence is immaterial provided the other elements are present and are found to exist. A day or an hour, it has been said, will suffice for the acquisition of a domicile. Jacobs, Domicil, § 134, note. In this case, when the libellee came to Boston with his wife he intended, as the presiding judge has found, to reside permanently in this commonwealth. There was no animus revertendi on his part, and his intention to reside here was not contingent on his finding a suitable place of residence, but the finding of a suitable place of residence was rendered necessary by his determination to take up his abode permanently in this commonwealth. He did not intend to reside in Boston. But having come here with the intention to remain, and with no fixed or certain purpose to return to New York, the place where he was for the time being must be regarded, we think, as his home or domicile, unless it can be said that he did not acquire a domicile here until he had selected the place where he intended to reside permanently. Wilbraham v. Ludlow, 99 Mass. 587; Whitney v. Sherborn, 12 Allen, 111. We do not regard it as necessary that he should have done that. If he had been in itinere on his way from New York to some city or town in this state where he had decided to live, and had stopped for a few days in Boston entertaining friends, and then had gone to Virginia and never had returned to this state, so that he in fact never reached the place where he intended to reside, the case would have stood differently. Briggs v. Rochester, 16 Gray, 337. In that case the fact and intent would not have concurred until he reached his predetermined place of abode, which he would not have done. So, if he had been passing through this commonwealth to some town or city in another state, where he intended to make his home, and had remained for a few days at the Hotel Touraine, or if he had been here for some temporary purpose, like a wedding journey for instance, it is clear that he would not have acquired a domicile in this commonwealth. Shaw v. Shaw, 98 Mass. 158. But this case differs from either of the cases thus supposed. In the case before us the libellee came here with his wife for the purpose of making his home in this commonwealth, though he was undecided as to the particular place in which he would reside. For aught that appears he would have remained here except for his mother's illness, which unexpectedly called him to Virginia. He had no intention to return to New York. An apartment was selected for him and his wife in Brookline, and he took possession of it by sending his clothing to it, though he never in fact occupied it, as to which see Williams v. Roxbury, 12 Gray, 21. Under such circumstances we think that the libellee must be deemed to have acquired a domicile in this commonwealth, and to have lived here with his wife as husband and wife within the meaning of the statute. He was here for a short time only, it is true, but, as we have seen, the acquisition of a domicile does not depend on the length of the residence, and a domicile may be acquired in another state or country, even if the party has not determined in what particular place he will take up his residence. As Chitty, J., said in Craignish v. Hewitt [1892] 3 Ch. 180, 192: "A man may be domiciled in a country without having a fixed habitation in some particular spot in that country." See also Bell v. Kennedy, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 307, 320, per Lord Westbury; White v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790, 13 Am. St. Rep. 896, 8 S. E. 596; Bradley v. Lowry, Speers, Eq. 1, 39 Am. Dec. 142; Dacey, Conf. L. 2d ed. 93 et seq.; Jacobs, Domicil, § 134. For the purposes of taxation or of settlement under the pauper laws, one must be an inhabitant of or have a domicile in some particular municipal division. Briggs v. Rochester, supra. Colton v. Longmeadow, 12 Allen, 598. But all that is required to give the courts jurisdiction in matters of divorce is that the parties shall have lived together as husband and wife in the commonwealth; that is, that they should have had a domicile here. Parties who have come into this commonwealth for the purpose of residing here permanently, without any intention to return to their former places of abode, and who are looking round to find a suitable place in which to live, cannot be said to be in itinere. Nor can their former domicile be said to adhere to them until they have fixed upon a place of abode in this commonwealth. They have abandoned their former domicile without any intention of returning, and with the intention of taking up their residence here, either permanently or for an indefinite time; and from the nature of the case their domicile must be, as already observed, where they are for the time being, although they do not intend to make their home in that particular place, but do mean to make it in the commonwealth into which they have removed. The fact that the libellee may have had no intention of returning to this commonwealth to live with his wife, when he parted from her in New York, is immaterial if he had previously acquired a domicile here.

The case before us differs from Olivieri v. Atkinson, 108 Mass. 28, 46 N. E. 422, and similar cases, inasmuch as it is expressly found in this case that it was the intention of the party whose domicile is in question to reside permanently in this commonwealth.

The result is that, in accordance with the report, a decree nisi on the ground of desertion will be entered for the libellant.

So ordered.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN R. OWENS, Resp't.,

v.

J. R. DAVENPORT et al., Appts.

(39 Mont. 555, 104 Pac. 692.)

Illegal contract — collateral compromise — enforceability.

One who having received an assignment of claims by an employer of labor, in consideration of his furnishing funds with which to pay the laborers, gives a duebill in satisfaction of an order upon himself by the employer for wages due for cutting timber on government land, in consideration of which he requires an assignment of the claim in order to defeat a right to assert a lien on the timber, cannot defeat liability thereon on the ground that the original contract was void, since his promise is a new and independent transaction, and not tainted by the illegality of the original agreement.

(November 8, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Silver Bow County in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying a new trial in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due for cutting certain timber. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Napton & Napton for appellants.

Mr. T. F. Nolan for respondent.

Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover from the defendants the sum of $66.46. The complaint alleges that on December 14, 1905, this plaintiff sold, assigned, and transferred to defendants a certain order in writing, as follows:

Warnock's Camp, Dec. 12, 1905.

J. R. Davenport:—

Please pay to John R. Owens the sum of two hundred and twenty-six and 46-100 ($226.46) dollars, in full payment to date, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and charge the same to my account, and greatly oblige,
F. W. Warnock

That defendants then paid plaintiff therefor $160, and promised and agreed to pay him the further sum of $66.46 in January, 1906, but have failed and refused to do so. The amended answer admits the sale of the order, and that defendants paid therefor $75, but deny they ever promised to pay any further sum. As a special defense it is alleged that plaintiff was employed by Warnock to cut mining timbers; that such timbers were cut from unsurveyed government land; that neither plaintiff nor Warnock had a permit from the government to cut the timber; that payment has not been made to the United States for the timbers so cut; and that the amount sued for herein by plaintiff is a bal-

Note.—Is promise by a third party to pay claim arising out of performance of contract between two other persons tainted by the illegality of that contract.

An express or implied promise by a third person who is a mere depository of money, the proceeds of an illegal contract, to pay same to one of the parties thereto, is not affected by the illegality of such contract, and may be enforced in behalf of the party to whom the promise was made, since such promise and the consideration upon which it is based are both independent of the illegal contract. Tenant v. Elliott, 1 Bos. & P. 3; Farmer v. Russell, 1 Bos. & P. 296; Thomson v. Thomson, 7 Ves. Jr. 471; Sharp v. Taylor, 2 Phill. Ch. 801; McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 43 L. ed. 1117, 19 Sup. But if the person paying the proceeds of an illegal contract to a third person to be paid to one of the parties to the contract withdraws same or revokes his instructions as to payment, the party to the illegal contract to whom payment was to be made cannot enforce payment from the third person acting as depositor. Edgar v. Fowler, 3 East, 222. On this point Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., said: "The money does not appear to have been actually paid into the defendants' hands in case of illegal transactions, it may always be stopped while it is in transitu to the person who is entitled to reance due for the work so done for Warnock. Upon the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the following writing, given to him by defendants, as evidence of the balance due:

Received on account. December 14, 1905, due John Owens $66.46 on Warnock account to be paid in January.

J. R. Davenport.

The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and from such judgment and an order denying them a new trial, defendants appealed.

Only three questions are argued in appellants' brief, and the first of these is disposed of adversely to appellants by the case of Parnell v. Davenport, 36 Mont. 511, 93 Pac. 939, which was a companion case to the one before us.

The second question argued relates to the special defense set forth in the answer. It is contended that the agreement between plaintiff and Warnock, under which the ceive it. If, indeed, this had been a legal transaction, the money might perhaps have been considered as paid, but we will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect. We leave the matter as we find it, and then the maxim applies, Melior est conditio possidentis."

In the foregoing cases the promise to pay was based upon a consideration entirely independent of the illegal contract. OWENS v. DAVENPORT applies the same doctrine where the promise to pay was based upon an assignment of the amount due under an illegal contract. It is the only case found thus applying the doctrine.

The position of the court in that case finds support in language used in Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. ed. 408, to the effect that an express promise by a third person based upon a sufficient consideration, to pay an illegal claim, is not tainted by the illegality. The rule as thus stated, however, was not applied.

Compare with Steers v. Lashley, 6 T. R. 61, wherein Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., said that if a third person had lent money to one of the parties to an illegal contract, to pay the sum due thereon, and had received a bill of exchange for that sum, he could recover on the bill. He, however, added that where the bill of exchange growing out of an illegal contract was merely indorsed to a third person, he could not recover thereon if he knew of the illegality of the original contract.

In Gibson v. Pearsall, 1 E. D. Smith, 90, an agreement by a third person to pay the amount due the landlord under a lease invalid because the premises were leased for an illegal purpose was held, as a matter of law, not to be tainted with the illegality, where the consideration of the promise was a surrender of the premises by the tenant to the third party making the promise.

Compare with Roller v. Murray, 107 Va. 527, 59 S. E. 425, wherein it was stated that a promise by a third person to pay for services performed under an illegal contract was tainted with the illegality of the original contract, and hence was unenforceable, although the consideration was the conveyance by a party thereto, to such third person, of land growing out of the illegal contract. On this point the court said: "As a further argument against the demurrer, it is insisted by counsel for complainant that the demurrant, Mrs. Murray, is a stranger to the contract, and that a stranger to an illegal contract cannot set up the illegality as a defense. The abstract proposition of law, as stated, is doubtless correct, but I do not think the authorities sustain the application of the principle to the situation of this case. The rule applies when the illegality does not appear on plaintiff's own showing, but is brought into the case in an affirmative way by the defendant as matter of defense, as by plea or answer, or where the illegal contract is collateral to the matter in suit. When the illegal contract is the substance of his suit, and the illegality appears by the plaintiff's pleadings, and a demurrer is interposed, or the question is otherwise brought to the attention of the court, the law is, I think, that the illegality thus appearing will defeat the suit." It is to be noted, however, that this case was also disposed of upon the finding as a fact that the third person making the promise was in privity with the parties to the illegal contract.

Jackson v. Baker, 48 Or. 155, 85 Pac. 512, held that money could not be recovered which had been paid by a third person in consideration of the illegal agreement of another to convey to a designated person the legal title to his homestead, after title thereto had been obtained from the United States.

An assignment of money due under an illegal contract is not tainted with the illegality of the contract assigned, and is good between the parties. McBlair v. Gibbs, 17 How. 232, 15 L. ed. 132.

A bank advancing money to enable a party to an illegal contract to carry same out is entitled to recover such money, and an assignment of the proceeds of the contract may be enforced by it to that extent, there being no proof that the bank or any of its officers knew of the illegal contract until the day it was entered into, and no finding that it participated in or furthered same. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Mitchell (Okla.) 103 Pac. 720.

The heirs of a grantee of land who received same in a lottery, subject to an annual ground charge, are estopped from alleging the invalidity of the contract under which their ancestor received the land, as a defense to the payment of the ground rent. Hipple v. Rice, 28 Pa. 406. A. G. S.

work was done by Owens, was illegal, and therefore plaintiff cannot maintain this action upon an account arising out of such agreement. Assuming, without deciding, that, in an action by plaintiff against Warnock for wages, Warnock could have successfully made the defense that the contract from which the wages arose was illegal, still such a defense would have had to be specially pleaded; and, while either party to such agreement can raise the question of illegality, it is quite uniformly held that such a defense cannot be invoked by a third party. Plaintiff, having an order from Warnock for his wages, took it to these defendants, who paid him $160 in cash, and gave him the duebill for the balance. But in order that plaintiff should not assert any claim to a right to a lien upon the timbers he had cut for Warnock, the defendants required him, as a consideration for accepting the order and promising to pay it, that he assign to them his claim against Warnock, thereby waiving any claim of a lien. Assuming, then, that the original agreement between plaintiff and Warnock was illegal, still the new promise of the defendants, evidenced by the duebill, was, we think, so far a new and independent transaction that it is not tainted by the illegality of the original agreement, and can properly be enforced. Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. ed. 468; 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 563.

We cannot see that the case is different from what it would have been had Warnock actually delivered the money to defendants, and defendants promised to pay it to plaintiff. Instead of doing just this, Warnock did substantially the same thing. He assigned to defendants the money coming to him from the Original Mining Company, from the sale of the timbers, and defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff the amount due him from Warnock. In principle just such a case is presented in Barker v. Parker, 23 Ark. 390. There Barker entered into a contract with Ervin, by the terms of which Ervin agreed to pay a certain sum of money to Barker for doing an illegal act. Ervin's promise was evidenced by a bond. After the illegal act had been done, Ervin paid over the money to Parker, who agreed to pay it to Barker, but afterwards refused to do so. Barker brought an action against Parker, and the latter pleaded that the transaction between Barker and Ervin was illegal. But he was not permitted to maintain this defense. The court said: "If the suit had been upon the bond, no doubt but the defense set up in the second plea of defendant, that the bond was executed upon an illegal consideration for services rendered in the abduction of Cloud, would have been a good bar to the action. But the suit was not upon the bond or the illegal contract. Ervin, the principal in the bond, not choosing to avail himself of the illegality of the transaction to avoid payment, delivered the money due upon the bond to the defendant, to be paid over by him to the plaintiff, etc., and he agreed so to pay it over. This was a contract and undertaking on his part; and, though he was a surety of Ervin in the bond, and a party to the original contract, he was as much bound to pay the money over to the plaintiff as a stranger to the illegal contract would have been. If Ervin was willing to pay the money due on the bond, and delivered it to defendant for that purpose, what right had he to put the money in his own pocket, and to say that Ervin was not legally bound to pay the bond, and therefore he would keep the money? None, we think." We agree with this conclusion. See also Terry v. Olcott, 4 Conn. 442.

In closing the argument in their brief, counsel for appellants say: "The cross-examination of witness Davenport was improperly allowed;" but with this we do not agree. We think the evidence adduced well within the rule prescribed in § 8021, Rev. Codes.

The other assignments made in the brief are not argued, and are therefore deemed waived.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

JAMES A. MURRAY, Appt.,
v.

TERRENCE O'BRIEN, Admr., etc., of John Sullivan, Deceased, et al.,

MERCANTILE INVESTMENT COMPANY,
Intervener, etc., Resp't.

(56 Wash. 361, 105 Pac. 840.)

Mortgage — tender by co-owner.

1. The owner of a half interest in a parcel of real estate has a right to tender the amount due on a mortgage on the other half

Note. — Effect of tender after maturity but before foreclosure to discharge lien of mortgage.

The earlier cases on this question are gathered in a note to Parker v. Beasley, 33 L.R.A. 231. The cases gathered here, therefore, are only those since decided.

It will be noticed from the above note, as to the effect of tender made after maturity, but before foreclosure, there is much conflict of authority. The reason for this conflict seems to be due to the existence of two theories in regard to the nature of mortgages,—one, the common-law theory, interest, and be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and intervene in the foreclosure suit.

Tender — grounds — protection of owner.

2. The holder of a mortgage on a half interest in a parcel of real estate cannot refuse a tender by the owner of the other half interest, on the ground that he is attempting to gain an advantage over his co-owner.

Same — payment into court — loss of rights.

3. The owner of a half interest in a parcel of real estate will not lose his right to subrogation to the rights of a mortgagee on the other half interest, by paying the amount due into court in a proceeding for the foreclosure of the mortgage, without making a formal tender thereof to the mortgagee.

Same — source of funds.

4. A mortgagee cannot reject a tender of the amount due on the mortgage, because of objections to the source from which the money comes.

Mortgage — tender out of court — effect on lien.

5. The lien of a mortgage cannot be discharged by a tender of the amount due thereon out of court pending an action to foreclose the mortgage.

Same — destruction of lien — removal of cloud.

6. A tender out of court of the amount due on a mortgage in process of foreclosure will not be permitted to destroy the lien of the mortgage as a basis for affirmative relief by removal of the record as a cloud on title, without actual payment of the amount due.

Interest — mortgage — effect of tender.

7. One who refuses an unqualified tender of the amount due on a mortgage, believing it to be to his advantage to do so, will not be allowed interest on the debt after the date of the tender.

(December 16, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Superior Court for King County in intervenor's favor in a suit to foreclose a mortgage on a one-half interest in certain real estate in which the Mercantile Investment Company, the owner of the other one-half interest, by intervention sought to be subrogated to the rights of the

that a mortgage is an absolute conveyance with the legal title in the mortgagee; and the other, that a mortgage is merely a security for the debt. As was said in Dickerson v. Simmons, 141 N. C. 325, 53 S. E. 850, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 301: "In those jurisdictions where the mortgage is treated simply as a security to a debt, the rule is that a mortgage is discharged by a proper tender made at any time before foreclosure, and that a sale under the power is void. In those more numerous jurisdictions where the common-law doctrines prevail, the lien of the mortgage is not discharged by the tender, the only effect being to arrest the accruing of interest and to free the debtor from future costs. If the mortgagor desires by his tender to discharge the lien, when it is not accepted, he must bring his suit by redemption and pay the money into court."

In the Dickerson Case, supra, the common-law theory was evidently followed, and it was held that a mere tender of the mortgage debt after maturity does not discharge the mortgage lien.

In Stone v. Billings, 63 Ill. App. 371, affirmed in 167 Ill. 170, 47 N. E. 372, it was held that under a trust deed conditioned that the whole debt might be declared due and the trust deed foreclosed upon thirty days' default in the payment of interest and taxes, and containing a provision in regard to releasing certain portions of the property from the lien of the trust deed, no release can be claimed where the tender to obtain such release was made pendente lite forty-five days after the bill was filed. It also appeared, from the opinion in the higher court, that there was no offer contained in any of the mortgagor's pleadings keeping the tender good, or to pay the required amount.

However, in McClung v. Missouri Trust Co. 137 Mo. 106, 38 S. W. 578, it was said that whatever the law may be elsewhere, it seems that the tendency of the decisions of this court is to the effect that a tender of the debt and interest secured by a mortgage, though made after default, destroys the mortgage lien.

But in Hudson Bros. Commission Co. v. Glencoe Sand & Gravel Co. 140 Mo. 103, 62 Am. St. Rep. 722, 41 S. W. 450, the court, after quoting from the McClung Case what was there stated to be the general rule, but which in fact was not followed, concluded by saying: "Our opinion is that a tender of the amount due on a mortgage debt, made after default, should not on principle discharge the mortgage, and should have no greater effect on the security than it has on the debt itself, and that the result will be the same whether the mortgagee holds the legal title in trust, or as a mere security."

See in connection with this case MURRAY v. O'BRIEN.

In Knollenberg v. Nixon, 171 Mo. 445, 94 Am. St. Rep. 790, 72 S. W. 41, the court after reviewing many authorities concluded by saying: "It thus appears that this court, with respect to the effect of a tender after due of a debt secured by a deed of trust or mortgage, adheres to the common-law rule,—that is, its only effect is to stop the running of interest on the debt from that time,—but that in pursuance of statutory enactment (§§ 2937, 2938, Rev. Stat. 1889), and upon principles of equity, it has gone farther, and holds that in order that the tender may extinguish the mort-mortgagee after alleged tender of the amount due on the mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovel, & Ramsey, with Messrs. Trumbull & Trumbull, for appellant:

The petitioner has not such an interest in the matter in litigation between the original parties as entitles him to intervene.

Westland Pub. Co. v. Royal, 36 Wash. 399, 78 Pac. 1096; McNamara v. Crystal Min. Co. 23 Wash. 26, 62 Pac. 81; Davis v. Flagg, 35 N. J. Eq. 491; Morris v. Tut-hill, 72 N. Y. 575; Lamb v. Montague, 112 Mass. 352; Butler v. Taylor, 5 Gray, 455; Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 89; Jones, Mortg. 6th ed. § 792.

The complaint in intervention does not state a cause of action on the theory of subrogation, because subrogation takes place by operation of law, and all the intervenor had to do was to pay the indebtedness or deposit the amount in court, and equity would have subrogated him as far as he had paid the share of the owners of the other undivided half, without any assignment or intervention.

Lamb v. Montague and Ellsworth v. Lockwood, supra; 1 Jones, Mortg. 6th ed. § 874; Sheldon, Subrogation, § 45.

The right of subrogation arises by operation of law only when there has been a payment and extinguishment of the mortgage by one entitled to redeem.

Sheldon, Subrogation, §§ 6-45 & 173.

It is an actual payment to the creditor which raises the equitable right to be subrogated to his remedies.

As it does not appear that the money which it is alleged was tendered to the plaintiff was deposited with the court, the alleged tender would be no defense to the foreclosure of the mortgage.

If one desires to make a tender which shall destroy the lien of an encumbrance and have, so far as concerns it, the effect of payment, he must make an absolute tender of payment, which, if received, will discharge the debt and the encumbrance.

Frost v. Yonkers Sav. Bank, 70 N. Y. 553, 26 Am. Rep. 627; Tuthill v. Morris, 81 N. Y. 94; Werner v. Tuch, 127 N. Y. 217, 21 Am. St. Rep. 443, 27 N. E. 845; 27 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1406.

gage lien it must be kept up, . . . which is practically much the same thing as a bill in equity by the mortgagor or those holding under him to redeem.

"It follows that there is no such thing in this state as the forfeiture of the lien of a deed of trust or mortgage, by tendering the amount due which is secured thereby, although refused by the holder of the mortgage, but the only effect of such tender is to stop the running of interest after that time, unless the tender be kept up, which amounts to nothing more nor less than the payment of the mortgage debt, less the interest, from the time of the tender; for if by the tender the lien is forfeited, it is forfeited eo instante, and cannot be reinstated by keeping up the tender."

In Wittmeier v. Tidwell, 147 Ala. 354, 40 So. 983, it was held that a sale under a mortgage containing a clause making the indebtedness secured by the mortgage due immediately upon sale, or transfer by the mortgagor, of the property, is invalid where the amount due upon the mortgage is tendered before any steps are taken to sell under the power.

ern Canada Mortg. Corp. 32 Ont. Rep. 428. It was held that a tender of the sum due under a mortgage, which did not reach the person making the sale until a few minutes after the sale had been made, came too late to defeat a suit for specific performance of the contract of sale by the purchaser against the mortgagee.

It should be stated here that there are cases concerning mortgages containing a clause making the indebtedness secured due immediately upon the mortgagor failing to meet a payment or to perform some act, in which the question was raised whether foreclosure could be defeated by a tender, after default, of the amount, not due on the mortgage, but due at the time of the default. These cases, of course, are not in point in this note.

The question of effect of tender after default of amount due under chattel mortgage is discussed in a note to Thomas v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co. 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1165.

Effect of tender before maturity of debt to discharge lien of mortgage, see note to Pyross v. Fraser, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 403.

An unaccepted tender of money in payment of a debt secured by a mortgage on land, made after the day prescribed for payment, does not impair the lien of the mortgage, being neither a performance of the condition nor a satisfaction of the debt; its only effect is to stop the running of interest, and to put the mortgagor to his remedy in equity.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves only matters in controversy between plaintiff and the Mercantile Investment Company, intervener. No reference will be made to other parties.

On the 22d day of April, 1897, one John Sullivan made, executed, and delivered to the United States Mortgage & Trust Com- 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

pany, of New York, a certain note for the sum of $75,000. This note was secured by a mortgage of even date, covering lots 4 and 5 in the addition to the city of Seattle, platted by Carson D. Boren and Arthur A. Denny. On the 26th day of September, 1900, John Sullivan died in King county, and the defendant Terrence O'Brien was thereafter appointed administrator of his estate. The estate being without present funds to meet the note and mortgage on the due date, the administrator, acting under the order and direction of the court, obtained an extension of the mortgage until the 1st day of May, 1907. Further extensions were made, so that the note has been at all times a live demand and the mortgage a subsisting lien upon the property charged. On the 30th day of April, 1906, the United States Mortgage & Trust Company, in consideration of the then present worth of the note and mortgage and a bonus of $500, assigned the securities to James A. Murray, the plaintiff, and he has been at all times since, and is now, the owner and holder thereof. Sullivan in his lifetime had reduced the principal indebtedness in the sum of $15,000, so that on the 20th day of April, 1908, the date upon which this action was begun, there was due the principal sum of $60,000, with interest from April 1st, and $1,500 being the interest from November 1, 1907, to April 1, 1908. The latter amount was evidenced by a promissory note executed by the administrator under the order and direction of the court. Plaintiff asked that the property be sold in accordance with the usual forms in such cases. On March 23, 1909, the Mercantile Investment Company asked leave to intervene. Its petition was granted by the court. Its complaint in intervention sets up, among other things, that ever since the 5th day of December, 1908, it has been, and is now, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Washington, and is authorized to purchase, hold, acquire, sell, and dispose of real and personal property. After reciting the death of Sullivan and the consequent probate proceedings, the execution of the note and mortgage, and plaintiff's claim to be the owner and holder thereof, it is alleged that ever since the 4th day of January, 1909, it has been the owner of an undivided interest in the property, and that the other interest, being one half thereof, is owned by Corwin S. Shank and wife and Edward Corcoran and Charles P. O'Neill and wife; that plaintiff had refused to grant an extension of time for the payment of the note and mortgage, or to assign his securities without recourse or otherwise; that it was ready, able, and willing to take up the mortgage, and to pay to plaintiff the principal, interest, costs, and attorneys' fees; that the amount thereof had been furnished by attorneys for plaintiff; that it was willing to pay the same if the note and mortgage were assigned to it without recourse against plaintiff, or if, upon its making such payment, it be subrogated to the rights of plaintiff in the note and mortgage and in the foreclosure suit. Intervener further alleged that its co-owners were unable to pay the one half of the amount then due, and that plaintiff, with intent to embarrass and defeat the right of the intervener, had threatened to dismiss his foreclosure suit and satisfy the lien of his mortgage and the debt secured thereby if it paid the whole thereof.

On the 20th day of March, 1909, the intervener had begun an independent action against plaintiff, setting up, in substance, the same matters which are recited in its petition for intervention, and praying for an order enjoining and restraining plaintiff and his attorneys from satisfying the mortgage or dismissing the foreclosure proceeding in the event of payment by the intervener. After formal proceedings had, an order was made by the court restraining plaintiff and his attorneys of record, and all other agents and attorneys then employed or thereafter to be employed by him, from satisfying the note and mortgage, and from dismissing the foreclosure suit, in case a tender of the amount due was made by the intervener, which the order recited it was about to do. Accordingly, on the 25th day of March, 1909, the intervener tendered plaintiff's attorneys, at their office in Seattle, the full sum of $68,654.67, being the full amount of principal, interest, costs, and attorneys' fees then due upon the mortgage. In this tender the intervener said: "The Mercantile Investment Company has instituted suit against you in the superior court of the state of Washington for King county, and seeks to be subrogated to all of the rights of James A. Murray under the notes and mortgage mentioned in the above-entitled suit, and also in the above-entitled suit. The Mercantile Investment Company has also intervened in the above-entitled suit, and in its complaint in intervention also seeks to be subrogated to all of the rights of James A. Murray under such notes and mortgage and in the above-entitled suit. This tender is made for the purpose of protecting the title of the Mercantile Investment Company in the property described in your complaint in the foreclosure suit, and to obtain subrogation by the Mercantile Investment Company to all of the rights of said James A. Murray." Upon the written offer of tender, attorneys for plaintiff indorsed over their signature the following: "Said tender is refused for the reason that it is not made for the purpose of paying and discharging said mortgage." Thereupon a tender was made in all respects similar to the first, omitting only the last sentence. This offer was also acknowledged, and upon the writing the attorneys indorsed the following: "The above refused for the purpose set forth in the notice." A third notice of tender was then written out, in words and figures following: "The Mercantile Investment Company now makes you a third tender of the amount mentioned in the previous tenders this day made, being the full amount of the notes and mortgage,—principal, interest, costs, and attorneys' fees. The Mercantile Investment Company is the owner of an undivided half interest in the property described in the mortgage, is not personally liable for the amount or any part thereof, and now tenders you the above amount without any qualification, and requests you to accept such tender." Upon this offer the attorneys wrote over their signature the one word "Refused." Following these tenders the intervener obtained leave to, and did, file an amended complaint in the intervention, in which, in addition to the allegations contained in its first complaint, it set up the several tenders to which we have alluded, and asked that, because of the refusal to accept them or any of them, the court enter a decree holding that the lien of plaintiff's mortgage be canceled, and, further, that the court decree the debt to be discharged, for the reason that there having been no formal presentation of the debt to the administrator of the Sullivan estate, the lien being lost, the debt was barred by the statute of nonclaim. Balinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 6228 (Pierce's Code, § 2533).

We have endeavored to epitomize the record so as to point out only the particular facts which moved the trial court to enter its decree in favor of the intervener. Appellant suggests a number of reasons why the decree of the court should not be sustained, among others, that the intervener is not entitled to intervene or to any standing as a party; that the facts set up by it are insufficient to state a cause for intervention; that, being the owner of a one-half of the property, it cannot make a valid tender; that no valid tender was made; that a tender made out of court during the pendency of an action does not discharge the lien of a mortgage; and that, in any event, the court erred in denying his right to recover the debt from the estate of John Sullivan. The first several grounds upon which appellant stands are without merit. The pleadings and the proofs show that respondent has a valid and subsisting interest in the property, and its right to protect that interest in any manner or by any method sanctioned by the law cannot be questioned. The right of subrogation, under the better rule, applies in cases where a party who has an interest in the property, and who does not stand as a mere volunteer, pays a debt owing in whole or in part by another to protect his own rights or to save his own property. The remedy is no longer limited to sureties and quasi sureties, but is freely applied by courts of equity in all cases where good conscience and equity dictate that a debt paid by one under any sort of legal coercion ought to be paid by another. Arnold v. Green, 116 N. Y. 571, 23 N. E. 1; Parsons v. Urie, 104 Md. 238, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559, 64 Atl. 927, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 278; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 798, 799; Re Bruce (D. C.) 158 Fed. 123; Beach, Modern Law of Eq. Jur. 802-804; Twombly v. Cassidy, 82 N. Y. 155; Kinhead v. Ryan, 65 N. J. Eq. 726, 55 Atl. 730. In Cottrell's Appeal, 23 Pa. 294, the court said: "Subrogation is founded on principles of equity and benevolence, and may be decreed where no contract or privity of any kind exists between the parties. Wherever one not a mere volunteer discharges the debt of another, he is entitled to all the remedies which the creditor possessed against the debtor." Chief Justice Marshall said in Lidderdale v. Robinson, 2 Brock. 159, Fed. Cas. No. 8,337: "Where a purchaser has paid money for which others were responsible, the equitable claim which such payment gives him on those who were so responsible shall be clothed with the legal garb with which the contract he has discharged was invested, and he shall be substituted to every equitable intent and purpose in the place of the creditor whose claim he has discharged." Under these rules, respondent had a right to invoke the aid of the court, and, so long as appellant was not asked to take less than the burden of his bond, he cannot complain or question the procedure when the court is acting within its jurisdiction. The interest creates the right and puts in motion the maxim that a court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction of the property, will do complete justice as between the parties interested therein.

The reasons assigned by appellant for refusing the relief sought by respondent are fanciful, rather than real. It is hinted, rather than openly asserted, that it was manifest to him that respondent was undertaking to gain an advantage over its co-owners, and, if he had met the demands of respondent, under the orders of the court, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

some damage or prejudice would have resulted to them. Testimony is also cited showing that the co-owners were willing to pay their share of the debt. It is enough to say that the law puts upon appellant no duty to protect others. Reason and experience alike teach us that the courts may be relied upon to apply those general rules of equity ample in all cases to protect the rights of all who invoke them. In this case there is nothing to indicate any outrage upon, or attempted infringement of, the rights of the co-owners; certainly nothing that would warrant the interposition of appellant in their behalf. As for their willingness to pay their share of the debt, the answer is that there is nothing in the record to show that that privilege was, or is now, denied them. On the other hand, we think it was entirely unnecessary for the respondent to approach an attempted settlement of this case in the manner in which it did. It might and should have relied upon the court whose jurisdiction it had also invoked. Respondent might have paid the money into court without the formal declarations of tender, and the court would have been warranted in making such orders as might be necessary for its protection. A satisfaction of the debt by appellant would not have killed the obligation or worked a forfeiture of its rights. The court had jurisdiction of the property, with power to enter an order recognizing the subrogation; for it is not created by the order, but follows as the legal consequence of the acts of the parties. Look v. Horn, 97 Me. 283, 54 Atl. 725; Shaffer v. McCloskey, 101 Cal. 576, 36 Pac. 196; 2 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. 921, 1211 et seq.; 5 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. 921.

The point is also made that the pleadings and the tender show that they were made in behalf of another, or others who have been induced to loan the amount then due appellant, and might therefore be ignored for that reason. What we have already said disposes of this contention. Where and upon what terms respondent got the money to tender is of no concern to appellant. The law does not give him the right to reject an offer, because he objects to the source from which the money comes. Eslow v. Mitchell, 26 Mich. 500.

Being of the opinion that the intervener has a right to maintain its standing in court, we now come to the main issue. The trial court was controlled in its judgment by the case of Thomas v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co. 48 Wash. 560, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1164, 125 Am. St. Rep. 945, 94 Pac. 116, wherein the court held that a tender of the amount due on a mortgage on law day, which by construction has been extended to any time before suit brought, discharged the lien of the mortgage, and that, having been so made, the tender need not be kept good by bringing the money into court. We are satisfied with that decision, and, unless the contention of the appellant that, action having been begun, the lien of the mortgage cannot be discharged by a tender made out of court, is well founded, the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed. In justice to the trial court we feel bound to say that the decree rendered by it is sustained by the leading case of Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 343, 78 Am. Dec. 145, and other cases upon which the Thomas Case is made to rest. But a re-examination of that case, and of the other cases referred to in the Thomas decision, and those cited and relied upon by the respondent, convinces us that the reason for the rule ceases when an action is instituted to recover the debt, and that it should be given no application except in those cases where, at common law, a party was entitled to a discharge of a lien upon property by payment or tender of payment inter partes before or upon law day. From the first the courts have been fertile in their reasons for refusing to extend the doctrine here invoked to cases where questions other than the mere payment of money were involved. In all the cases cited by respondent to sustain the judgment of the lower court it appears that the primary purpose of the tender was to discharge the debt. But in this case it is not entirely so. In Kortright v. Cady the law was exhausted by the learned judge who wrote the opinion. It was there held that the law day of the common law should be held to be, considering the changed character of the mortgage, any day before foreclosure and sale. Accepting the rule that the tender will be effectual to discharge the lien if made at any time before foreclosure, it becomes material to inquire the meaning of that term,—whether it means the commencement of an action, or a final decree of foreclosure and sale. Considering the reasons upon which the rule of discharge by tender rests,—that is, that the law day continued after the due date of an obligation and until action brought, and that a lien can be defeated by a tender made within that time,—it would seem to follow as of course that “foreclosure” and “law day” are synonymous terms in the sense that it is a time when the mortgagor declares a default and submits his cause to a court of competent jurisdiction. The word “foreclosure,” as it is used in the authorities bearing on this question, must be taken in that meaning which is common and generally accepted by the laity as well as the bar; that is, the institution of a suit, or 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the “law day,” as contradistinguished from the “law day” of the common law. The logic of the decisions is that a lien should be discharged by tender only when made before action brought, and that thereafter it ought to be tendered in court, or, if made after the writ has issued, it should be at least kept good by the plea tout temps prist.

In speaking of the subject of tender generally, it is said in Coghlan v. South Carolina R. Co. (C. C.) 32 Fed. 316: “But when an action has already been commenced and is pending, if the defendant be disposed to admit the demand in part, it is not only necessary that he should offer to pay the amount admitted in the same way as the tender before suit should be made, but he must go further, and either pay the sum admitted into court, or, at the least, offer to submit to a judgment for that sum.” In the case of Whittaker v. Belvidere Roller Mill Co. 55 N. J. Eq. 674, 38 Atl. 289, a case somewhat similar to the one at bar, it was held that, when a tender is made after suit is begun and is then urged as a defense, the money must be paid into court. In Weeks v. Baker, 152 Mass. 20, 24 N. E. 905, from which quotation is made in the Thomas Case, the court said: “The rights of a party to an action are ordinarily to be determined as of the time of bringing the suit.” We make this distinction between the case of Kortright v. Cady and the rule as we believe it should be. The logic of the Kortright Case is that the law day continued from the due date of the obligation to the final decree of foreclosure and sale; whereas, we hold that the law day within which a lien may be discharged by tender inter partes continues only to the time of the issuance of the writ, or, under the Code practice, until the commencement of the action.

Because of the unusual importance of this case, we feel warranted in going further, and calling attention to another limitation upon the rights of a mortgagor, or one claiming under him, to discharge the lien of a mortgage by the tender of the mortgage debt. Although the rule as contended for was originally declared in New York, it has been repeatedly held, even in that state, that it will not avail one who is seeking affirmative relief. Tuthill v. Morris, 81 N. Y. 94; Becker v. Boon, 61 N. Y. 322; Halpin v. Phenix Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 165, 23 N. E. 482; also, Landis v. Saxton, 89 Mo. 375, 1 S. W. 359. While we cannot indorse all of the reasons upon which some of the foregoing cases are made to rest, they are pertinent at least to show the disposition of the courts to evade the full rigor of the rule as laid down in the Kortright Case.

Counsel for the respondent rightfully contends that his last tender cannot be measured by the two qualified or conditional tenders immediately preceding it, but, the law day having been declared by the institution of the action to foreclose the mortgage in which respondent had appeared as a party, its tender can, and should, in the interest of that equity which shuns the suggestion of a forfeiture, be measured by the prayer of its complaint in the independent action as well as the original petition for intervention. When so considered, it requires no far reach of the imagination to say that it was made in aid of the affirmative relief there sought, and as a basis for the filing of the amended petition in intervention in which a cancellation of the debt was asked and obtained by order of the court. In other words, respondent now asks that, since the substance (the mortgage) has been annihilated, the cloud (the record and the debt) which over-shadows the title be removed. It seeks to turn a shield of defense into a weapon of offense. We feel sure that no cases will be found which carry the rule of tender and discharge of a mortgage lien to this extent. It is not equity. Orderly procedure as well as the assurance that the rights of litigants will be protected to their fullest extent alike require that those who submit their causes to the courts should not go beyond the forum to establish their own case or to destroy that of their adversary.

It does not follow from what we have said in this opinion that respondent did not have the right to tender the amount of the debt, and thereby secure such other advantages as may come to it under the accepted rules of law and equity. While at law the rule that a tender must be kept good by payment in court is well-nigh universal, it is not so in equity. A willingness to pay may be sufficient. Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, §§ 5176, 5177 (Pierce's Code, §§ 1113, 1114), provides that money may be paid into court, and thus arrest interest and costs. But, independent of these statutes, courts will apply the rules of equity when it is necessary to do equal justice between the parties. In the following cases the equities were such that the benefit of a tender was not lost by a failure to pay the amount in court: Whelan v. Reilly, 61 Mo. 565; Parker v. Beasley, 116 N. C. 1, 33 L.R.A. 231, 21 S. E. 955; Hill v. Carter, 101 Mich. 158, 59 N. W. 413; Mankel v. Belscamper, 84 Wis. 218, 54 N. W. 500. Appellant is here seeking equity. He must do equity. Remembering that respondent has gone into court averring its willingness to pay all that was due appellant, which was followed by an unconditional tender and appellant's unwarranted refusal to accept it, apparently hoping to gain some personal advantage over respondent, it would seem that in equity he should not claim anything for the use of the money. The law of tender is as much for the benefit of the creditor as the debtor. The creditor cannot refuse a tender believing it to be to his advantage to do so, and thereafter insist in equity that an unqualified tender has not been made good. Under such conditions, willingness to pay is all that the law requires. The plea of willingness being in the record, we hold that appellant is estopped to claim interest from the date of the tender. In the case of Cheney v. Bilby, 20 C. C. A. 291, 36 U. S. App. 720, 74 Fed. 52, where similar equities were involved, and many relevant cases are cited, Judge Caldwell said: "Upon the soundest principles of equity and fair dealing, Cheney is estopped, on the facts of this case, from claiming interest on the notes after tender of payment. . . . When he refused payment of the principal of the notes, and, in the hope of winning a great stake, asserted a conscienceless forfeiture, which he could not maintain, even in a court of law, he put the interest on the money tendered to the hazard. He chanced it and lost."

The case is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to enter a judgment and decree of foreclosure for the sum of $68,654.37, unless such sum be theretofore paid by respondent to appellant, in which event the court will make such order as will protect the equities of all parties to the suit.

Fullerton, J., concurs in the result.

Morris, J., specially concurring:

John Sullivan, who made the note and executed the mortgage in controversy, is dead. Such note was never presented as a claim against his estate, and is now barred by the statute. There is none against whom this debt can be enforced as a personal, binding obligation. So that to hold with the court below means a decree of a court of equity wiping out an indebtedness of nearly $70,000 upon an interpretation of the law which heretofore, so far as I have been able to gather from the books, has been applied only to the extent of destroying the lien of the security, but leaving the debt remaining as an enforceable obligation. Tender has never been held to be payment, yet to hold with respondent here means to so construe tender as applied to mortgages to make it in effect payment. I can find neither equity nor good conscience in such a rule. If, as in the cases cited in support of respondent's position, the debt still remained and could be enforced as a personal obligation, so that the creditor would not lose his right to seek the payment of his debt, either in this proceeding or in a separate action at law, and the only effect of the tender and its refusal was to destroy the lien given as security for the payment of the debt, I could readily subscribe to the doctrine of Kortright v. Cady. In such a case the rule there announced is an equitable one, its logic irresistible, its law uncontroversial, it is the only result of premises always admitted to be true; that the mortgagor has the same right after as before a default to pay his debt and relieve his land from an encumbrance; and, that payment being actually made, the lien thereby becomes extinct. Based upon these two legal principles, Comstock, Ch. J., in his opinion in the Kortright Case, adds: "We have, then, only to apply an admitted principle in the law of tender, which is that tender is equivalent to payment as to all things which are incidental and accessorial to the debt. The creditor, by refusing to accept, does not forfeit his right to the very thing tendered, but he does lose all collateral benefits or securities." Davies, J., in his opinion in the same case reasons it out that "it has never occurred to any judge to argue that a pawnee was in great peril and in danger of losing the benefit of his pawn by the enforcement of the well-settled rule that a tender of the amount of the loan and interest, and refusal, extinguished the lien on the pawn. Littleton well says that it shall be accounted a man's own folly that he refused the money when a lawful tender of it was made to him. The only effect upon the rights of the mortgagee is that the land or thing pledged is released from the lien, but the debt remaineth." The reason of the rule, then, as given in Kortright v. Cady, is that it is only the incidental, the accessorial, thing that is lost by the refusal to accept the tender, not that there was danger "of losing the benefit of the pawn," but only the lien on the pawn. While, if we apply the rule here, not only the incidental and accessorial thing is extinguished, but the thing itself is in effect extinguished. Not only the lien on the pawn is lost, but the danger, which "it has never occurred to any judge to argue," has come to the appellant. He has not only found himself in peril of loss, but he has lost the "benefit of his pawn." What, then, was intended as an equitable rule and one of good conscience would, if extended to cases where not only the security but the debt itself was lost, become a most inequitable rule and one of oppression. I am willing to subscribe to the rule, then, in cases where the debt remains and can still be enforced as a personal obligation. I am not willing to subscribe to it where the personal obligation of the debt has been lost and the tender would take effect, not only as destroying the lien, but as likewise destroying all claim and right of the creditor to the debt itself.

This has appeared to me to be the equitable solution of the rule, and for these reasons I concur in the result.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, the plaintiff below, commenced this action against the respondent to recover damages for failure to deliver four car loads of shingles and mixed lumber and shingles. The case was tried to a jury, which returned a verdict for the respondent. From a judgment of dismissal entered upon the verdict, the plaintiff has appealed.

The complaint states four causes of action based upon four separate orders. In the third cause of action, which is illustrative of the others except as hereafter noted, it is alleged, in substance, that the appellant and the respondent entered into a contract of purchase and sale as evidenced by an order and the reply thereto, which, omitting immaterial parts, is as follows:

Dear Sirs:—

Your order No. 729X has been received. We accept and enter same for shipment in accordance with the terms thereon. We anticipate making shipment on or about _____. At prices annexed, we would like to move the following stock: _____.

Yours very truly,
E. J. McNeeley & Company, per _____.

The order in the first cause of action is for 50,000 described shingles, with directions to "fill car 6-2 Ex. * A * R. C. Shingles." The order in the second cause of action is for 75,000 designated shingles, with directions: "Balance 6-2 extra. * A * R. C. Shgls. And "small car preferred." Shipping directions in the fourth cause of action were: "Ship to order of Bonds Foster Lumber Company, at Aurora, Nebraska. How ship: Billings care B. & M. R. When: Soon as possible. Terms: Regular f. o. b., Aurora, Nebraska. Sixty cent rate." This cause of action was assigned to the appellant. Each of the acceptances, except on the third cause of action, was upon the respondent's stationery, which had printed thereon, above the typewritten acceptance, the name of the respondent, illustration of shingles, capacity of its mills, specialties, etc., including the words: "Quotations subject to change without notice. Contracts made at home office only and contingent upon exigencies of transportation and accidents beyond our control." Similar typewritten matter was upon the letter heads of the appellant. The respondent interposed three affirmative defenses to each cause of action except the third, which in substance are: (1) That it accepted the order by letter upon its letter head, which contained the printed matter just quoted; that at the time of the acceptance of the order and continuing until April 5, 1907, there was a great shortage of railroad cars in the state of Washington and in the country generally for use in transporting lumber and shingles, and that cars could not be procured for such purpose except in limited numbers inadequate for the handling of the lumber and shingle business of the state and of the country generally; that by reason thereof manufacturers and sellers of such commodities were unable to procure cars, which facts were at all times known to the appellant; that between January 26 and April 5, 1907, by reason of storms, washouts, and other acts of God preventing railway companies operating in this and other lumber producing states, railroads could not furnish any cars for transporting lumber and shingles; that the car embargo could not have been foreseen; that on account thereof, the market price of lumber and shingles appreciated. (2) That there was a general custom and a special one between the appellant and the respondent, that such contracts were contingent upon the exigencies of transportation and accidents beyond the control of the parties; that when delivery of such commodities has been delayed until a reasonable time has expired in which to make delivery, without fault on the part of the seller, and where delivery would inflict a loss upon either of the parties, compliance with the contract is excused; that this custom was well known to the parties, and the contract was made with reference thereto. The car embargo and the rise in the price of lumber and shingles is alleged as in the first defense. (3) That there is a particular custom in the lumber trade known to the appellant, and in giving or accepting an order the parties contracted in reference thereto; that all orders in writing are accepted contingent upon the exigencies of transportation and accidents beyond the control of the parties. The shortage of cars and the rise in the price of lumber is alleged as in the first defense. The first affirmative defense is omitted as to the third cause of action; the acceptance there being on a postcard not containing the printed matter on the respondent's letter head. The failure of respondent to deliver the material is admitted, and it seeks to excuse performance in the manner pleaded.

It now asserts, however, that it was the duty of the purchaser to furnish the cars for loading, and that, failing to do so, there can be no recovery. Notwithstanding the fact that this view is inconsistent with the claim that the acceptance of the order was subject to the exigencies of transportation, we will consider it as it may arise upon a retrial of the cause. Where the contract is 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

otherwise silent as to who shall furnish the cars, the term "f. o. b. cars," as applied to ordinary commercial commodities, means that the goods shall be free on board the cars, that is, loaded without expense to the purchaser, and that the seller shall procure and load them. Hurst v. Altamont Mfg. Co. 73 Kan. 422, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 928, 117 Am. St. Rep. 525, 85 Pac. 551, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 549; Vogt v. Schienebeck, 122 Wis. 491, 67 L.R.A. 756, 106 Am. St. Rep. 989, 100 N. W. 820, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 814; John O'Brien Lumber Co. v. Wilkinson, 117 Wis. 468, 94 N. W. 337; Elliott v. Howison, 146 Ala. 568, 40 So. 1018. In the Hurst Case, 73 Kan. 429, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 933, 117 Am. St. Rep. 525, 85 Pac. 554, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 549, it is said: "It is our understanding that the phrase or formula 'f. o. b. cars' has by long usage and custom acquired throughout the business circles of this country a definite and specific meaning generally understood by all business people. When such phrase or formula is used in a business contract between a buyer and seller of ordinary commercial commodities, where the use of a common carrier is necessary, the parties intend thereby that the seller will at his own expense do all that may be necessary to accomplish the loading and consignment of the goods to the buyer, including the procuring of cars upon which to load the commodities sold; and, when nothing appears to modify or limit this meaning, courts should enforce the contract so as to effectuate this intent. This rule is reasonable. It harmonizes with existing business conditions, and is the universal practice among business people. It is conceded that, by this phrase, the seller is bound to deliver the goods to the buyer by placing them on board the cars. How can he do this unless he secures the cars? Why say that this duty belongs to the buyer? The language of the contract is silent upon this question. By the letter of the agreement it may be said that neither party has agreed to perform this duty, but it may not be said that there was no understanding upon this subject. Without such an undertaking, the contract would be incomplete and unenforceable. What the parties intended upon this subject can only be ascertained by interpretation, and, to do this, the situation of the parties when the contract was made, the subject-matter thereof, and all the attendant circumstances and conditions, must be considered." In the Vogt Case, discussing the meaning of the phrase (122 Wis. 499, 67 L.R.A. 760, 106 Am. St. Rep. 989, 100 N. W. 823, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 814), the court said: "Whether such meaning includes, under the circumstances of this case, the duty of the seller to procure the cars in place for his use in loading the merchandise,—and evidence is not permissible to show the existence of a custom which the parties contracted with reference thereto,—is not altogether plain, but we are constrained to hold that it does." In the Elliott Case, 146 Ala., at page 501, it is said: "In the case at bar the seller undertook to accomplish the delivery of the things sold, free on board the cars. We think it comports with reason to hold that by necessary implication he agreed to supply all means to accomplish such result,—the cars upon which the shipments of piles were to be made." The authorities cited by the respondent, holding that the term implies that the buyer shall procure the cars, are discussed, distinguished, and disapproved in the case of Hurst v. Altamont Mfg. Co., supra. It must, however, be conceded that there is a conflict of authority on this question, but we think not only that the rule we have stated is a correct interpretation of the phrase, but that universal usage in this state has given it the meaning which the language imports. The language, however, in this case, "We accept and enter same for shipment. . . . We anticipate making shipment,"—cannot be given any other rational meaning.

The court instructed the jury, in substance, that they should determine from all the evidence what the contract was; that in so doing it was proper for them to consider whether the printed matter on the letter heads forms a part of the contract; that ordinarily such matter, if not repugnant to the contents of the letter itself, may be considered as a part of the contract if the parties make their contract with reference thereto and knowledge thereof. This instruction was erroneous. The order and the acceptance were in writing and constituted the contract, and it was the duty of the court to construe them, if not ambiguous, and, if ambiguous, to receive parol testimony to explain the ambiguities. The printed matter on the letter heads was not referred to in either the order or the acceptance, and is not a part of the contract. 2 Page, Contr. § 600; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 1093, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99; Summers Bros. v. Hibbard, 153 Ill. 102, 46 Am. St. Rep. 872, 38 N. E. 899. In the Sturm Case the court said that a printed billhead could not control, modify, or alter the terms of the contract, and that, "the contract being clearly expressed in writing, the printed billhead of the invoice can, upon no well-settled rule, control, modify, or alter it." In the Summers Case, at page 108 of 153 Ill., the court, in considering the precise question, said: "The mere fact that appellants wrote their acceptance on a blank form for letters at the top of which were printed the words, 'All sales subject to strikes and accidents,' no more made those words a part of the contract than they made the other words there printed, 'Summers Bros. & Co., Manufacturers of Box-Annealed Common & Refined Sheet-Iron,' a part of the contract. The offer was absolute. The written acceptance, which they themselves wrote, was just as absolute. The printed words were not in the body of the letter, or referred to therein. The fact that they were printed at the head of their letter heads would not have the effect of preventing appellants from entering into an unconditional contract of sale." The construction contended for by the respondent would make that which is an absolute, unqualified acceptance upon its face a conditional one by reference to a letter head which was not referred to by either of the parties. The language of the acceptance, "We accept and enter same for shipment in accordance with the terms thereof," is clear and its meaning plain. The respondent agreed to ship the goods according to the terms of the order, not according to the terms of the printing on the letter heads. The respondent has cited Yorston v. Brown, 178 Mass. 103, 59 N. E. 654, and Delta & P. Land Co. v. Wallace, 83 Miss. 656, 36 So. 263. In the Yorston Case the order on which the plaintiff relied for a recovery specially referred to the printed headlines on the order, and the contract was made by reference thereto. The court ruled that it was competent for the defendant to refer thereto on the blank furnished him by the plaintiff for his use in making the order. In the Delta Case it was held that written and printed matter in a contract will be reconciled when it can be done.

The court instructed the jury that, in determining whether there had been a breach of the contract, they should consider whether there was a general custom which formed a part of the contract, whether it was the custom of the respondent to accept such orders only upon the conditions expressed in its letter heads, which was brought to the knowledge of the appellant so that it made the contract in view of the provision and adopted it as a part of the contract; that they should determine when the contract expired, whether in a reasonable time, if the parties were unable to fill it so that it was canceled and no longer obligatory, and, if so, there could be no recovery. This instruction the appellant contends was erroneous. We think it was clearly so. Parol testimony of usage or custom, either general in the community or special between the people engaged in a particular trade or business, is not admissible to vary, modify, or control the terms of the contract. Williams v. Ninemire, 23 Wash. 393, 63 Pac. 534; Vollrath v. Crowe, 9 Wash. 374, 37 Pac. 474; Miller v. Bean, 13 Wash. 516, 43 Pac. 636; Commercial Bank v. Hart, 10 Wash. 303, 38 Pac. 1114; Covington v. Kanawha Coal & Coke Co. 121 Ky. 681, 3 L.R.A. Co.* 15 Wall. 573, 21 L. ed. 220; Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. 383, 19 L. ed. 987; Mercantile Bkg. Co. v. Landa (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 681; Scott v. Hartley, 126 Ind. 239, 25 N. E. 826; McMillan v. American Exp. Co. 123 Iowa, 236, 98 N. W. 629; Bigelow v. Legg, 102 N. Y. 652, 6 N. E. 107. In the Covington Case, 121 Ky. 686, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 248, 123 Am. St. Rep. 219, 89 S. W. 1127, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 311, it is said: "But in all cases of this sort the rule for admitting the evidence of usage or custom must be taken with this qualification, that the evidence be not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the contract; for otherwise it would not go to interpret and explain, but to contradict, that which is written." In the Sheffield Furnace Co. Case the contract provided for a sale of coke at a price "f. o. b. cars, Sheffield, Alabama." Sheffield was the point of destination of the coke. The court held that evidence of a general custom in the coke trade was inadmissible for the purpose of showing that the purchaser should advance the freight. In Barnard v. Kellogg it was held that usage cannot be allowed to subvert the settled rules of law or defeat the essential terms of the contract; that its office is to explain words or phrases of doubtful meaning, or which may be understood in different senses according to the subject-matter to which they are applicable. In the Partridge Case the plaintiff, having been discharged from the employment of the defendant, sought to recover for services rendered as agent, and asserted a right to a commission on the annual premiums paid or to be paid on policies issued through his agency. To establish this, he undertook to prove a usage between insurance companies and their agents. He introduced in evidence a letter of the company in reply to one asking information as to the relation he sustained to the company, which stated: "Concerning your status in Missouri, it is simply this: You are there working up a business for yourself, and are paid the highest commissions which we pay." At page 230 of the Lawyers' Edition (21 L. ed.,) the court, speaking through Mr. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Justice Miller, said: "It appears to us, as it did to the circuit court, that the testimony offered would have established a new and distinct term to the contract. It would have established a contract very different from the written one introduced by plaintiff. The language of the letter was neither ambiguous nor technical. It required and needed no expert, no usage to discover its meaning. To have admitted the usage offered in evidence in this case would have been to make a contract for the parties differing materially from the written one under which they had both acted for some time." And that "no such extension of the doctrine is consistent either with authority or with the principles which govern the law of contracts." The respondent has cited in support of this construction Bliven v. New England Screw Co. 23 How. 420, 16 L. ed. 510; Robinson v. United States, 13 Wall. 363, 20 L. ed. 653; and Lillard v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. 67 C. C. A. 74, 134 Fed. 168. These cases recognize the rule which we have stated, but hold that it is inapplicable to the particular facts before the court. The Bliven Case, in its application of this principle of law to the facts before it, tends to support the instruction. But, as we read the Robinson and the Lillard Cases, the facts are so different that they are not pertinent to the issue. In the Robinson Case a contractor had agreed to deliver 1,000,000 bushels of barley to the government between certain dates, but the contract did not specify the manner of delivery. After making certain deliveries in the sack, a large quantity was tendered loose in wagons. The tender being refused, it was held, in a suit by the government, that, the contract being silent as to the mode of delivery and there being two modes essentially different, evidence of the customary mode of delivery was admissible. In the Lillard Case it was held that, where a distiller had contracted to deliver the total product of slop at a "feeding lot" supplied by him, the contract not expressing the mode of delivery, evidence of custom was admissible to show how a delivery was to be made. In the case at bar it seems to us that the instruction of the court permitted the jury to find a contract wholly different from that made by the parties. The acceptance of the order was unconditional. The time of delivery not being stated, the law would require a delivery within a reasonable time. The instruction permitted the jury to transform an unconditional acceptance into a conditional one, which made the delivery subject to the exigencies of transportation and subject to the further condition that, if the goods could not be shipped within a reasonable time, the contract was no longer obligatory upon either party. This was clearly repugnant to the contract.

A contract definite in its terms cannot be made subject to a custom of trade that, if it cannot be performed in a reasonable time, it need not be performed at all. There is a principle of law that, in contracts where the performance depends on the continued existence of a specified person, animal, or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the death of the person or animal, or the destruction of the thing, excuses the performance. This principle has no application to this case. The acceptance required a delivery within a reasonable time. In determining what was a reasonable time, the circumstances of the difficulty or impossibility of getting cars up to April 2, 1907, the date when the car embargo was removed, should be considered. One of the defenses is that there was a great shortage of cars when the contract was made, and that the appellant had knowledge of that fact. If this is true, it would be a circumstance in determining what a reasonable time would be. The fact that the contract called for shipment through the mountains in the winter season would be another circumstance to be considered. We are not dealing with a contract where a fixed date of shipment or delivery was agreed upon. The appellant, however, is not complaining because a delivery was not made during this period, but because of the refusal of the respondent to deliver within a reasonable time after transportation of lumber and shingles was resumed. The question of whether the washouts, deep mountain snows, and slides, preventing transportation for a given period, were the acts of God, need not be considered, because, as we have stated, the appellant is not complaining on account of a failure to deliver while these conditions obtained. 2 Page, Contr. §§ 1375, 1377; Buffalo & L. The respondent contends that, if it could not ship within a reasonable time owing to lack of cars, it was excused from shipping at all, and cites Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 500, 14 L.R.A. 220, 28 N. E. 595, and Raisin Fertilizer Co. v. J. J. Barrow, Jr. Co. 97 Ala. 694, 12 So. 388. In the Stewart Case a manufacturer of butter and cheese agreed with certain individuals to convert their milk into cheese and butter, sell the products, and divide the proceeds according to 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the contract. The factory was destroyed by fire, and a quantity of milk, butter, and cheese was lost. The court recognized the exception that we have noticed, and held that the destruction of the factory, if it occurred without negligence on the part of the owner, relieved it of liability for damages. In the Raisin Fertilizer Co. Case the engagement to deliver was conditional upon "water transportation" permitting. Where the order does not specify the size of the car, the damages are assessable on the basis of an average sized car used in shipping such commodities. Floyd v. Mann, 146 Mich. 356, 109 N. W. 679; Bullock v. Finley (C. C.) 28 Fed. 514. Under the circumstances of the case, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the value of the commodities at the date of the demand and refusal to perform the contract. Summers Bros. v. Hibbard, supra; Roberts v. Benjamin, 124 U. S. 64, 31 L. ed. 334, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 393; Brown v. Sharkey, 93 Iowa, 157, 61 N. W. 364; Trask v. Hamburger, 70 N. H. 453, 48 Atl. 1087; United R. & Electric Co. v. Wehr, 103 Md. 323, 63 Atl. 475. The instructions requested by the appellant state the law of the case applicable to the issue, and should have been given as an entirety. The length of this opinion forbids a statement of the substance of the instructions, but it is sufficient to say that they were in harmony with the view we have taken of the case.

The judgment will be reversed, with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL.
MT. HOPE COAL COMPANY

v.

WHITE OAK RAILWAY COMPANY.

(65 W. Va. 15, 64 S. E. 630.)

Pleading — mandamus — alternative writ — recitals — sufficiency.

1. In mandamus by a coal operator commanding a railroad company, as required

Headnotes by MILLER, P.

Note. — Power to compel railroad to build, maintain, or connect with, side tracks for accommodation of shippers.

It is quite generally held that, in the absence of constitutional or statutory provi-by § 2364, Code 1906, to make "reasonable provision" for the transportation of all coal offered it for shipment by him, the recitals in the alternative writ, showing that the things commanded thereby were substantially those which, in prior negotiations between the parties, the railroad company had regarded as reasonable and proper, will, on a motion to quash the writ, be regarded as equivalent to the recital of other facts and circumstances necessary to show the reasonableness of such demand, and as making a prima facie case entitling relator to the relief demanded.

Carrier — "reasonable provision" for transportation of freight — determination.

2. What will constitute such reasonable provision for the transportation of coal will depend on the facts and circumstances of each individual case.

Same — provisions previously determined.

3. Provisions which a railroad company had determined before the alternative writ issued were proper to be made for the transportation of relator's coal offered it for shipment, the court will assume on final hearing may reasonably be required by its mandate; at least, until a different showing be made.

sions, a railroad company is not obliged to build sidings or spurs to connect its main tracks directly with the establishment of a private shipper, or to maintain such side tracks when built, or to permit or maintain connection therewith when they are built by the shipper. Detroit v. Michigan C. R. Co. 156 Mich. 121, 120 N. W. 592; People ex rel. Spruance v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 57 Ill. 436; Jones v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. 13 C. C. A. 95, 31 U. S. App. 92, 65 Fed. 736; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Columbus, S. & H. R. Co. 90 Fed. 148; Durden v. Southern R. Co. 2 Ga. App. 66, 58 S. E. 299; Harp v. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. 118 Fed. 169, affirmed in 61 C. C. A. 405, 125 Fed. 445.

And some cases hold that to make such a requirement of a railroad company amounts to a taking of its property without due process of law. See Northern P. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission (Wash.) 108 Pac. 938, and the cases discussed therein.

In Oklahoma, where there is a statute giving the corporation commission authority to require railroads to furnish facilities and conveniences, the court held, in reversing an order of the commission requiring the railroad to build a side track to a private elevator, that the proceeding should have been under a section of the statute requiring the shipper to pay the expense of constructing such siding, as a railroad is not obliged to provide such facilities as would equalize the disadvantage to a shipper caused by dissimilarity of location. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. State, 23 Okla. 94, 99 Pac. 901; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. State (Okla.) 106 Pac. 818; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Haywood (Okla.) 106 Pac. 862. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Railroad — side track — mandamus to compel building of.

4. Where, in order that reasonable provision be made by it for the transportation of coal and coke offered it for shipment, as required by said § 2364, Code 1906, the facts and circumstances demand it, a railroad company may be compelled by mandamus to construct and operate upon its right of way a side track and switch for that purpose.

Same — due process of law.

5. Requiring such reasonable provision to be made does not amount to a command to enter into a contract therefor with relator, or to build and maintain a permanent structure on such right of way, to be continued indefinitely, nor to the taking of the private property of such railroad company for private use without due process of law, inhibited by article 14 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. It is a mere command of the temporary use by such company, of a part of its right of way for the purpose of performing a duty imposed upon it by law.

Mandamus — alternative writ — right to amend.

6. The alternative writ of mandamus, though regarded as a pleading,—the declaration or complaint,—is nevertheless the

And in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. State (Okla.) 104 Pac. 908, the court reversed a similar order by the commission requiring a railroad to construct a switch to a flour mill, though the shipper was required to pay the cost of such portion thereof as was off the railroad's right of way.

For a similar construction of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to order switch connections, see Winters Metallic Paint Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 16 Inters. Com. Rep. 587.

In Railroad Commission v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 35 Tex. Civ. App. 52, 80 S. W. 102 (rehearing denied in 98 Tex. 67, 88 S. W. 1141), a statute requiring railroads to build sidings and spur tracks sufficient to handle the business tendered such roads was held to refer only to sidings and spur tracks for public use, and an order of the railroad commission requiring the building of a side track for the use of a lumber company, though the latter furnished the right of way, grading, and cross-ties, was held invalid.

In Northwestern Warehouse Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 32 Wash. 218, 73 Pac. 388, where a statute provided that every railroad company which permitted one shipper to connect its warehouse with its tracks should extend such privilege to all others, it was held that a railroad company which permits the building of a warehouse on its right of way is not obliged to extend its track to the warehouse of another shipper off its right of way.

And in Lancashire Brick & Terra Cotta Co. v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. [1902] 1 K. B. 651, it was held that a statute giving the owner of lands adjoining a railway the right writ of the court; and where the substantive matter thereof is sufficient to justify a part, but not all, that is commanded by the writ, this court may, in a case of original jurisdiction, so amend the alternative writ as to make it conform to the mandate of the peremptory writ awarded, and that may properly be commanded thereby.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to make "reasonable provision" for the transportation of coal offered it for shipment by relator. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Price, Smith, Spilman, & Clay and C. R. Summerfield for relator.

Messrs. Dillon & Nuckols, for defendant:

The case stated does not show a legal duty imposed upon defendant by law, common or statutory, owing to relator, which it refused to obey, and in the absence of such showing the relator is not entitled to the relief demanded.

Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington Territory, 142 U. S. 492, 35 L. ed. 1092, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co.

to lay collateral branches, and requiring the railway to connect therewith, does not give an absolute right to such connections, but only if they can be made with safety to the public, and without injury to the railway or inconvenience to the traffic thereon.

But in support of the position taken in STATE EX REL. MT. HOPE COAL CO. v. WHITE OAK R. CO., which holds that a railroad company may be required to connect with a coal mine by a switch upon its right of way, see the following cases:

—Com. ex rel. Brown v. Corey, 2 Pittsb. 445, holding that shippers have a statutory right to connect with lateral railroads, and that mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the proprietors thereof to insert, or permit others to insert, the switches, sidings, and connections necessary, and Reeser v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 215 Pa. 136, 64 Atl. 376, holding that this right could not be interfered with by a contract between the railroad and another shipper that no other switch should be built in that locality;

—Olanta Coal Min. Co. v. Beech Creek R. Co. 144 Fed. 150, in which a decree was granted to require a railroad to permit the connection of a switch built by the coal company, and which was affirmed on appeal in 85 C. C. A. 148, 158 Fed. 36, the court, however, ordering the decree reopened, to enable the trial court to investigate further the propriety of the location and manner of making the connection, with special regard to its safety;

—Vincent v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 49 Ill. 33, in which an injunction was granted to 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 667, 28 L. ed. 291, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 185; Jones v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. 13 C. C. A. 95, 31 U. S. App. 92, 65 Fed. 736; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. State, 31 Fla. 282, 20 L.R.A. 419, 34 Am. St. Rep. 30, 13 So. 103; Harp v. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. 118 Fed. 169; Vincent v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 49 Ill. 43; People ex rel. Spruance v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 57 Ill. 436; Hoyt v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Ill. 607.

There is no constitutional or statutory provision in West Virginia requiring the shippers of coal to be furnished a private side track on the railway company's right of way, as such right does not exist under § 2364, Code 1906, and that statute must be strictly construed.

Miller, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant owns and operates a railroad in Fayette county from Macdonald station on the Loup creek branch of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to Price-Hill station, a distance of about 3 miles. The relator, the Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, has opened up a coal mine on the line of defendant's railway near Mt. Hope station, where it has built a substantial tippie, and is ready to mine and ship coal. The defendant owns its right of way in fee of the width of 100 feet. It is impossible for relator to reach the main track of defendant, as now located, for shipping its coal, except by side track and switch connection therewith constructed, in part at least, upon defendant's right of way. In June, 1907, negotiations were begun between relator and defendant for side track privileges, and on June 25, 1907, the defendant's general manager wrote the relator's attorney, referring to the negotiations begun, saying: "I, at that time, advised you the freight rate was 10 cents per ton. This I beg to confirm. Since looking over the records, I find the rate is 10 cents per ton from the mines operating on this line, and, as the Mt. Hope Coal Company have such a small area and the shipments from that area will be limited, we could not agree to furnish them a side track at our expense. We will, however, if they are willing to do the grading, pay for rails, ties, fastenings, and switch connections, and labor in laying track, permit them to tap our main line; and we will handle the coal from their operation on the basis of 10 cents per ton of coal, distributing the cars on the branch in proportion to the capacity of the mine. It being also understood that this switch connection is made for the purpose of shipping coal, and in default of, at any time, shipping less than one car load of freight per annum for every lineal foot 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of track, the White Oak Railway Company reserves to itself the right to remove the switch connection. This for the purpose of preventing dead switches on their main line." After this letter was received, the relator began and completed the building of its tippie, extending the same out over the defendant's right of way some 50 feet, so as to reach the proposed side track, and also did the work of grading, furnished ties, steel rails, frogs, etc., for switch connection, and other material for the purpose of completing said side track and making the proper connection with defendant's main track, expending therein, and in opening its mine, some $17,000. It does not clearly appear under what special contract or agreement with the defendant, if any, relator extended its tippie over on the defendant's right of way, other than such as may be implied from said letter of June 25, 1907, and the negotiations which seem to have led up to it; but it is alleged in the petition, and not denied, that the work of building and completing the tippie and of grading and providing rails, ties, and other materials for the side track, was carried on by the relator with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendant, and with no objection thereto by it until in the latter part of December of that year, when defendant refused to connect up the switch with its main track except on condition that relator would enter into a contract with it embodying substantially the terms of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company contract. Pending these negotiations, however, a contract was drawn up by defendant's counsel which relator was willing to execute, but which the defendant refused. Relator also proposed a contract in the form required by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company for operators along its line, but this defendant also refused to accept, and refused to make any contract except that proposed by it. Neither of the agreements proposed contained any provision relating to the relator's occupancy of defendant's right of way with its coal tippie; nor does it appear that any of the negotiations contemplated any special provision therefor. Having failed to come to an agreement for such side track and connections, the relator now seeks to compel defendant by mandamus, and by force of the statute, to make reasonable provision for the transportation of its coal offered for transportation. It conceives that reasonable provision to be, according to its petition and the alternative writ, to require defendant to connect the said side track constructed by relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, at its mines, with the defendant's railway line, or to permit said relator to make such connection:

to furnish relator its due and proper proportion of the railway cars and equipment available for coal shipments from the region in which petitioner's mine is located; and to place such cars upon said side track and remove the same when loaded in the usual way in which said cars are placed and removed for other shippers along said line; and that it desist from discriminations in favor of other corporations named.

The defendant challenges the sufficiency of the alternative writ, and moves to quash the same, and also files its return in writing thereto. The motion to quash is predicated upon three grounds: First, that the alleged right of relator is not based upon violation of any duty imposed upon defendant by law; second, that the alternative writ does not allege any facts or circumstances upon which it can be determined whether defendant has refused to discharge its legal duty to relator; and, third, because the alleged rights of relator are based wholly upon a duty or obligation arising out of an alleged contract or agreement between relator and railway company, which the court by mandamus has no power to enforce.

The first and third grounds are evidently based upon the erroneous theory that relator rests its right to relief upon its negotiations for a contract, or upon the proposition contained in the defendant's letter of June 25, 1907. We do not so understand relator's position, but, on the contrary, that the right claimed is a statutory right. It is argued for defendant that, where the relator's rights rest wholly on a special contract involving no question of public trust or official duty, the writ will be refused. Merrill, Mandamus, § 16. Without contract a railroad company has a public duty to discharge. Our statute (§ 2364, Code 1906) upon which relator especially relies provides that "every railroad corporation along whose line of railroad the industries of mining coal or manufacturing coke is carried on shall, without discrimination between or amongst shippers, and without unnecessary delay, make a reasonable provision for the transportation of all such coal and coke offered for transportation over its railroad, and no such railroad corporation shall discriminate in rates, distribution of cars, or otherwise against or among shippers of coal or coke offered for shipment on its line or lines." Section 2366 imposes a penalty upon such railroad corporation, its officers, and agents who knowingly and wilfully violate any of the provisions of that act. Because the negotiations for a contract failed, has the relator lost any of its statutory rights? We 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) plate any agreement of the parties. The mandate of the statute is that the railroad company shall, without any unnecessary delay, make a reasonable provision for the transportation of all coal and coke offered for shipment,—a command which the railroad company cannot neglect without incurring the penalty of the statute. What will constitute such reasonable provision will depend, of course, upon the facts and circumstances of each individual case. But the statute makes the industries of mining coal and manufacturing coke the special subject of railroad regulation. The extent and importance of these industries in this state in the judgment of the legislature required this, and we think the statute should be given a construction broad enough to accomplish the purposes plainly intended. On the second ground of the motion, if we understand the purpose of relator in setting forth the prior negotiations for a contract, it was that they might serve as a substitute, in part at least, for allegations of fact necessary to show the reasonableness of the provision required by it, and we think they do serve such purpose. It might have been better, and but for these recitals of the alternative writ it would have been necessary, no doubt, in order to show the reasonableness of such provisions, for relator to have alleged and proven the probable output of its mine, the number of cars it would likely require per day or per month or per annum, the probable expense of making such provisions, and any other facts available,—this for the purpose of showing the extent and nature of its operations and the reasonableness of its demand, for, as we construe our statute, provision that is reasonable must be made. The alternative writ recites relator's ownership of the mine, the preparation made by it for mining and shipping coal, the expenditures incurred by it therein, and that it is ready to mine and ship coal; also, the acreage owned by it, and its readiness to provide the material and pay for the labor of construction of such side track and switch, in view of which it is alleged defendant was willing to have such side track and switch connection made, if only the relator would agree to the terms of a contract which the relator conceived to be unjust and onerous. These recitals of the alternative writ we think present a prima facie case entitling relator to relief.

On the merits the return of defendant admits all the facts which we deem material; and in the brief of counsel they say that they are ready to admit that under our statute defendant would be required to make a reasonable provision for the transportation of coal and coke, and under certain circumstances such reasonable provision would require the putting in of switch connections, but they say that, before defendant can be required to make switch connections with a private side track for relator, it must be alleged and proven that relator has sufficient product to offer for transportation to justify defendant in maintaining and operating such side track and switch, that they can be made and operated safely on a practicable grade, and that relator has made provisions upon its own property to load the product of its mine. As we have said, we think the alternative writ sufficient in this particular.

The defenses relied upon by defendant in its return are, first, that relator seeks to compel defendant to enter into a contract with it, for the use and occupation by it, of a part of the defendant's right of way, with its coal tippie and a side track; second, that, if the first proposition be not involved, another object of the writ is to compel the defendant, against its will and discretion, to construct, or permit relator to construct, on its private right of way a side track for the private use of the relator, and this without showing that such side track can be constructed at the point indicated so as to be safely and profitably operated by the defendant; and, third, that there is no warrant of law therefor, and that the court is without jurisdiction to compel by mandamus performance by the defendant of either of said acts. It is conceded, however, that relator has the right to compel defendant to make suitable provision for shipping of its coal, but that it has not a clear legal right to have this done in the way and manner required, because it involves the taking of its private property for private use, which is not due process of law, and violative of the provisions of article 14 of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States. In its first proposition we think the defendant wholly misconceives the purposes of the writ. While the writ recites the things done and negotiations had between the parties in the vain endeavor to come to an agreement, it contains no command that defendant enter into any agreement with the relator. The issues presented upon the writ and return do not call upon us to decide, and we do not decide, whether, as an original proposition, the relator could compel defendant by mandamus to permit it to occupy, with its coal tippie, a part of the defendant's right of way. This the relator has already accomplished, if not by express agreement, at least, by the acquiescence and consent of the defendant. The evidence shows that such occupancy by other coal operators has in many instances been permitted in the same coal field by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. And in its return to the writ in this case, defendant makes no real objection to such occupancy of its right of way by relator, either with its coal tippie or with the proposed switch and side track, if only relator will accept the terms of the contract proposed by it in relation thereto,—a condition not suggested or required by it in its proposition of June 25, 1907.

The only question of merit presented here is the legal one, covered by the second and third defenses, namely, whether under our statute defendant can be compelled by mandamus, under the facts and circumstances of this case, and upon the conditions proposed by relator, to construct, or permit relator to construct, the side track as proposed. It is conceded that reasonable provision may be commanded. Whether the proposed side track can be operated safely upon a proper grade or with profit to the defendant, and also the question whether the occupancy of a portion of the defendant's right of way therewith as required is reasonable, are questions which it seems to us were practically determined by the parties themselves prior to the issuance of the present writ; for the defendant is shown to have consented thereto, or at least acquiesced therein, and what the parties themselves had determined was such reasonable provision for the transportation of relator's coal we may, it seems to us, properly assume may reasonably be required by the mandate of the court, at least until a different showing be made. The only way in which reasonable provision could be made for transportation of coal delivered from a tippie into cars would be by building a side track connected by a switch to the main track, either upon the right of way of the defendant or upon the private lands of the relator. The parties determined between themselves that the proper place for the location of such switch was on defendant's right of way. The relator claims, and there is evidence to support its claim, that the only feasible and proper place for such side track is on defendant's right of way.

But has the court power by mandamus to compel defendant upon terms to construct and operate the proposed side track and switch connection on its right of way? We think it has. This question we do not conceive to be covered and concluded, as defendant contends, by Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 104 U. S. 403, 41 L. ed. 489, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 130. The question there was whether the railroad company could be compelled by mandamus to enter into a contract with relators, upon like terms and conditions contained in contracts with other private persons, permitting them to build and maintain a private and permanent warehouse upon the defendant's right of way. The state court, construing the statute of Nebraska as conforming to the Constitution of the United States, had required defendant to enter into such a contract. The supreme court conceded the right of the railroad company to permit its grounds to be occupied by others with structures convenient for the receipt and delivery of freight upon its railroad, so long as a free and safe passage was left for the carriage of freight and passengers,—citing Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 23 L. ed. 356,—but says: "But how far the railroad company can be compelled to do so against its will is a wholly different question." But the court says in that case: "This court, confining itself to what is necessary for the decision of the case before it, is unanimously of opinion that the order in question, so far as it required the railroad corporation to surrender a part of its land to the petitioners for the purpose of building and maintaining their elevator upon it, was, in essence and effect, a taking of private property of the railroad corporation for the private use of the petitioners. The taking by a state of the private property of one person or corporation without the owner's consent, for the private use of another, is not due process of law, and is a violation of the 14th article of Amendment of the Constitution of the United States." Many cases are cited for this proposition. This, however, is not the proposition we have before us. Nor do we think Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington Territory, 142 U. S. 492, 35 L. ed. 1092, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283, a case in point, as defendant contends. The particular point decided in that case was that, without legislative action making it the plain duty of the railroad company, the court was without jurisdiction to compel by mandamus the railroad company to build and maintain a railway station at the particular point commanded. In that case the court quotes extensively from People v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 58, 66, 67, 58 Am. Rep. 484, 9 N. E. 856. The question in the New York case was whether, without legislative requirement, the defendant company could be compelled by mandamus to build a station house at the particular point commanded by the writ. The statutes of New York permitted railway companies, for public use in the conveyance of passengers, persons, and property, to erect and maintain all necessary and convenient buildings and stations for the accommodation and use of their passengers, freight, and business. But the court said, contrary to the findings of the 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

railroad commissioners, that, "as the duty sought to be imposed upon the defendant is not a specific duty prescribed by statute, either in terms or by reasonable construction, the court cannot, no matter how apparent the necessity, enforce its performance by mandamus. It cannot compel the erection of a station house or the enlargement of one. . . . As to that the statute imports an authority only, not a command, to be availed of at the option of the company, in the discretion of its directors, who are empowered by statute to manage 'its affairs,'" etc. After that decision in New York the legislature (Laws 1892, chap. 676, p. 1382) amended the statute, giving the railroad commissioners general supervision over all railroads, and empowering them to require additional terminal facilities, and the courts power and authority to enforce their just and reasonable decisions and recommendations by mandamus, subject to appeal. It may be proper to note that Justices Brewer, Field, and Harlan dissented in Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington. Justice Brewer says in his dissenting opinion: "A railroad corporation has a public duty to perform, as well as a private interest to subserve, and I never before believed that the courts would permit it to abandon the one to promote the other. Nowhere in its charter is in terms expressed the duty of carrying passengers and freight. Are the courts impotent to compel the performance of this duty? Is the duty of carrying passengers and freight any more of a public duty than that of placing its depots and stopping its trains at those places which will best accommodate the public? If the state of Indiana incorporates a railroad to build a road from New Albany through Indianapolis to South Bend, and that road is built, can it be that the courts may compel the road to receive passengers and transport freight, but, in the absence of a specific direction from the legislature, are powerless to compel the road to stop its trains and build a depot at Indianapolis? I do not so benitle the power or duty of the courts." As we have said, the purpose of the present writ is not to command a contract for the building of a permanent structure by the relator on the right of way. The writ contemplates no such object. It commands a reasonable provision for the transportation of relator's coal offered for shipment, which the statute authorizes. Such reasonable provision does not involve the permanent maintenance of the proposed switch and side track. Nor does the writ command defendant to continue the same indefinitely as a permanent structure. Jones v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. 13 C. C. A. 95, 31 U. S. App. 92, 65 Fed. 739; Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 21 C. C. A. 103, 43 U. S. App. 308, 74 Fed. 803. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, supra, the court emphasizes the fact that the "order in question was not limited to temporary use of tracks, nor to the conduct of the business of the railway company. But it required the railway company to grant to the petitioners the right to build and maintain a permanent structure upon its right of way." In Jones v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. supra, referring to the latest Illinois case relied upon, the court says: "The supreme court of that state has held that the railroad company has a discretion to say in what particular manner the connection shall be made with its main track, but that this discretion is exhausted after the completion of the switch and its use without objection for a number of years;" but, says the court: "This is very far from holding that there is any common-law liability to maintain a side track forever, after it has once been established." And, referring to other Illinois cases, the same court says: "They depended on statutory obligations, and were not based upon the common law." In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska the court says of that case: "Nor does it present any question as to the power of the legislature to compel the railroad company itself to erect and maintain an elevator for the use of the public, or to compel it to permit to all persons equal facilities of access from their own lands to its tracks, and of the use from time to time of those tracks for the purpose of shipping or receiving grain or other freight, as in Rhodes v. Northern P. R. Co. 34 Minn. 87, 24 N. W. 347, in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 366, 8 Am. Rep. 690, and in Hoyt v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Ill. 601." We quote from these decisions for the purpose of showing how differently the courts view the subject where there is a demand for the erection of permanent structures for private use on a railroad right of way, and where, as in this case, the demand relates to a temporary structure to be placed thereon under the direction and control of the railroad company. We are of opinion, on the authority of these cases, that our statute requiring that reasonable provision be made justifies in part the writ in this case, and that, unless we give this statute such construction, it will not accomplish the purposes intended by the legislature, and leave the subject entirely within the control and discretion of railroad companies.

But is relator entitled to all the relief commanded by the mandamus nisi? It commands, first, "that you connect the side track constructed by relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, at its mines, with your railway line, or permit said relator to make said connection;" second, "that you furnish to said relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, its due and proper portion of the railroad cars and equipment available for coal shipments from the region in which the mine of said relator is located, and place such cars upon said side track and remove the same when loaded in the usual way in which such cars are placed and removed for other shippers upon your railroad line;" and, third, "that you cease and desist from discriminating against said relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, and in favor of the Sherwood Coal & Coke Company and the Price-Hill Colliery Company, in the matter of switch connections, distribution of cars, and other facilities." We find on the pleadings and proofs the relator entitled to only such relief as is covered by the first command of the writ. It is not alleged or proven that the relator has ever demanded of the defendant, or that the defendant has ever refused to furnish, a due and proper proportion of the cars; nor do we think it is sufficiently alleged, and it is not proven, that the defendant has discriminated against the relator in favor of the other companies mentioned in the matter of switch connection, distribution of cars, and other facilities. On the contrary, the return and the evidence show that there is no such company as the Sherwood Coal & Coke Company; that the Price-Hill Colliery Company is not a producer of coal at all, but that the Price-Hill Fuel Company, the owner and operator of two coal mines, known as the Sherwood and Price-Hill mines, has tipples and side tracks upon its own land and premises, and that said Price-Hill Fuel Company has entered into a contract embodying the same terms offered relator, and which it refused to accept; and that, in fact, there has been no discrimination against the relator in this respect. What, then, is the proper disposition to make of the case? The old and rigid rule, still adhered to in some jurisdictions, was that the peremptory writ of mandamus must strictly follow the command of the alternate writ; and that, if all that is asked in the alternative writ cannot be granted, nothing that is asked can be granted. This rule is referred to, and recognized in our own cases of Fisher v. Charleston, 17 W. Va. 628, 640; Doolittle v. County Ct. 28 W. Va. 158; and Hebb v. Cayton, 45 W. Va. 578, 32 S. E. 187. See also 26 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 490, 491, and cases cited in notes. But this rule in the later cases has been very much relaxed, and in those states where, either by statute or by the prevailing rules of practice, the right of amendment of pleadings has been extended to writs of mandamus, the practice now is to direct the mandate of the alternative writ to be so amended as to conform to the command of the peremptory writ. In Fisher v. Charleston, supra, the practice followed on writ of error was to set aside the order of judgment awarding the peremptory writ, and remand the case to the lower court with directions to issue a new alternative writ commanding that to be done which was justified by the pleading and proofs,—in legal effect an amendment of the original writ. In this state the rules, including the rules relating to amendments of pleadings, are applicable to mandamus, and, if the alternative writ be amended after service, it need not be then served in its amended form. Fisher v. Charleston, 17 W. Va. 628; Mason v. Ohio River R. Co. 51 W. Va. 183, 189, 41 S. E. 418. The mandate of the writ is peculiarly within the control of the court. It need not in the first instance conform to the prayer of the petition. The court may fashion it to suit the case made by the petition. Fisher v. Charleston, supra, 630. If the court may thus control the writ at the time of directing it, there is no good reason why it may not control it afterwards by amendment, so as to make it conform to the mandate of the peremptory writ. This practice is fully justified by modern decisions and text writers, and we are of opinion it is the proper practice, and should be followed in this state, although resulting in a modification to some extent of the rule heretofore recognized and followed. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 879; High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 519; State v. Crites, 48 Ohio St. 142, 173, 26 N. E. 1052; State ex rel. Pillsbury v. Charleston, 1 S. C. 30; State ex rel. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Baggott, 96 Mo. 63, 71, 8 S. W. 737; United States ex rel. Hall v. Union P. R. Co. 4 Dill. 479 (syl. 5), Fed. Cas. No. 16,601; 26 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 490, 491.

The pleadings and proofs we think entitle the relator to a peremptory writ of mandamus directed to defendant, commanding it, on condition that, before beginning the work, the relator shall pay or secure to be paid to it the cost and expense thereof, to commence forthwith and to complete as soon as practicable a safe and suitable side track, connecting the same by a switch with relator's mines, using the location graded and prepared by the relator, and the ties, rails, and other materials furnished by it, as far as consistent with proper side track and switch. con- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) struction, or permit relator to do said work in accordance with said specifications. It will therefore be so ordered; and also that the alternative writ be so amended as to conform in all respects to the peremptory writ directed thereby.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
RAILROAD COMMISSION OF WASHINGTON, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 108 Pac. 938.)

Railroad — private service — right to compel.

The attempt by the state to compel a railroad company to construct and operate a spur track to a private mill is void, as a taking of property for private use without due process of law.

(Fullerton, J., dissents in part.)

(May 18, 1910.)

APPEAL by the Northern Pacific Railway Company from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County affirming an order of the Washington Railway Commission requiring the construction of a spur track to certain private property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George T. Reid, with Mr. B. S. Grosscup, for appellant:

The property of a railroad company is private property, and cannot be invaded or damaged.

State ex rel. North Coast R. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 49 Wash. 84, 94 Pac. 907.

An industry track of the kind proposed is for a private use.

Healy Lumber Co. v. Morris, 33 Wash. 491, 63 L.R.A. 820, 99 Am. St. Rep. 964, 74 Pac. 681.

The order of the commission requiring the railroad company to surrender the use of a portion of its property to the use of individuals for a siding deprived the company of its property without due process of law, and was void.

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403, 41 L. ed. 489, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 130.

Messrs. W. P. Bell, Attorney General, and W. V. Tanner, for respondent:

The order of the railroad commission does not constitute a taking of property for a private use.

Note. — See note to preceding case.

Seaboard Air Line R. Co.* supra.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of the superior court of Pierce county, affirming an order of the railroad commission requiring the appellant to construct and operate a spur track from its main-line road to the sawmill of one H. A. Burnham. The appellant owns and operates a line of railroad extending from Tacoma easterly and southeasterly through the state, and southerly through Rainier and McIntosh to the Columbia river. Rainier and McIntosh are stations about 4 miles apart. Mr. Burnham owns and operates a sawmill about midway between the stations, and about 300 feet from the appellant's main-line track. He manufactures about six car loads per week of lumber and other sawed timbers, for shipment over appellant's lines of road, and hauls it by means of wagons and teams to Rainier, a distance of about 2½ miles by wagon road, at an expense of about $40 a car load for hauling and loading. With a spur track to his mill, he could put his products aboard the car for about $5 per car load. He has demanded of the appellant that it furnish him with a spur track to the mill, has offered to furnish a right of way for the track, grade the track, and furnish and lay the ties under the direction of the appellant; but it has refused to comply with his demand. Upon a complaint alleging these facts, and also alleging that a spur track can be constructed at small expense to the appellant, extending from the main line of its road to the mill, without endangering or rendering difficult the operation of trains, the case was heard before the railroad commission. The commission found the facts stated, and that a necessity exists for the spur track. Thereafter it entered an order requiring Burnham to construct the grade and furnish proper and necessary ties, and requiring appellant to furnish and lay the rails, construct the spur track, provide proper connections with its main line, and furnish Burnham with cars and facilities for loading his lumber at his mill for shipment over the appellant's lines. The order makes no provision for a right of way, and the evidence does not disclose who owns the land over which the spur track is to be constructed. A compliance with the order would require switching to the extent of about a mile, and would consume from a quarter to a half hour every time a car was taken to or from the mill.

The appellant contends that the order is a taking of its property without due process of law, and that it contravenes the 14th article of Amendment to the Federal Constitution. We think this view must prevail. The sawmill is a private industry, and the effect of the order is to take the private property of the appellant, and devote it to the private use of Burnham. Healy Lumber Co. v. Morris, 33 Wash. 491, 63 L.R.A. 820, 99 Am. St. Rep. 964, 74 Pac. 681. A railroad is a public highway and, as such, is subject to regulation; but the regulation must be promotive of the public interest. Notwithstanding the fact that it is a public highway, its property is private. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, speaking of the 14th Amendment, it is said: "It would be difficult, and perhaps impossible, to give to those words a definition at once accurate and broad enough to cover every case. This difficulty, and perhaps impossibility, was referred to by Mr. Justice Miller, in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616, where the opinion was expressed that it is wiser to ascertain their intent and application by the 'gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded.'" It is true that railroad companies may be required to fence their tracks, establish proper crossings at points of intersection with public roads, patrol their tracks at thickly populated points, establish depots and stations, provide suitable connection with intersecting lines, adopt suitable safety appliances for the coupling of cars, properly light and heat their cars and depots, and many other things which touch the public business. The sawmill of Mr. Burnham, while an important industry, is no more a public business than a flouring-mill, a dairy, a farm, a livery barn, or a manufacturing plant of any other character or description.

The case at bar falls squarely within the principle announced and applied in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403, 41 L. ed. 489, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 130. In that case the supreme court of the state of Nebraska had awarded a writ of mandamus to compel the railway company to comply with an order of the state board of transportation, which directed the company to grant to certain private persons the right and privilege of erecting an elevator upon the grounds of the railway company at one of its stations. The complaint upon which the order was based recited that the elevator would be used to store the cereal products of the farms and leaseholds of the complainants as well as the products of other neighboring farms. Upon a writ of error to review the judgment, the court said: "The order in question, so far as it required the railroad corporation to surrender a part of its land to the petitioners, for the purpose of building and maintaining their elevator upon it, was in essence and effect a taking of private property of the railroad corporation for the private use of the petitioners. The taking by a state of the private property of one person or corporation, without the owner's consent, for the private use of another, is not due process of law, and is a violation of the 14th article of Amendment of the Constitution of the United States."

In Northwestern Warehouse Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 32 Wash. 218, 73 Pac. 388, a mandamus proceeding to require the railroad company to extend its track 250 feet to a grain warehouse, to afford it loading facilities, this court said: "Under any view of the requirements of the statute, it certainly cannot be contended that appellant could have been required to build a track over land it did not own, or that it was under the duty to go out and buy a right of way for that purpose." In that case the record shows that a deed to the right of way for the extension of the track was tendered the railroad company at the time of the trial.

for a time permitted the owners of coal mines to load their coal from wagons onto the cars on its commercial switches. It was insisted that, if this method were discontinued, it was the duty of the company to put in a spur track for the benefit of the mine owner. In considering that question the court said: "It must be remembered that the plaintiff in this case was not engaged in any public business, but was simply a private citizen operating a coal mine on his own account."

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 217 U. S. 196, 54 L. ed. 727, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461, a statute providing that "every railroad company or corporation operating a railroad in the state of Nebraska shall afford equal facilities to all persons or associations who desire to erect or operate, or who are engaged in operating, grain elevators, or in handling or shipping grain at or contiguous to any station of its road; and where an application has been made in writing for a location or site for the building or construction of an elevator or elevators on the railroad right of way, and the same not having been granted within a limit of sixty days, the said railroad company to whom application has been made shall erect, equip, and maintain a side track or switch of suitable length to approach as near as 4 feet of the outer edge of their right of way when necessary, and in all cases to approach as near as necessary to approach an elevator that may be erected by the applicant or applicants adjacent to their right of way for the purpose of loading grain into cars from said elevator, and for handling and shipping grain to all persons or associations so erecting or operating such elevators, or handling and shipping grain, without favoritism or discrimination in any respect whatever. Provided, however, that any elevator hereafter constructed, in order to receive the benefits of this act, must have a capacity of not less than 15,000 bushels,"—and making railroads liable for a fine for failure to obey the command of the statute, was held unconstitutional. The case arose out of two suits based upon the statute. The first was brought by the state of Nebraska to recover a fine of $500. The second was brought on the relation of the interested party, to compel the extension of a side track and the granting of shipping facilities, the railroad company having refused an application for a site for an elevator on its right of way. State v. Missouri P. R. Co. 81 Neb. 15, 115 N. W. 614, and State ex rel. Farmers' Elevator Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 81 Neb. 174, 115 N. W. 757, were reversed; the court saying: "We are of opinion that this statute is unconstitutional in its application to the present cases, because it does not provide indemnity for what it requires." The same principle is announced in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 50 Neb. 399, 69 N. W. 955, and State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 36 Minn. 402, 31 N. W. 365.

However desirable it may be for Mr. Burnham and others engaged in a like business to have switches and sidings extended to their mills, the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, as construed by the highest Federal court and by this court as well, presents an insuperable barrier against compelling such accommodations.

The contention of the attorney general that the order is promotive of the public convenience, and within the recognized police power of the state, cannot be upheld. We are persuaded, upon both principle and authority, that the Burnham mill is a private business, and that an order requiring the railroad company to extend a switch or spur track beyond its right of way, to afford him better and cheaper shipping facilities, is, in substance and effect, requiring the company to devote its property to the private use of another, and is within the protective clause of the Federal Constitution.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

Rudkin, Ch. J., and Chadwick and Morris, JJ., concur.

Fullerton, J., dissenting:

Since the Supreme Court of the United States holds that a railroad company cannot be compelled without compensation to afford facilities to a private shipper other than it offers at its general public stations, I am constrained to concur in the judgment the majority have directed to be entered in this case. I cannot concur, however, in all that is said in the opinion. I cannot concur in the view that to compel a railway company to stop at points other than its public stations, and take on for carriage the property of a private shipper, is taking its property for the private use of another, in violation of the due process of law clauses in the state and Federal Constitutions. As I understand it, the principal purpose for which a railroad is constructed is to carry from one point to another the private property of the individual; that it is for this purpose it has its existence and is given the vast powers and rights it possesses. This function, then, the state may compel it to fulfil. If, therefore, its public stations do not afford an adequate facility for the shipment of the property of a particular individual, I know of no legal reason why the company cannot be compelled, on due compensation, to furnish that particular individual with additional facilities, even to the extent of putting in an additional side track for him. For this reason I dissent from the holding that to do so is to take private property for a private use.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

HATTIE C. DANIELSON, Appt.,
v.

RICHARD SYKES, Resp't.

(— Cal. —, 109 Pac. 87.)

Dedication — plat — right of lot owner.

1. The right of the grantee of a lot on a recorded plat is not limited to the adjoining street and the connections necessary to reach a public highway, but extends to the use of all the ways appearing upon the plat, and none can be closed against his protest, if it can be of material benefit to his lot.

Same — uncertainty as to benefit.

2. A grantee of the maker of a plat of building lots cannot close an alley against the protest of a grantee of one of the lots, because of uncertainty as to whether or not the alley will ever be of any benefit to the lot.

Injunction — obstruction of way — adverse user.

3. Injunction will lie against the obstruction of a passageway in such a manner as to destroy it by adverse user, although substantial damage has not yet been caused by the obstruction.

(May 11, 1910.)

Note. — Right of purchaser of property according to plat to easements in streets or ways indicated thereon, other than those on which his property abuts.

This note does not deal with the question of the extent of the right acquired by a vendee in the street upon which his property abuts, nor with the general question of the effect of a conveyance which refers to a plat or map to create an easement in favor of the general public. Nor does it include cases where the easement claimed was in parks, squares, or commons, as distinguished from streets and ways.

The decisions upon the question considered by this note are not entirely agreed. Some of the apparent conflict, however, may be reconciled by the difference in the facts present in the several cases.

Where the street or way laid down on the plat is required to afford a convenient mode of ingress or egress to the grantee's lot, it is generally held that he is entitled to an easement in the way, although his property does not abut thereon.

Thus, in Fox v. Union Sugar Refinery, 109 Mass. 292, where land was conveyed with APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Santa Barbara County in defendant's favor and from an order denying a new trial in a suit to enjoin the obstruction of an alleged street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant:

The plaintiff's purchase of her lot by reference to the recorded map of Ocean Side vested in her private right of way along the alley shown on that map, together with a right to the incidental benefits of having the alley kept open for that purpose.

Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 16 L.R.A. 145, 28 Pac. 839; Schaufele v.

reference to a plan, it was held that the grantee acquired a right to all connecting ways shown on the plat, which enabled him to reach public ways in any direction so far as the grantor owned, although the lot granted did not abut thereon. The court here said: "But the grantee of an interior lot upon such a plan, referred to in his deed, cannot be restricted in his rights to the single passageway upon which he is bounded. The law will imply in his favor the right to use the passageway upon which he is bounded, not only for the purpose of going back and forth upon it, but also for the purpose of reaching the public ways by means of such other avenues as his grantor has, by his plan, represented to exist. If there are two or more of such avenues, it is not for the grantor to say that his grantee shall be restricted to one only. The deed is to be taken most strongly against him, and in furtherance of the beneficial operation of his grant."

And where a tract of land abutting on a highway was laid out into lots, and two parallel streets were run in from the highway and connected at their termini by a third street running at right angles to them, and it was apparent that the owner did not intend to make a restrictive distinction between the use of the two openings upon the highway, one who purchased a lot on one of the streets opening on the highway has a right to have all three of the streets laid down on the map kept open for his use. Downey v. Hood, 203 Mass. 4, 89 N. E. 24.

So, in Kelly v. Penfield, 133 App. Div. 367, 117 N. Y. Supp. 379, where the street in which an easement was claimed did not abut on the grantee's lot, but was so near that the proper use of his lot depended upon the existence of the street, he was held entitled to have it kept open. And see subsequent appeal to the same effect, 122 N. Y. Supp. 811.

street, if the grantor owns it; and where he does not own it, but sells with reference to a plan exhibiting such street, he is liable to his grantee where the true owner of the street vacates it. McCall v. Davis, 56 Pa. 431, 94 Am. Dec. 92.

And in Drew v. Wiswall, 183 Mass. 554, 67 N. E. 666, where a grantee bought according to a plan which showed proposed streets running through a tract, and his lot was bounded by two of them, it was held that he had a right over that portion described as streets, at least to the extent of gaining access to the public ways.

In Burke v. Wall, 29 La. Ann. 38, 29 Am. Rep. 316, where the property in a cemetery lot was sold with reference to a plan showing certain avenues, it was held that one of these avenues which did not abut on the grantee's lot, but which connected with other avenues leading to his lot, could not be closed and the grantee deprived of the way.

It has been held in some cases that where a grantor causes a plat to be made of his property showing streets and ways thereon, and conveys with reference to such plat, his grantees acquire an easement not only in the ways on which their property abuts, but in all ways shown on the map. road, but where streets and roads are marked on a plat, and lots are bought and sold with reference to the plat or map, all who buy with reference to the general plan or scheme disclosed by the plat or map acquire a right in all the public ways designated thereon, and may enforce the dedication. The plan or scheme indicated on the map or plat is regarded as a unity, and it is presumed, as it well may be, that the public ways add value to all the lots embraced in the general scheme or plan. Certainly, as everyone knows, lots with convenient cross streets are of more value than those without, and it is fair to presume that the original owner would not have donated land for public ways unless it gave value to the lots. So, too, it is just to presume that the purchasers paid the added value, and the donor ought not, therefore, to be permitted to take it from them by revoking part of his dedication."

In Chapin v. Brown, 15 R. I. 579, 10 Atl. 639, it was held that one who purchased with reference to a plan upon which avenues not adjoining his property were laid down had a technical right to pass and repass over these ways, but where it did not appear that he had occasion to use them, a decree for the removal of fences erected across them was refused, since his remedy at law was sufficient.

Other cases refuse to lay the rule down as broadly as those just referred to, and hold that purchasers with reference to a plat take no interest in streets other than those upon which their property abuts, where such streets are unnecessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the property granted. Badeau v. Mead, 14 Barb. 328, and Foerster v. Eilers. 60 Misc. 453, 113 N. Y. Supp. 480; and there are dicta in Re New York, 188 N. Y. 581, 80 N. E. 1109, and Reis v. New York, 188 N. Y. 58, 80 N. E. 573, to a like effect.

So, in Re East 142d Street, 83 App. Div. 430, 82 N. Y. Supp. 445, where the owner of a tract of land had filed a map and sold lots with reference thereto, stating that the streets and avenues were for convenience only, and not with the intent to dedicate, and later the grantor executed a declaration to his grantee to the effect that the grantor intended that his grantees should have and enjoy free and uninterrupted access over and upon said streets and avenues, it was held in a proceeding to determine who was entitled to damages upon the opening of the street by the city, that the grantees did not acquire easements in all of the streets laid down on the plat, but only a right of way over the street on which their lots abutted, to enable them to reach a public street.

And where a plat is referred to merely for the purpose of description, and the land granted has connection with public ways, the grantee acquires no right of way over private ways laid down on the plat which are remote from his land. Regan v. Boston Gaslight Co. 137 Mass. 37.

And in Pearson v. Allen, 151 Mass. 79, 21 Am. St. Rep. 426, 23 N. E. 731, one who bought land at a seashore resort with reference to a plat showing certain private streets was held not entitled, as against another grantee of their common grantor, to a right of way over a space marked as a street which did not touch his land, and which did not lead to a highway or afford access to the ocean.

As to the right of grantees to claim an easement, implied covenant, or estoppel, as against the grantor, in the way upon which their lots abut, by a call in the deed for a street or alley in which the grantor owns the fee, see note to Talbert v. Mason, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 878.

McLean v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 2 Cal. App. 346, 83 Pac. 1082, 1085.

When land is sold by a reference to a plan upon which several streets and avenues are laid out, the grantee does not necessarily acquire an easement in all such streets or ways. He acquires an easement in the streets or way upon which his lot is situated, and in such other streets or ways as are necessary or convenient to enable him to reach a highway. He acquires no easement in a street or way which his land does not touch, and which does not lead to a highway, and he is not entitled to an injunction or other remedy by reason of an obstruction to such street or way.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued to enjoin the defendant from obstructing an alleged street or way which she claims is appurtenant to her lands. Issues were joined, there was a trial by the court, and the injunction was refused. From the judgment and from an 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff is the owner of lot 8 in a subdivision of land into lots and streets. Its situation with reference to the way in question, the streets, and the adjoining lots, is shown by the following diagram:

The tract, comprising about 16 acres, was subdivided in 1893, and the lots were sold by the owner thereof to divers persons who have erected dwelling houses thereon. It constitutes a part of the seaside resort known as "Miramar," in Santa Barbara county. The plaintiff is in possession of lots 8 and 9, and occupies a house on lot 9, the two lots being used in connection with the house as a place of residence. The alley in question lies between lots 3 and 4 and is directly opposite to lot 8. It extends south to the south line of the tract, leading from the street in front of lot 8 to the track and right of way of the Southern Pacific railroad, not far from Miramar station. The defendant obtained from the successor of the original owner of the tract a conveyance of lot 4 and also of the ground included in the adjoining alley. Thereupon he built a fence across the northern end of the alley, where it enters the street, and has ever since maintained the fence and occupied the alley as a part of his premises, completely preventing the use of the alley by plaintiff or others as a way. The plaintiff began this action to enjoin the continuance of the obstruction. The findings state the facts aforesaid, but further state that the alley was of no use or benefit to the plaintiff, that its closing caused plaintiff no damage, and, hence, that she was not entitled to an injunction.

It is a thoroughly established proposition in this state that, when one lays out a tract of land into lots and streets, and sells the lots by reference to a map which exhibits the lots and streets as they lie with relation to each other, the purchasers of such lots have a private easement in the streets opposite their respective lots, for ingress and egress and for any use proper to a private way, and that this private easement is entirely independent of the fact of dedication to public use, and is a private appurtenance to the lots, of which the owners cannot be divested except by due process of law. Kittle v. Pfeiffer, 22 Cal. 490; Petipierre v. Maguire, 155 Cal. 250, 100 Pac. 690; Prescott v. Edwards, 117 Cal. 304, 59 Am. St. Rep. 186, 49 Pac. 178; Schaufele v. Doyle, 86 Cal. 109, 24 Pac. 834; Eachus v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. 103 Cal. 617, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, 37 Pac. 750; Cushing-Wetmore Co. v. Gray, 152 Cal. 122, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47, 92 Pac. 70; Williams v. Los Angeles R. Co. 150 Cal. 594, 89 Pac. 330; King v. Dugan, 150 Cal. 263, 88 Pac. 925; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 49, 16 L.R.A. 145, 28 Pac. 839; Grogan v. Hayward (C. C.) 6 Sawy. 498, 4 Fed. 163; Gormley v. Clark, 134 U. S. 350, 33 L. ed. 914, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 554. It is claimed on behalf of the defendants that this private right of way is limited to the use necessary for ingress and egress, and that it embraces only the street which abuts upon the particular lot in question and such other streets as may lead therefrom to some public highway or public place. There are decisions in other states which place these limits upon the private easements, and in § 247 of Jones on Easements the rule is so stated. The decisions in this state do not recognize such distinction, and we do not think it is founded in good reason.

When a lot conveyed by a deed is described by reference to a map, such map becomes a part of the deed. If the map exhibits streets and alleys, it necessarily implies or expresses a design that such passageways shall be used in connection with the lots, and for the convenience of the owners in going from each lot to any and all the other lots in the tract so laid off. The making and filing of such a plat duly signed and acknowledged by the owner, as was the case here, is equivalent to a declaration that such right is attached to each lot as an appurtenance. A subsequent deed for one of the lots, referring to the map for the description, carries such appurtenance as incident to the lot. Such we understand to be the true foundation for the rule first above stated. Where streets are laid out and exhibited on the ground and no map is made, but lots are sold upon the representation that such streets exist, the appurtenant right to use the streets is not expressed in the grant, and in such cases it is declared to rest upon the doctrine of equitable estoppel. Prescott v. Edwards, supra. If this implied grant is the foundation of the doctrine in question, where the sale is by reference to a map, it is difficult to perceive any ground for a distinction which would limit the appurtenant way to the streets necessary for access to the outside world. It is obvious that the convenience of the use of the way over the side streets, as compared with those leading to general public highways, is merely a matter of degree, and that it does not affect the technical right. The decisions of other states, for the most part, make no such distinction. The cases which suggest or hold that no such appurtenance is given in side streets are those in which time had shown that the scheme of subdivision and settlement as a part of a town or village had failed, in whole or in part; or where the lots on the closed streets were unoccupied, and where such lots and interlying streets were used for agriculture or other purposes incompatible with use for dwellings or business, and which rendered such streets useless; or where the lot in question was so remote from the closed street that the damage was infinitesimal, and the remedy by injunction was considered inapplicable on the ground that the law does not regard trifles. The prevailing doctrine, however, seems to be that the technical right extends to all the streets, and that it will be enforced in equity with respect to all the streets which the particular lot owner has occasion to use, but that the closing of a remote street which can be of no material benefit to the particular lot in question will not in general be enjoined.

In the present case the alley lies directly opposite plaintiff's lot, it leads toward the ocean beach, and it gives access to the right of way and track of the railroad. This may or may not at the present time be open to the general public for passage to the station, but such passage may be allowed in the future, and in that event the alley would be more valuable to the lot. The defendant has no right to permanently close the alley because of any uncertainty on this point. The plaintiff is entitled to whatever benefit may exist from the prospect that such use may be permitted in the future. The evidence shows that it has been so used in the past.

There is a finding that the alley has not been used for passage to and from the streets of the tract or the houses thereon, to or from said railroad right of way. This is contrary to the evidence. It appears without contradiction that it had been used by the plaintiff and others for passage on foot to such an extent that there was a path made which was distinctly visible. It is established by the findings and the evidence that the alley was of sufficient benefit to the plaintiff as a private appurtenance to the lot, to support a complaint for an injunction to prevent its obstruction. The conclusion that it is of no use or benefit to plaintiff or to her land, and that its closure causes her no injury, is not sustained by the facts proven.

The rule is that if an obstruction to a private easement is continuous, exclusive, and under claim of right, so that it will eventually destroy the easement by adverse possession thereof, an injunction will be granted against such obstruction, although substantial damage has not yet been caused by the obstruction. In such a case the damage will be substantial when the adverse occupation has extinguished the right of way. This is sufficient to justify the injunction to prevent the continued occupation, which would eventually operate to take a right in real property from the true owner. Mendelson v. McCabe, 144 Cal. 232, 103 Am. St. Rep. 78, 77 Pac. 915, and cases there cited. This case also decides that where such trespasses are of a continuing nature, and the damage for each day's obstruction is insignificant, the remedy of successive actions at law for such damages is inadequate, and equity will interpose by injunction.

The judgment and order are reversed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM F. NICHOLLS, et al., Respts.,
v.
LEWIS & CLARK MINING COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Idaho, —, 109 Pac. 846.)

Mine — excessive location — effect.

1. Where an excessive mineral location has been made through mistake, while the locator was acting in good faith, the location will be void only as to the excess; but where the locator has purposely included within his exterior boundaries an excessive area with the fraudulent intent of holding the entire area under one location, such location is void; or, if made so large that the location cannot be deemed the result of innocent error or mistake, fraud may be presumed.

Same — boundaries.

2. Where the exterior boundaries of a mineral location include such an unreasonably excessive area that such boundary lines cannot be said to impart notice to a prospector of a mineral location or discovery within the reasonable distance of a lawful claim as located under the statute, such location will be held void on the ground that the boundaries of the claim have never been marked and established as required by law.

(May 14, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shoshone County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit in support of an adverse claim to a certain mining claim filed in the United States land office at Cœur d'Alene, Idaho. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gray & Knight, William K. Shissler, and Therrett Towles, for appellant:

The locations of the plaintiffs were so excessive in size as to be void.

Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 683, 33 Pac. 49.

The subsequent locator is at least entitled to the excess.

Note. — Effect of excessive location of mining claim.

The early cases upon this point will be found gathered in a section of the note on the location of mining claims, in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 763, and this note includes only the decisions rendered since the writing of that note.

In Flynn Group Min. Co. v. Murphy (Idaho) 109 Pac. 851, where, through an innocent error, there was an excess of ground in the location of a lode claim, it was held valid only to the extent called for by the notice, and it was further held that subsequent locators might locate the excess. With reference to Justice McBride's language in Atkins v. Hendree, 1 Idaho, 95, to the effect that to claim more than the law allowed was no fraud on others, since they had the same means of ascertaining the attempted fraud as the other had to commit it, the court said: "Chief Justice McBride virtually holds in the case of Atkins v. Hendree, supra, that no fraud can be perpetrated where there exists the same means of ascertaining or discovering the fraud that the other parties had to commit it. We cannot assent to that doctrine, for, as we view it, a fraudulent act still remains fraudulent even though there exists very plain and simple means of ascertaining or discovering the fraud. Where a claim is located in good faith and contains some excess of ground, the location is valid except as to the excess, and others who may desire to make a location may measure the ground and confine the first locator to the limits prescribed by law. The sufficiency of each notice of location depends upon the facts and circumstances surrounding it, and will be liberally construed in the light of such facts and circumstances, when it appears that the locations have been made in good faith.

Bismark Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. North Sunbeam Gold Co. 14 Idaho, 516, 95 Pac. 14.

Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an adverse suit which was commenced by the respondents claiming to be the owners of the Senator lode claim, with which it was alleged the Louis and Clark lode claims conflicted. On September 4, 1905, W. Z. Pepper, a prospector and the predecessor in interest of the appellant corporation, discovered a vein of mineral-bearing rock in the Hunter mining district, Shoshone county, and thereupon posted two notices of location, one for the Louis and the other for the Clark claim. The validity of the discovery is not questioned. At the time of making the discovery and posting the notices, Pepper met the respondent Gribble, who informed him that he (Gribble) owned certain claims which embraced the ground Pepper was about to locate. It seems that he then stated that he owned ground embraced in four claims in a compact body, being 3,000 feet in length by 1,800 feet in width. These claims were named, respectively, the "Senator," "Lost Booze," "Prize," and "Princess." The claim with which it is urged that Pepper's locations conflicted was the so-called "Senator." At the time of Pepper's discovery and location, he did not know of the existence of the Senator claim, except what Gribble told him. Gribble did not, and apparently could not, show Pepper the stakes to the Senator claim. Pepper testifies that Gribble did not point out or show him any of the stakes or corners or the discovery on the Senator, but that, on the contrary, Gribble told him that the stakes had either been removed or burned down. Gribble, however, testifies that he pointed out the stake at the southeast corner of the Senator and also the east center end stake. He says: "I told him [Pepper] where they were,—two or three of the corners. Only one of them stakes I told him at the southeast corner of the Senator and the center post. I didn't know where the others was; I couldn't find any." After this conversation, Pepper went to the county recorder's office at Wallace, and ascertained from the records the names and descriptions of the claims that Gribble court therefore holds that a subsequent locator may measure the ground of a prior location from the discovery, and ascertain the extent of such location, and if it contains more ground within its boundaries than is described in the location notice, and more land than can be located under one location, the subsequent locator may locate the excess and maintain his right thereto. This rule applies to locations not fraudulent on account of containing an unreasonable excess of ground, and it has no application to fraudulent locations such as in the case of NICHOLLS v. LEWIS & C. MIN. CO., for, if the location is absolutely void, the ground included therein has not been segregated thereby from the public domain. There is no contention made in the case at bar that the excess in the Snowdrift location, if there was any, was the result of fraudulent intent, but we think it is conceded that such excess, if there was any, was the result of innocent error."

In Jones v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 177 Fed. 95, where a placer mining claim for 20 acres actually included 22 acres, but it appeared that the locators had acted in good faith, it was held invalid only to the extent of the excess, and until the locators were given notice of the excess and an opportunity to select and cast off, it was held that such excess was segregated from the public domain and exempt from relocation. And to the same effect are Waskey v. Hammer, 95 C. C. A. 305, 170 Fed. 31, and Zimmerman v. Funchion, 89 C. C. A. 53, 161 Fed. 859.

J. T. W.

had located in that locality. He found that the location notice of the Senator described that claim as adjoining the Lost Booze on the north and the Princess on the east. He also found that these various location notices claimed ground to the extent of 600 feet in width and 1,500 feet in length for every claim. He thereupon returned to the ground, taking with him a 100-foot tape measure, found the discovery cut or shaft on the Lost Booze claim, measured 900 feet north from this discovery, which allowed 300 feet for the north half of the Lost Booze and a full width of 600 feet for the Senator. He there established the south line of the Louis claim. He thereupon staked his claim, and also located to the east of that claim the Clark lode. These claims as then located and staked on the ground contained substantially the same area and practically identical lines with the same claims as surveyed for patent.

The evidence on the part of the appellant shows that Pepper and his associates and those who worked for him were unable to find any of the stakes on the Senator claim, except one tree that was squared and on which there were no markings, and which Pepper testified that Nichols marked as the east center end of the Senator subsequent to Pepper's location of the Louis. It is conceded by all parties that there was no location notice posted on the Senator at the time of the Louis location.

The testimony of the respondents, Nicholls and Gribble, and their witnesses, shows that the Lost Booze claim was located in 1901, and the Prize, Princess, and Senator were located in 1903. The Lost Booze, the Senator, and the conflict with the Louis and Clark claims, are shown by the following diagram made from the surveyor's notes (see next page):

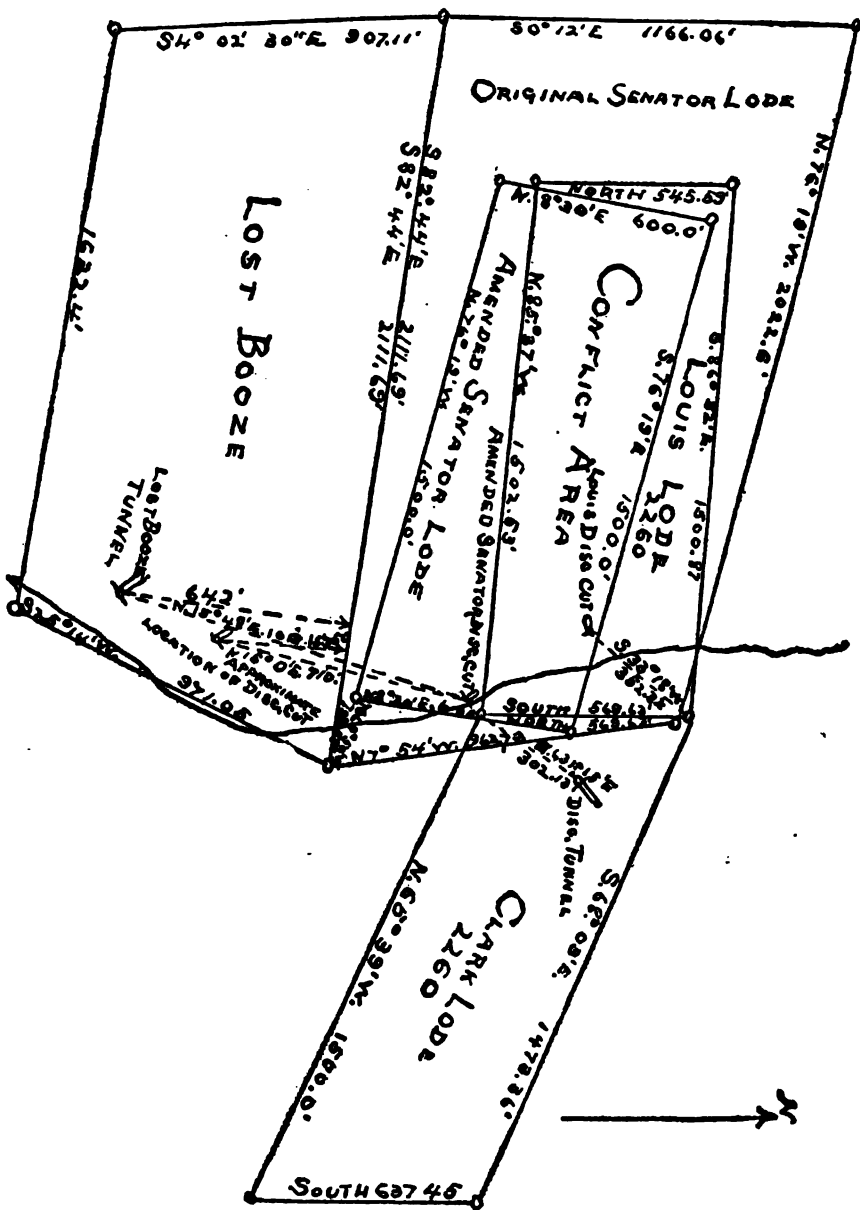

The Prize claim adjoins the Lost Booze on the west, and the Princess adjoins the Prize on the north and the Senator on the west. These two claims, however, are not involved in this case, and only appear as two of the group of claims which the respondents were attempting to hold at the time of the location by Pepper of the Louis and Clark claims. On or about the 18th of September, 1906, the respondents employed an engineer to make a survey of these four claims. It was ascertained from that survey that the ground covered by the four locations comprised a compact area of about 4,649 feet in length by 2,075 feet in width; whereas it could lawfully have embraced in the four locations only an area of 1,200 feet in width by 3,000 feet in length. It was also shown by that survey that the Senator claim had an average width of about 1,065 feet by an average length of about 2,067 feet. In other words, this claim embraced an area equal to more than two and one-third full claims. The respondents therefore had actual knowledge from September, 1906, of the area and extent of the Senator claim, as they insist that it was staked on the ground. They made no effort, however, toward drawing in their lines or making an amended location, until after the appellant had applied for patent and after the respondents had filed their adverse suit. Their lines were not readjusted until March 31, 1908, on which latter date the surveyor made an amended location, and they staked the ground to conform with the amended location which covers the ground in conflict in this action.

It is contended by the appellant in this case that respondents' locations of the Senator, the Lost Booze, the Prize, and Princess are so excessive in area as to render the locations void. While counsel for appellant do not place their reliance in so many words on failure of the locators to properly mark the boundaries of their claims by establishing at each corner thereof and at any angle in the side lines a monument marked with the name of the claim and corner, etc., as required by the statute (§ 3207, Rev. Codes), still the argument leads to that conclusion and results in that position. It is said in the brief that the location is a fraudulent location by reason of the excessive area embraced within the pretended external boundaries, and that this fraud is further emphasized and established by the fact that, although the locators had positive proof in September, 1906, when the survey was made, of the excessive size of the claims, still no effort was made to adjust the external boundaries, or to re-establish the corners and the stakes and monuments upon the true line as required by law, until after the appellant had applied for a patent and the adverse suit had been instituted.

Considerable discussion has taken place among the courts and text writers, as to the effect of a location which includes within its boundaries an area in excess of the statutory maximum. After an examination of all the authorities that have been called to our attention bearing on this subject, we are inclined to the belief that the more reasonable rule, and one eminently just and equitable, is that adopted by this court in Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49. The court there said: "Were the boundaries of the Mammoth so large as to render the location void? Easterly of the discovery point it was marked about 150 feet longer than the calls of the notice, and was considerably wider than allowed by law, while the westerly 1,000 feet was marked substantially correct in size. Strict accuracy in the marking of claims cannot be expected or required. The character of the ground over which the locator must make his measurements must be considered; if even, with unobstructed view, greater accuracy would be required than when the surface is broken, and covered with timber. If a claim is made excessive in size with fraudulent intent, it is void. If made so large that it cannot be deemed the result of innocent error, fraud will be presumed; or if from any cause it be made so large and with such indistinct markings that its boundaries cannot be readily traced, and subsequent locators, after reasonable diligence, cannot find the same, it would be void as against another location made in good faith. Just what excess will be tolerated, or what will vitiate, cannot be defined, but must depend somewhat upon the circumstances of each case. In Montana, it has been held a claim located 1,763 feet long is void, and the tendency there is toward strict accuracy of boundary; while in other courts it has been held that, in the absence of fraud, the claim will be held void only as to the excess. Stemwinder Min. Co. v. Emma & L. C. Consol. Min. Co. 2 Idaho, 456, 21 Pac. 1040; Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 579, 29 L. ed. 273, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. (C. C.) 7 Sawy. 190, 11 Fed. 675. In this case it appears the ground is such that accuracy in measurement could not be expected; also that the Lackawanna was discovered and located mostly on the westerly end of the Mammoth, where the latter was correctly marked. It cannot be presumed, from all the circumstances of the case, the Lackawanna locators were misled by these markings, and the conclusion of the trial court is sustained."

Substantially the same rule was suggested by the supreme court of Oregon in Gohres v. Illinois & J. Gravel Min. Co. 40 Or. 516, 67 Pac. 666, wherein that court said: "Where an excessive location has been made through mistake, while acting in good faith, as where the locator sets his stakes and estimates his distances without chain or compass, it is void only as to the excess. This rule is of general application, except, it may be, where the excess is so large as to give rise to an inference of bad faith."

Substantially the same statement was made in Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 29 L. ed. 273, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055. This latter case, however, has been cited by some text writers as supporting the contention that the location of an excessive area will never avoid the claim, but will only render it voidable to the extent of the excess. The question that was being discussed by the Supreme Court in that case, as well as the language used by the 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) learned justice who wrote the opinion, entirely fails to justify the assertion that this case goes to the extent claimed. The opinion in that case specifically bases the rule announced on the principle of "good faith" in the locator.

It is true, as contended by appellant, that it has been held by the supreme court of Montana in two cases (Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 299, 1 Pac. 714, and Leggatt v. Stewart, 5 Mont. 107, 2 Pac. 320), that "the location of a mining claim must conform in all respects to the statute authorizing it, and boundaries beyond the extent of the location are no boundaries at all," and accordingly the court held that a claim that was staked and marked on the ground 2,000 feet in length, was in fact and in law not marked and bounded on the ground at all, and was therefore void. We think that rule is too strict and severe, and we would not be willing to go to that extent.

Mr. Lindley, in vol. 1, § 362, of his work on Mines, speaking of this subject, says: "The courts uniformly hold that such a location, where it injures no one at the time it is made, and where it has been made in good faith, is voidable only to the extent of the excess. . . . An excessive location cannot be said to be a fraud upon others. It cannot take away rights already acquired by prior appropriation. A location within the statutory limit cannot accomplish this. As to subsequent locators, they can measure the ground from the preliminary discovery notice, which is universally posted at, or in reasonable proximity to, the point of discovery."

It should be remembered that it takes more than the posting of a "discovery notice" to constitute a valid location of a mining claim. Section 3207, Rev. Codes, and § 2320, U. S. Rev. Stat. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424. It is just as essential that the exterior boundaries of the claim be marked by the setting of posts and the erection of monuments as it is that a discovery notice be posted. Indeed, the general rule prevails that courses and distances give way to the actual monuments and markings on the ground. It is eminently fair and reasonable and just to say that an innocent mistake has been made when the exterior boundaries of a claim are marked on the surface of the ground 25, 50 or possibly 100 feet beyond and in excess of the area to which the claimant is actually entitled under the statute, and that such posts and monuments impart notice to a prospector who is looking for vacant, unappropriated public domain on which to locate a mining claim. These monuments and markings on the surface of the ground may be further said to direct the prospector to look for the location notice and the discovery shaft or tunnel on the claim. In such case, however, he has a right to assume that he will find the location notice and the discovery within the boundary of a statutory claim from the point where he discovers the monuments. If, however, the exterior monuments and boundaries as established by the locator, instead of being 100 feet beyond where it should be located, be 500 feet away, what is to be said of the notice it imparts to the prospector, or as to whether this in fact constitutes the exterior boundary of a valid claim that has been located in conformity with law? But if there still be any doubt about the validity of the claim when the exterior boundary is as remote as 500 feet beyond what the law permits, can there be any doubt about it when it is 5,000 feet beyond the maximum limit allowed by law? Is the prospector in such a case to sweep the country for a distance of 5,300 feet or 6,500 feet, as the case may be, to find the discovery hole and the discovery or location notice on the claim, in order to measure off a statutory claim? In such a case, is it not a fact that no valid location has ever been made for want of established monuments and posts and the marking of the exterior boundaries of the claim? In such case can it be said that there is any valid location? Is it not as much a fraud on the prospector, who is looking for vacant ground on which to locate a mining claim, to hold such an excessive location valid, and thereby exclude him from locating, as it would be to allow the prior would-be locator to exclude him from any other portion of the public domain?

We are perfectly safe, we think, in saying that all the authorities, with the possible exception of the two Montana cases, are in accord in holding that a location in a reasonable excess of the maximum area allowed by law, which is honestly and innocently made, will be permitted and sanctioned by the courts to the extent of a lawful claim. But just the point at which the excess becomes so great as to render the attempted location void has never been definitely enunciated by any of the courts, so far as we are able to find. And yet it is perfectly apparent that we must reach a limit some time, beyond which no court would hold that there had ever been made any valid location, by reason of the stakes and monuments attempting to include such an excessive and enormous area of the public domain as to amount to no markings on the ground at all, and imparting no notice to the prospector, and therefore being a total failure to comply with the statute in its requirements that the locator shall "mark the boundaries of his claim by establishing at every corner thereof, and at any angle in the side lines, a monument marked with the name of the claim and the corner or angle it represents," etc. The locator cannot be allowed to stake off a section, or a township, and hold it as one claim. This must necessarily be determined upon the facts of each case. The general character and topography of the country, the conditions and season of the year in which the location was made, the opportunity the locator has had for learning that he has made an excessive location, his facilities for measuring the claim, and his subsequent conduct with reference to the area embraced in the claim, are all proper subjects of inquiry and consideration in determining the good faith of the locator of the excessive claim.

Mr. Snyder, in volume 1 of his work on Mines, at § 397, in considering this question and referring to Burke v. McDonald, says: "The supreme court of Idaho, on the other hand, has reached a conclusion somewhat more liberal than the Montana court, holding that if the excessive boundaries are the result of innocent error, the claim should be held valid, except as to the excess, which is rejected; but if the excessive boundaries are laid with fraudulent intent, the entire claim is void. As indicated in the beginning of this section, the latter rule seems the sound one. . . . The principal obstacle to be encountered in applying the doctrine enunciated by the Idaho court, as we view it, is that it would be a very difficult matter to ascertain in a particular case whether the excessive boundaries were laid with fraudulent intent. The court certainly could not say as matter of law that they were so laid, and if the question is considered one of fact, we hardly see just how it would be proved. And, after all, what object has the locator to attempt to include more ground in his location than is authorized by law? When he makes his location he has the statute staring him in the face, and knows that whenever he applies for a patent to his claim he will then be restricted to the amount authorized by law. We think the Idaho court had the correct understanding of the matter, and reached the conclusion, which should have been followed in the later cases, when it said, speaking through Chief Justice McBride: 'If he claims more than the law allows, it is void for the excess. . . . To claim more than the law allows is no fraud on others, for they have the same means of ascertaining the attempted fraud that the other has to commit it.'"

It will be observed that the author here calls attention to the case of Atkins v. Hendree, 1 Idaho, 95, in which Chief Justice McBride, speaking for the territorial court, enunciated the rule from which Mr. Lindley has evidently gathered the substance of his text, to which we have heretofore adverted. We desire to say at this time that we are not in accord with the latter portion of the opinion in Atkins v. Hendree, which is quoted by the learned author and to which he calls specific attention. We do not think it is the duty of the prospector who finds a post or other monument erected as a part of the exterior boundary of a mining claim, to sweep the country for an unreasonable distance to find a location or discovery notice. If he has any doubt about the monuments properly marking the exterior lines of the claim, it is his duty to examine within the limits and territory which the statute authorizes such a claim to include, and perhaps a reasonable area contiguous thereto. But it would be a clear fraud on him to charge him with notice of the contents of a discovery or location notice at an unreasonable distance beyond the limits or confines of a claim which the monuments found or discovered could properly include.

Coming, now, to the facts of this specific case, we are impelled to hold that the excessive area included in the Senator and Lost Booze locations, when considered in the light of subsequent events, clearly avoids the Senator location and renders it a nullity. The locator of the Senator learned definitely and to a certainty in September, 1906, that he had included within the exterior boundaries of that location an area sufficient for two whole claims and more than one third of another claim, and yet he made no effort to readjust his boundaries,—to set new stakes and monuments,—until after this adverse suit had been filed; and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the locators of the Louis and Clark claims had been doing their work on those claims and had been developing them, and that their successor in interest had done the work which it claimed sufficient to entitle it to a United States patent for the claims. Finally, when the locators of the Senator claim came to adjust their boundaries, they did the very thing that such excessive locations would permit, and that is to swing the claim; and so they moved the claim on the east so that the southern boundary line would not touch the Lost Booze, and then swung the west end of the claim north until it was removed more than 200 feet from the north line of the Lost Booze. All the while their location notice, as it appeared of record, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) had advised appellant and all the world that the Senator was a contiguous and adjoining claim to the Lost Booze on the north. They also adjusted their claim so as to take everything within their original exterior boundaries on the east and thereby threw off more than 500 feet on the west. This, of course, was perfectly proper and legitimate, if it is permissible to locate a claim with so vast an area, and thereafter so adjust the lines within the exterior boundaries of a large location as to take according to the calls of the notice. This amended location was swung so as to include the discovery shaft on the Louis claim. These are the very things against which the law is made to protect prospectors. It should be further observed that, at the time of the location of the Louis and Clark, there was no discovery or location notice posted on the Senator. Indeed, it is admitted by the locators of the Senator that the location notice had been destroyed prior to this time. Of course, the law does not require the locator of a claim to keep his notice up perpetually, but the fact that it was gone shows the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of the locators of the Louis and Clark, discovering the calls or situs of the notice, and thereby fixing the true maximum boundaries of the Senator claim on the ground. It is also clear that if any discovery cut actually existed on the Senator, it was very indistinct. It is the duty of the locator to mark the boundaries of his claim, and it is the duty of the subsequent locator to keep outside of and beyond those boundaries.

Viewed in the light of subsequent events and the evidence of bad faith furnished by the locator himself, it is clear that the Senator location is fraudulent and void, and was not made in good faith. The judgment in this case should be reversed, and it is so ordered, and the cause is remanded. Costs in favor of appellant.

Sullivan, Ch. J., and Stewart, J., concur.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Sullivan, Ch. J., on June 22, 1910, handed down the following additional opinion:

A petition for a rehearing has been filed in this case. Counsel contends that there was a conflict in the evidence on certain points in which we have reversed the trial court's findings, and also contends that this court erred in holding that if any discovery cut actually existed on the Senator claim, it was very indistinct, and that the measurements referred to should have been made from the discovery point on the Senator claim instead of the discovery on the Lost Booze claim. After this court held that the Senator location was absolutely void because of the excessive area it contained, it mattered not what the findings of the trial court were with reference to the discovery point on the Senator claim. If the location was absolutely void because of the excess, it could not be sustained under any findings whatever with reference to the discovery, as it takes more than a discovery to make a valid location.

After a careful consideration of the case, we are clearly of the opinion that a rehearing should not be granted. A rehearing is therefore denied.

Allshie, J., concurs.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

I. L. PARK for Use of C. D. Bouman, Appt.,

v.

G. W. McCAULEY, Exr., etc., of Annie R. Russell, Deceased, et al.

(— W. Va. —, 67 S. E. 174.)

Execution — lien on legacy.

1. A writ of fieri facias in the hands of an officer for execution is a lien upon a legacy given to the debtor.

Same — enforcement.

2. A suggestion and summons to answer it, under §§ 10 and 11, chap. 141, Code 1906, do not create a lien, but are only means of enforcing an execution lien already existing.

Same — payment to debtor — liability to creditor.

3. One paying an execution debtor a debt, with notice of an execution against him, is liable therefor to the execution creditor.

Justice of the peace — execution — lien.

4. An execution issued by a justice has the same effect as a lien as one issued upon a judgment of a circuit court.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Hardy County in defendants' favor in a suit to enforce the lien Headnotes by BRANNON, J.

Note. — A search has failed to disclose any other cases upon the question whether an execution constitutes a lien upon an unpaid legacy in the hands of an executor. This question, it should be noted, is distinct from that as to whether a levy may be made under an execution upon such a legacy; upon which latter question a number of decisions may be found.

of an execution against the proceeds of a certain legacy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benjamin Dailey and M. W. Gamble for appellant:

Messrs. Gilkeson & McCauley, for appellees:

An execution issued by the clerk of the circuit court against a judgment debtor, and placed in the hands of a sheriff, is not a lien on funds in the hands of an executor or administrator, that may be due or coming to the judgment debtor.

Brewer v. Hutton, 45 W. Va. 107, 72 Am. St. Rep. 804, 30 S. E. 81; 1 Freeman, Executions, §§ 129-131.

Section 2 of chapter 141 of the Code of 1906 does not apply to executions issued by a justice.

State v. McKain, 56 W. Va. 131, 49 S. E. 20; Mountain City Mill Co. v. Southern, 46 W. Va. 754, 34 S. E. 782; O'Connor v. Dils, 43 W. Va. 57, 26 S. E. 354; Bishop, Statutory Crimes, §§ 126, 126a.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

C. D. Bouman recovered a judgment for money before a justice against John B. Russell. Annie R. Russell died, having made a will bequeathing her property to John B. Russell. Her property consisted of personalty. Bouman had an execution issued from the justice on his judgment, and placed in the hands of a constable. The execution was docketed in the execution lien book in the county clerk's office, under § 2, chap. 141, Code 1906. G. W. McCauley qualified as executor of Annie R. Russell. He had actual notice of the execution, and actual notice of such recordation, and that Bouman claimed from it a lien on the legacy in McCauley's hands as executor. (I state the fact of recordation, though it does not seem to me that recordation is notice to one paying, but only to a purchaser.) Several months after the recordation and notice of the execution, McCauley, denying that the execution bound the money in his hands going to John B. Russell under said will, paid the money under it to John B. Russell. Then, I. L. Park, the constable having the execution, and Bouman, brought a chancery suit against McCauley as executor to enforce the lien of his execution against any money in the executor's hands going to Russell, if any yet was in his hands, and, if not, to compel the executor to pay the debt out of what money he had paid Russell after notice of the execution. The answer of McCauley admitted the facts alleged in the bill, and admitted notice of the execution before he paid the money to Russell, but denied that the execution was a lien on the legacy, or that he was liable for money which he had paid Russell. The decree absolved McCauley from liability for money so paid Russell, but decreed to complainant against McCauley a small sum yet in his hands, wholly insufficient to pay the execution. Park appeals for use of Bouman.

It is insisted by counsel that the execution is no lien on the legacy, because it is in the hands of the executor, and thus in custodia legis. It seems to us unreasonable to say that, under the sweeping broad language of Code 1906, chap. 141, § 2, an execution is not a lien on money going to a legatee. The section says that the execution shall be a lien "upon all the personal estate of which the judgment debtor is possessed, or to which he is entitled, . . . although not levied on, nor capable of being levied on." Is not a legacy "personal estate to which he is entitled?" The legatee has it not in possession, but is entitled to it. What is the object of this provision? To give a lien on all personalty in possession, or to which the debtor is entitled, though not capable of being levied, as a chose in action. A legacy cannot be levied, but it is property known in law as a chose in action. If the execution is no lien, then the creditor is without remedy. To think that a large legacy is not amenable to creditors! What other means has the creditor for enforcement of his debt? Look at the need to be answered, the object. This lien searches for and finds all personalty. It may be a legacy in the hands of a receiver. Even if in custodia legis, though not otherwise to be enforced, it may get the creditor his money by application to the court in whose custody the fund is. A lien can be created on a fund in the hands of a court by execution. You have to go to the court for payment; but you have a lien. There are no exceptions to this lien save those in the section specified. I will not reiterate the cases construing this section, given in so many decisions. The language is its own construer. Huling v. Cabell, 9 W. Va. 522, 27 Am. Rep. 562; Wiant v. Hays, 38 W. Va. 681, 23 L.R.A. 82, 18 S. E. 807; Puryear v. Taylor, 12 Gratt. 401; Charron v. Roswell, 18 Gratt. 216. In Swann v. Summers, 19 W. Va. 125, this court said that a legacy could not be subjected by garnishment of the executor, he not owing a debt; but said, "this feri facias clearly gives him a lien on this legacy." There it is held that suit may be maintained in equity by the motion of the officer or any one interested to enforce the lien,—a pointed case to show that a feri facias is a lien on a legacy enforceable in equity. It may even be attached so as to create a lien. Vance v. McLaughlin, 8 Gratt. 289; Sandidge v. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Graves, 1 Patton & H. (Va.) 101. Then, why not subject to lien by execution? The Code makes anyone liable for the lien paying to the execution debtor with notice of the lien. It is useless to refer to Brewer v. Hutton, 45 W. Va. 107, 72 Am. St. Rep. 804, 30 S. E. 81, saying that property in custody of the law is not attachable, and that neither the administrator nor a debtor of the estate can be garnished. Of course not, as that would give one creditor of a dead man preference over others, and hinder the settlement of the estate. When one dies his assets are for payment of all debts, and one creditor cannot, by garnishing a debtor of the decedent, get it out of lawful administration for all. That was an attachment of a debt going to an estate. This is a lien on a legacy payable after payment of debts. Different cases.

It is argued that McCauley, having paid Russell before the chancery suit began, is not liable. This was held by the circuit court, as this is given by the decree as a reason for absolving McCauley from liability. The suit created no lien. Without an antecedent independent lien, the suit would have no ground on which to rest. It is a suit only to enforce the pre-existing lien of the fi. fa. Counsel seek to support that holding by saying that § 11 of chapter 141, touching suggestions to enforce execution liens against persons owing the debtor, provides that, if such person is liable at the time of service on him of the summons to answer the suggestion, he shall be required to pay. Counsel say that this position is sustained by the fact that § 11 as in Acts 1872-73, chap. 218, was changed by chapter 127, Acts 1882, to what it now is in the Code of 1906; whereas before it read, "If it appear on such examination that there is any such liability on him, the court may order him to pay any debts, or deliver any estate for which there is such liability," it now reads, under the act of 1882, "If it appear on such examination or answer that there is any such liability on him at the time of the service of the summons, or at any time thereafter and before the time of answering or the return day of the execution, whichever comes first, the court may order him to pay." This theory is answered by the consideration that neither the suggestion nor the summons upon it creates or starts any lien. They are only a means of enforcing the antecedent lien of the execution. I think the act of 1882 made no change on this point. Given an execution lien, and notice of it by a person owing the debtor, that person cannot pay the money to the debtor, and, upon a suggestion, answer that he had discharged himself from liability by such payment, saying that the money had been paid when the summons to answer the suggestion was served. Neither statute would allow this. If so, what is the worth of § 2 declaring the lien? What the force of its provision that he cannot pay the judgment debtor, if he have notice of the lien? Shall we give § 11 a meaning to enable the stakeholder to do what § 2 says he shall not do? Both sections in the same chapter. If the stakeholder have notice before service of the summons, he is, at the date of service, liable under § 11 at the date of service of the summons upon the suggestion, in the words of the statute. If he pay before notice, then he would not be liable at such service. Section 11 makes the stakeholder liable if when served he is liable, and he is still liable if he has made payment with notice. The suggestion does not destroy the prior lien, but, on the contrary, has for its purpose the enforcement of it. The construction contended for would make the suggestion and the summons to answer it instruments to destroy it. Section 11 does not make the suggestion prejudice a prior lien, but enforces it. Indeed, if the stakeholder has no prior notice, the summons upon the suggestion would operate as notice, and prevent afterpayment to the judgment debtor. I have said that the suggestion is not the parent of the lien, but only a garnishment process to enforce the execution lien. This is held in Trevillian v. Guerrant, 31 Gratt. 525. The court said: "The remedies afforded by the other sections of same chapter (188) were designed simply to enforce this lien of the execution. The lien itself is as complete and perfect without them as with them." In Charron v. Boswell, 18 Gratt. 225, Judge Moncure said: "These proceedings do not give any lien at all, general or specific. They are merely a means provided by law for the enforcement of a legal lien which already exists." There can be no suggestion without execution lien. The very language of § 10, chap. 141, shows there is no basis for it without such lien, as it reads: "On a suggestion by the judgment creditor that, by reason of the lien of his writ of fieri facias, there is a liability on any person." We so held in McKay v. McKay, 33 W. Va. 725, 11 S. E. 213.

Another theory of counsel is that, whilst an execution from a circuit court may have the force above assigned, one from a justice has not such force. There comes, what to my mind seems strong in repulse of that theory, the argument that we ought not give statutes in the same Code act, made for remedy and enforcement of vital rights, a construction discriminative between suitors similarly situated. The law allows a suitor to go either into a circuit or justice's court. One suitor on a promissory note goes into the circuit court, and his execution has the wide lien given by Code 1906, chap. 141, § 2. It is a lien on choses in action, not liable like chattels; on a legacy; on all personality. Another suitor, on a similar note, goes into a justice's court, but his execution gives him a much narrower relief. He has right to levy on chattels or money, but his execution is no lien on property not physical and leviable. Such is the contention. We cannot sustain it, and thus produce such partiality in the law, such inefficiency of remedy, between suitors alike circumstanced. It is said that the chapter controlling justice's court is here to control as the only law; but we think this is not infallibly so. In some instances we must read it along with other parts of the Code in matters in pari materia, as we did in Livesay v. Dunn, 33 W. Va. 453, 10 S. E. 808, holding the same statute of limitations applicable to judgments of both circuit and justice's courts. Both that and chapter 141 relate to the lien of an execution. Let us look at the provisions about this matter. Section 135, chap. 50, Code 1906, in the justices' chapter, makes an execution from a justice "command the person to whom it is directed to collect the amount due out of the personal property of the judgment debtor." This is broad. Section 139 makes it a lien on the "personal property of the judgment debtor liable to be seized under it." This, taken alone, imports only tangible, leviable chattels. Going to chapter 141, § 2, we find it saying "every writ of fieri facias" shall be a lien on the debtors' personal estate, whether leviable or not. No good reason—none but the most technical—demands that we exclude a justice's execution from the comprehensive expression "every writ;" but, as suggested above, harmony between remedial sections in the same Code, on the same matter, equality between suitors similarly situated, forbid it. Another clause says that when the execution is docketed it shall be an abiding lien from the time it is delivered to the "sheriff or other officer." What other officer? Why not say a constable holding an execution from a justice? Why not? It seems to me that § 6 of chapter 141 gives strong evidence to show that a justice's execution has the width of lien given by § 2. Section 4 allows interrogatories to be put to the debtor before a commissioner, to find what estate the lien covers. Section 6 requires the commissioner to return papers "to the court in which the judgment is, or, if the judgment be of a justice, to the circuit court." It is suggested that § 118, chap. 50, Code 1906, provides for filing in the circuit court office a transcript of the judgment from the justice's docket, and execution may be issued thereon with like effect as upon a judgment in the circuit court. From this we are to say that the only way by which execution on a justice's judgment can be issued to have the same effect as a lien as an execution on a circuit court judgment is by filing such transcript in the clerk's office. That provision had no such office. Perhaps the owner of the judgment might prefer to have a sheriff collect over a constable, or have it of more permanent or more accessible record, or have a suggestion, or send execution to another county. For these reasons, perhaps others, this provision was made. We hold that a justice's execution has the same force as a lien as one on a circuit court judgment.

We reverse the decree and remand the case to the Circuit Court, with direction to enter a decree for the plaintiff against McCauley for proper amount and costs.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

R. H. PORTER et al., Exrs., etc., of S. R. McNutt, Deceased, Appts.,
v.

R. W. HUIE.

94 333
(— Ark. —, 126 S. W. 1069.)

Note — accommodation indorsers — contribution.

The one whose name stands first among those of several persons who place their names on the back of a note before delivery cannot, upon paying the note, compel the others to contribute towards the amount paid, in the absence of any express agreement that they should be equally bound.

(March 28, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Clark Chancery Court dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover contribution upon a certain promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Crawford and T. D. Crawford, for appellants:

Successive indorsers for accommodation of a promissory note are cosureties, and can recover contribution from each other.

Douglas v. Waddle, 1 Ohio, 413, 13 Am. Dec. 630; Greenough v. Smead, 3 Ohio St. 422; Daniel v. McRae, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks.) 590, 11 Am. Dec. 787; Atwater v. Farthing, 118 N. C. 388, 24 S. E. 736; Pitkin v. Flanagan, 23 Vt. 160, 53 Am. Dec. 61; Middleton v. McCartee, 2 Mackey, 420; Machado v. Fernandez, 74 Cal. 362, 16 Pac. 19; Nathan 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. Callaway & Huie, for appellee:

An accommodation indorser who indorses before delivery of the note to the payee, and in order to give the maker credit, is liable jointly as a comaker, so far as the holder of the note is concerned, but is liable as a technical indorser so far as the other indorsers are concerned in the absence of any special agreement, and is not liable as a cosurety to the other indorsers.

Note. — Rights inter se of accommodation parties to commercial paper.

This note does not purport to include cases which find that there was an express agreement between the parties to bear the relationship of cosureties, and therefore to be subject to contribution; nor cases involving merely the rights of accommodation parties to commercial paper, where collaterals have been deposited by the principal as securities for the debt.

It is a general rule followed by an overwhelming weight of authority that the relationship between accommodation parties to a note is the same as that existing between the parties to ordinary business paper. Their liability, inter se, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, is that expressed by the paper itself, and their liability is successive, and not joint; consequently they are not cosureties, and the doctrine of contribution does not obtain.

This rule applies equally well whether the case is one in which a first indorser, who has paid the bill, seeks to enforce contribution against subsequent indorsers, or whether the last indorser seeks to collect the full amount of the paper from a prior indorser. Nor, with the exception of some Ohio decisions, which will be noted hereafter, does it appear that there is any distinction between bills of exchange and ordinary promissory notes or other paper. The only question, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, is what is the prima facie liability of the parties as shown by the paper itself.

Of course, there can be no question as to the right of any accommodation party to recover from the principal debtor, in the absence of any extrinsic circumstances affecting the rights of the parties.

Some cases proceed as if the liability is joint, and consequently contribution may be enforced without expressly discussing the question presented by the title to this note, or without expressly finding that there was

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 28th day of July, 1888, the Arkadelphia Cotton Mills executed to J. A. Hardage a promissory note as follows:

$1,000. Arkadelphia, July 28, 1888.

On July 28, 1889, we promise to pay to the order of J. A. Hardage one thousand dollars at 10 per cent interest from date until paid. Value received.

Arkadelphia Cotton Mills,

an agreement to that effect between the parties. No attempt has been made to collect the cases of that character. It should be stated that in many cases the court, following the general rule, treats accommodation parties as if they were parties to business paper, and in some such, although the parties may in fact be accommodation indorsers, that fact does not appear at all, or at least only incidentally. And this is especially true where there has been a contract that the parties shall be cosureties, and the primary question is whether parol evidence is admissible to prove such contract.

The general rule, that accommodation indorsers are not cosureties in the absence of any agreement between them, but that their liability inter se is the same as that of parties to business paper, is followed, or at least recognized, in the following cases:

Before the delivery and acceptance of it, the note was signed on the back of it by S. R. McNutt, J. C. Saunders, and R. W. Huie & Company. The Arkadelphia Cotton Mills paid at different times several amounts, aggregating $300. McNutt paid in his life many sums, amounting in the aggregate to $960. He died, and his executors paid $1,391.35, the balance due thereon. His executors brought suit in equity against R. W. Huie, a member of the firm of R. W. Huie & Company, who was the last to sign the note on the back thereof, to recover $1,175.67, one half of the amounts paid thereon by McNutt in his lifetime and by his executors. The trial court dismissed the complaint for want of equity, and plaintiffs appealed.

In Killian v. Ashley, 24 Ark. 511, 91 Am. Dec. 519, the court held that, "where a third party indorses a note in blank at the time it is executed, he is bound as security as fully as if he had written his name on the face under that of the maker." And in Nathan v. Sloan, 34 Ark. 524, this court held that "parties who indorse their names in blank upon an obligation to another at the time it is executed by the maker, and for the same consideration, are joint makers with him, and not guarantors." To the same effect it held in Heise v. Bumpass, 40 Ark. 546; Jones v. Bank of Pine Bluff, 80 Ark. 285, 96 S. W. 1060; Lake v. Little Rock Trust Co. 77 Ark. 53, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1199, 90 S. This question arose in the early case of McDonald v. Magruder, supra, and it was there held that where a note made for the accommodation of the maker was indorsed by the payee as a matter of accommodation, and was also subsequently indorsed by a stranger, the payee and the stranger who thus indorsed the note sustained the relation of first and second indorser, and were not to be regarded as joint cosureties as a matter of law, and the right of contribution would not obtain. The court said: "The second indorser gives his name on the faith of the first indorser as well as of the maker. The first indorser gives his name on the faith of the maker only. Unquestionably these liabilities may be changed by contract, but no contract existing between these parties, it is not a case to which the principle of contribution applies."

The general rule is thus laid down by the court in Willis v. Willis, supra: "Indorsers of a negotiable note, though it be for accommodation of the maker, while all are responsible to its holder, are responsible, as between themselves, in the order of their indorsement, in the absence of an agreement to be bound jointly and equally."

Therefore an indorser is liable to a subsequent indorser paying it, but not to a prior one."

In speaking of the contract entered into by accommodation indorsers, the court in Shaw v. Knox, supra, said: "The legal effect of the contract into which they respectively entered by becoming parties to negotiable paper is that which appears on the face of the bill or note."

So, accommodation indorsers at common law are liable as between each other as indorsers having received value, and the law of contribution does not apply. Stiles v. Eastman, 1 Ga. 206.

The well-settled doctrine is that accommodation paper is governed by the same relation as other paper; and that the first accommodation indorser is liable to the second and subsequent indorsers, and the second to the third, and so on to the end of the indorsements. Connelly v. Bourg, 16 La. Ann. 108, 79 Am. Dec. 568.

And the judgment upon the note in favor of the holder does not so merge the note as to preclude a subsequent indorser from enforcing his rights as shown by the note. Crompton v. Spencer, supra.

The lex mercatoria imposes on the indorser of accommodation paper the obligation to pay to every subsequent indorser in the same manner as on business paper. Knox v. Dixon, 4 La. 466, 23 Am. Dec. 488; Gasquet v. Oakey, 15 La. 537; Connelly v. Bourg, supra.

All accommodation parties as between themselves are bound by the obligations which they assume under the law merchant by becoming such parties. McCune v. Belt, supra. But there is no reason why successive indorsers may not be cosureties if they so agree among themselves. Dunn v. Wade, 23 Mo. 207.

The last accommodation indorser of a note is not released because of the failure of the holder to give a preceding accommodation indorser notice of nonpayment. If the last indorser desired to hold a prior indorser liable, he should have given the notice of nonpayment himself. Crane v. Trudeau, 19 La. Ann. 307.

ing the liability of the parties sued to the holder of the notes, and in none of them did it consider the relation of two or more of the indorsers on notes like the one under consideration to each other. In such cases it is held by the great weight of authorities: "When several persons indorse a bill or negotiable note in succession, the legal effect is to subject them, as to each other, in the order they indorse. The indorsement imports a several and successive, and not a joint, obligation, whether the indorsements be made for accommodation or for value received, unless there be an agreement aliunde different from that evidenced by the indorsements. When the successive indorsements are for accommodation of other parties, the indorsers for accommodation may make an agreement to be jointly and equally bound; but whoever asserts such an agreement must prove it." Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 703; M'Donald v. Magruder, 3 Pet. 470, 7 L. ed. 744. In 7 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 828, the cases on this subject are collected.

In the case at bar McNutt was first indorser, and, as between himself and those whose names follow his, is liable for the whole amount of the note, and, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the other indorsers are not liable to contribute anything to him or his estate. No such agreement was alleged or proved.

Decree affirmed.

An indorser for the accommodation of the maker is entitled to all the privileges of an indorser, and he is equally chargeable to all the persons standing after him on the note. Brown v. Mott, supra.

The provision of the negotiable instrument law that, as respects one another, indorsers are liable prima facie in the order in which they indorse, was held to apply to accommodation indorsers, in State Bank v. Kahn, 49 Misc. 500, 98 N. Y. Supp. 858.

The rule in Alabama was not changed by § 3070 of the Revised Code. Moody v. Findley, 43 Ala. 167.

An agreement made after a note has become due and the liability of the parties fixed, to the effect that each of the parties, including the accommodation indorsers, shall pay a certain proportion of the note, is without consideration so far as the last indorser is concerned, and he may recover from a prior indorser what he has paid thereon. Keeler v. Bartine, 12 Wend. 110.

The voluntary attempt of the last indorser upon a bill of exchange, to arrange one half of the debt on condition that the drawer of the bill would arrange the other half, is an imposing fact to establish the original agreement or understanding that they were joint and equal cosureties. Edelen v. White, 6 Bush, 408.

Where each of three accommodation indorsers agreed with the principal to sign if the others would, there being no agreement as to the order of signing, it was held in Hagerthy v. Phillips, 83 Me. 336, 22 Atl. 223, that the jury would be entitled to find that they were joint indorsers and liable to contribution on the note.

A subsequent accommodation indorser cannot enforce contribution from a prior indorser where there has been turned over to him sufficient personal property of the maker as security to indemnify him from all liability upon the note. Van Patten v. Ulrich, 59 Hun, 628, 37 N. Y. S. R. 348, 13 N. Y. Supp. 940.

The law of contribution has no application where a person indorsed for the accommodation of both of the makers of a note, although one of them was an accommodation maker as to the other. Hanish v. Kennedy, 106 Mich. 455, 64 N. W. 459.

An apparent exception to the rule that where several persons in succession indorsed a negotiable note, the act of each respectively imports a several and successive, and not a joint, obligation, is the case of a note payable to the order of two or more persons, and by them respectively indorsed. In the latter case the liability is joint. Wolf v. Hostetter, 182 Pa. 292, 37 Atl. 988; Foster v. Collner, 107 Pa. 305; Kerr's Estate, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 193.

Where one of two payees in a promissory note indorsed by them for the accommodation of the drawer pays the whole money to the holder after the maturity of the note and protest, he is entitled to recover one-half the money so paid from the other payee. Steckel v. Steckel, 28 Pa. 233.

In Golsen v. Brand, 75 Ill. 148, it was held that the obligation incurred by two persons writing their names in blank on the back of a note is that of guarantors, and if the first has to pay, he may enforce contribution.

An accommodation indorser who has paid the note is not entitled to contribution from a subsequent guarantor, where the indorsement was made prior to and without reference to the subsequent guarantor. Phillips v. Plato, 42 Hun, 189.

Accommodation parties as cosureties.

A few cases, however, hold that accommodation parties to commercial paper are, even in the absence of any express agreement, cosureties, and consequently the law of contribution applies, thus being in conflict with the great weight of authority, which sustains the rule that accommodation parties are liable inter se in the same manner as parties to business paper.

Thus, in Daniel v. McRae, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 590, 11 Am. Dec. 787, it was held that the second accommodation indorser, who had paid the bill, could recover only a moiety against the first accommodation indorser upon a principle of justice and equity that, as they both stood in the same relation as cosureties, there could be no reason why one should be compelled to bear a greater burden than the other; "their indorsements were both gratuitous, and on that account, when made prius or posterius, gave no rule of liability."

And the doctrine of the Daniel Case was followed as the law of North Carolina in Richards v. Simms, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 48, distinguishing Smith v. Smith, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 173, and Gomez v. Lazarus, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 205. But in the Richards Case the court said that, were it res integra, they could not sanction the principle, as it was not in accord with the principle adopted by "the rest of the mercantile world."

So, in Hatcher v. McMorine, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 228, although the case was decided without the aid of the principle established in the Daniel Case, Henderson, J., said that the reason of the United States Supreme Court (in McDonald v. Magruder, 3 Pet. 470, 7 L. ed. 744, supra) was far from satisfying him that they were right, and that Daniel v. McRae was wrong.

And in Dawson v. Pettway, 20 N. C. 531 (4 Dev. & B. 396), the court, in holding that the indorser of a note is not liable in contribution to one who signed the note as a co-obligor of the principal, recognizes the principle of the Daniel Case, but distinguished that from the case at bar.

But in Hubbard v. Williamson, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 397, it was held that a first indorser was liable to a second indorser, because of the order in which their names appeared upon the bill. The earlier North Carolina cases are not mentioned.

However, in Atwater v. Farthing, 118 N. C. 388, 24 S. E. 736, the doctrine of contribution was reasserted, and held to apply for the benefit of the first indorser against a second indorser, upon the authority of the Daniel Case, and no mention is made of the Hubbard Case.

And in Stovall v. Border Grange Bank, 78 Va. 188, it was held, citing the Daniel Case, that where successive indorsers all indorse for accommodation of the maker, though at different times, and without communication or mutual understanding, they are in equity cosureties, and subject to common contribution.

And in Machado v. Fernandez, 74 Cal. 362, 16 Pac. 19, it was held that the plaintiff, an accommodation indorser, could enforce contribution against the defendant, who was also an accommodation indorser. No mention is made of any agreement between the parties, nor is the relative position of their names upon the paper shown.

And in Freeman v. Cherry, 46 Ga. 14, it was held that the first of several accommodation indorsers, who had paid the bill, could enforce contribution against the others, under the express Code provision, "an accommodation indorser is considered merely as a surety." And to the same effect was the decision in Hull v. Myers, 90 Ga. 674, 11 S. E. 653.

So, in Douglas v. Waddle, 1 Ohio, 413, 18 Am. Dec. 630, it was held that indorsers of accommodation notes could recover from each other only a contributable share. This rule was held in Williams v. Bosson, 11 Ohio, 67, to be a local rule, and not to be extended beyond promissory notes, to which the local usage had applied it.

In Pitkin v. Flanagan, 23 Vt. 160, 56 Am. Dec. 61, it is said that accommodation indorsers are in fact mere sureties for the principal, and will be holden as cosureties only. But the contrary view is apparently accepted in Farmers' & M. Bank v. Rathbone, 26 Vt. 19, 58 Am. Dec. 200.

Such also appears to be the English and Canadian rule.

The language used in Clipperton v. Spetigue, 15 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 269, is not very explicit, but the court evidently considered that the doctrine of contribution applied to accommodation indorsers, even if the first indorser knew nothing of his rights in respect to the subsequent indorser, when he executed the paper.

And in Cockburn v. Johnston, 15 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 577, it was held that the doctrine of contribution applied, and even if the second indorser knew that the first indorser was an accommodation indorser, he must contribute.

And in Mitchell v. English, 17 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 303, it was held that accommodation indorsers are to be considered as cosureties, irrespective of the order of their liability upon the paper itself. And to the same effect was the decision in McKelvey v. Davis, 17 Grant, Ch. U. C.) 355. And the right to contribution was also asserted in Re Boutin, Rap. Jud. Quebec 12 C. S. 186, and in Vallée v. Talbot, Rap. Jud. Quebec 1 C. S. 223.

Given an accommodation note, the law implies equal contribution as between accommodation parties. Stacey v. Stayner, 3 Ont. Week. Rep. 557.

The leading English case upon this question is Reynolds v. Wheeler, 10 C. B. N. S. 561, in which it was held that the accommodation drawer of a bill, who has to pay the same, may sue an accommodation indorser for contribution.

A different rule is laid down in Janson v. Paxton, 23 U. C. C. P. 439, where it was held that successive indorsers were, on proof that they were accommodation indorsers, not necessarily to be considered cosureties. The court said that it did not consider Reynolds v. Wheeler as expressly deciding the point raised in the case at bar, as there was some evidence to be gathered from the various reports of that case that there was an agreement to the effect that the parties were to be sureties.

And in Fisken v. Meehan, 40 U. C. Q. B. 146, the majority of the court approved the Jansen Case, citing McDonald v. Magruder, 3 Pet. 470, 7 L. ed. 744, supra; and the decision in Poisson v. Bourgeois, Rap. Jud. Quebec 17 C. S. 94, is to the same effect.

But the decision in McDonald v. Whitfield, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 733, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas.

531, is based wholly upon Reynolds v. Wheeler, and the authority of Janson v. Paxton is repudiated.

Distinction between notes and bills of exchange.

The decision in Douglas v. Waddle, supra, is to the effect that accommodation indorsers of promissory notes are as between themselves cosureties. This case has not been expressly overruled by any later Ohio decision, but in several the courts have refused to extend the rule to bills of exchange, and upon such paper the accommodation parties are liable as upon business paper. Williams v. Bosson, supra; Kelley v. Few, 18 Ohio, 441; Barnet v. Young, 29 Ohio St. 7.

No such distinction was made in the Douglas Case, but in the Williams Case it was said that the introduction of bills of exchange as a basis for accommodation took place long after the decision in the Douglas Case. And in the Barnet Case the court said: "It is to be regretted that the general rules of the commercial law are not applicable alike to both classes of business paper in this state, and that a difference in the mere form of the instrument used should operate a difference in the rights and liabilities of accommodation parties thereto as between themselves."

It is to be noted that no such distinction has been found in any other reported case.

Where indorser receives portion of the proceeds.

The fact that the last indorser received a portion of the proceeds in payment of a debt due him from the maker does not change the rule. Youngs v. Ball, 9 Watts, 139.

Neither does the fact that part of the proceeds were used toward the payment of other paper upon which the plaintiff was also an accommodation indorser. Gillespie v. Campbell, 5 L.R.A. 698, 39 Fed. 724.

But in Galbrath v. Martin, 5 Humph. 50, it was held that the first indorser, against whom a judgment for the amount of the note had been taken by the last indorser, was entitled to a credit upon the judgment of the amount which the second indorser had retained out of the proceeds of the discount of the note for his own purposes.

Change in order of names on paper given in renewal.

That the names of the parties upon the notes in renewal of which the notes in suit were given were in a different order than upon the notes in suit constitutes no proof to change the relative position of the two indorsers. Pomeroy v. Clark, 1 McArthur, 606.

So, no presumption that the liability of several accommodation indorsers to a note is joint, and not several, can be raised from the fact that the indorsements were not in the same order as upon the notes for the renewal of which the notes in suit were given. Palmer v. Field, 76 Hun, 229, 27 N. Y. Supp. 736.

But the fact that the names on a renewal note are in a different order than on the original note was held in Dawson v. Pettway, 20 N. C. 531 (4 Dev. & B. 396), to be some evidence that the parties intended to be cosureties.

And in Allison v. Purdy, 6 Pa. 501, it was held to be for the jury whether a party who had been the second indorser upon one note, and became the first indorser upon a renewal, intended to change his position by the change in the order, and the fact that the principal secured the signatures of his accommodation indorsers in the order that he accidentally met them on the street is proper evidence for the jury to consider in that connection.

Where each party has paid a portion of the money.

Although each indorser paid one half of the note at the time it became due, the last indorser may recover from the first the amount he so paid. Johnson v. Crane, 16 N. H. 68.

But in Denton v. Lytle, 4 Bush, 597, it was held that the fact that the parties themselves adjusted and paid the debt on the basis of equal responsibility as between themselves as sureties, if unexplained, authorizes the inference that they acted in accordance with some previous understanding or agreement rendering it obligatory on them both so to do.

So, if three years elapse after the payment by two accommodation indorsers of a moiety each of the note, that fact constitutes evidence that the parties were cosureties. Talcott v. Cogswell, 3 Day, 512.

Knowledge that paper was accommodation paper.

Knowledge on the part of any of the parties to the paper, that it was in fact for accommodation only, does not apparently have any effect upon the liability of the parties.

The mere fact that indorsers are accommodation indorsers, and known to each other to be so, is not sufficient, without proof of an express agreement, to change the general rule, that prior indorsers are liable in solido to subsequent indorsers who have paid the bill. Re McCord, 174 Fed. 72.

And in Kirschner v. Conklin, 40 Conn. 77, the court said: "The claim of the defendant is based upon the bare fact that these parties knew each other to be accommodation indorsers; but this fact falls far short of being sufficient to create an agreement between them to be jointly liable."

An indorser for accommodation of a bill of exchange after its acceptance, who is compelled to pay it when due, may enforce the full liability of an accommodation acceptor thereon, and the fact that when indorsing the bill he knew the acceptance to have been without consideration is immaterial. Gillespie v. Campbell, supra.

Effect of statute of frauds.

So far as the statute of frauds is concerned, it is satisfied by an indorsement in blank of an accommodation party. Sloan v. Gibbes, 56 S. C. 480, 76 Am. St. Rep. 559, 35 S. E. 408.

So, in Weeks v. Parsons, 176 Mass. 570, 58 N. E. 157, it was held that the statute of frauds does not apply in such a case, because the parol agreement related to the obligations of the indorsers inter sese, and not to a promise to pay the debt of another.

Admissibility of parol evidence.

In some cases it has been held that parol evidence is admissible to show that there had been an agreement between the accommodation parties to become cosureties upon the note. Rhodes v. Sherrod, 9 Ala. 63; Dunn v. Sparks, 7 Ind. 490; Harshman v. Armstrong, 43 Ind. 126; Preston v. Gould, 64 Iowa, 44, 19 N. W. 834; Smith v. Morrill, 54 Me. 48; Weston v. Chamberlin, 7 Cush. 404; Clapp v. Rice, 13 Gray, 403, 74 Am. Dec. 639; Mansfield v. Edwards, 136 Mass. 15, 49 Am. Rep. 1; Weeks v. Parsons, 176 Mass. 570, 58 N. E. 157; Farwell v. Ensign, 66 Mich. 600, 33 N. W. 734; Paul v. Rider, 58 N. H. 119; Easterly v. Barber, 66 N. Y. 433; Kelley v. Few, 18 Ohio, 441; Ross v. Espy, 66 Pa. 481, 5 Am. Rep. 394; Sloan v. Gibbes, supra; Martin v. Marshall, 60 Vt. 321, 13 Atl. 420; Pitkin v. Flanagan, 23 Vt. 160, 56 Am. Dec. 61.

The contract of indorsement is one implied by the law from the blank indorsement, and can be qualified by express proof of a different agreement between the parties, and is not subject to the rule which excludes the proof to alter or vary the terms of an express agreement. Ross v. Espy, supra.

Evidence of a mutual contract between indorsers to lend their names for the accommodation of another should be left to the jury. Love v. Wall, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 313.

In other cases it has been held that parol evidence was not admissible for that purpose. Johnson v. Ramsey, 43 N. J. L. 279, 39 Am. St. Rep. 580; State, Kling, Prosecutor, v. Kehoe, 58 N. J. L. 529, 33 Atl. 946; Johnson v. Crane, 16 N. H. 68.

In Johnson v. Crane, supra, the court said that the import of the writing being plain by the ordinary rule of evidence, it is not to be contradicted by verbal explanations of the intentions and meaning of the parties upon becoming parties to it.

Where the plaintiff was maker, and the defendant indorser, of a promissory note, the evidence of other indorsers that all the parties had agreed to be mutually liable for the note is not evidence against the defendant. Slaymaker v. Gundacker, 10 Serg. & R. 75.

28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In connection with this phase of the question, attention should be called to the fact that the cases here cited represent but a small part of the cases passing upon the question of the admissibility of parol evidence to show the relationship of parties to commercial paper to be different from that imported on the face thereof. And the general rule as laid down by later cases not within the scope of this note may be different from that shown by the cases here cited. In consequence the cases are to be considered as bearing upon the application of the general rule as to parol evidence upon the state of facts presented by the title to this note, rather than as indicating what the general rule as to admissibility of parol evidence is in the jurisdictions from which the cases are taken. The knowledge or lack of knowledge of the parties as to the exact relation of the other parties to the note is apparently immaterial.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE, Appt.,

v.

CATHERINE C. BECKER.

(— Ky. —, 129 S. W. 311.)

Tax — voluntary payment — recovery.

One who pays an illegal tax to secure the rebate allowed by law for prompt payment cannot recover the money paid where, under the statute, he has a right to test in court the right to enforce the tax, and the taxing district has applied the money to the purposes for which it was collected.

(June 17, 1910.)

Note. — Right of one who pays invalid tax for purpose of obtaining discount to recover amount paid.

A search has disclosed but little authority upon the question whether the fact that a taxpayer pays his tax for the purpose of obtaining a discount will render the payment involuntary, so that he may subsequently recover the amount paid if the tax proves invalid.

The case of LOUISVILLE v. BECKER is supported by Lee v. Templeton, 13 Gray, 476. In that case one who sought the collector and paid his tax to obtain a discount was held not entitled to recover the amount because the tax was illegal, even if the payment was accompanied by a protest. The court said: "The payment of a tax under such circumstances is necessarily, in view of the provisions of the statute, to be regarded and treated as a voluntary payment. It is so, in substance and effect, declared to be by the express provisions of the statute. The privilege of a discount is given to those persons only who make voluntary payment of the tax imposed upon them. And they who avail themselves of the privilege should not refuse to take also the bur-

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Chancery Branch, First Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover back certain taxes which were alleged to have been paid under mistake of law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clayton B. Blakey, with Mr. Joseph S. Lawton, for appellant:

Where the taxpayer is entitled to a day in court and can litigate the demand about to be enforced against him, but instead of doing so voluntarily pays it, the payment is considered voluntary.

Louisville v. Anderson, 79 Ky. 334, 42 Am. Rep. 220; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hopkins County, 87 Ky. 605, 9 S. W. 497; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 89 Ky. 531, 12 S. W. 1064; Brands v. Louisville, 111 Ky. 56, 63 S. W. 2; German Security Bank v. Coulter, 112 Ky. 577, 66 S. W. 425, 427; Scott v. New Castle (Ky.) 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 116 S. W. 788.

In order to constitute an involuntary payment, the payment must have been made under an immediate and urgent necessity to release the person or property from detention, or to prevent an immediate seizure of the person or property.

Where the law provides ample means of correcting an illegal assessment before the process of collecting the tax begins, and the taxpayer fails to take advantage of this opportunity to correct the assessment, the taxpayer is without remedy.

Scott v. New Castle, supra.

Messrs. Grubbs & Grubbs, for appellee: Money paid under mistake of law or fact may be recovered.

Scott v. New Castle (Ky.) 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 116 S. W. 788; Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 318, 29 Am. Dec. 407; Ray v. Bank of Kentucky, 3 B. Mon. 514, 39 Am. Dec. 479; Louisville v. Taxes paid under a mistake of law may be recovered unless such payment is voluntary, and a payment is voluntary when it can only be enforced by suit.

Louisville v. Anderson, 79 Ky. 335, 42 Am. Rep. 220; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 89 Ky. 531, 12 S. W. 1064; Newport v. Ringo and Brands v. Louisville, supra.

The payment made to secure the rebate was involuntary.

Newport v. Ringo, supra.

den of any consequences which are the necessary or legitimate result of the alternative they have chosen. . . . There is nothing in the circumstances attending either of the payments, the amount of which the plaintiff now seeks to recover back, which has any tendency to change or qualify the effect which the provisions of the statute, above cited, attribute and assign to the free and voluntary action of a party who seeks to secure the benefit and discount authorized by the votes of the town. It is true that he accompanied his payments with a formal protest; and it appears that in one instance the collector was induced, upon his solicitation, to say that the payment of the tax was demanded. But whether these formalities of demand and protest were actually observed in the present case is quite immaterial; since they could have no influence upon a clear, certain, and positive rule of law, or be allowed to vary or diminish the force, significance, or effect of the express provisions of the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

statute. The several payments made by the plaintiff must be held to have the character and effect assigned to them by these provisions. In conformity to the absolute rule thereby established, they must be considered as his voluntary acts, and must be treated by courts of law as having this and no other character."

But where, in addition to paying for the purpose of obtaining a discount, the payment is also made to prevent the issuance of a warrant, which was threatened, it has been held that the payment is not voluntary, and that recovery may therefore be had.

Thus in Stowe v. Stowe, 70 Vt. 609, 41 Atl. 1024, where a tax was paid soon after the taxpayer had received a notice from the treasurer that his taxes must be paid by a given date to obtain the discount and save costs of collection, and that if not paid by that date a warrant would be issued against him, it was held that the payment was not voluntary, and that recovery might be had.

J. T. W.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this action in equity the appellee, Catherine C. Becker, sought to recover taxes paid by her to the city of Louisville for the years 1907, 1908, and 1909, amounting in the aggregate to $308.46. It was alleged in the petition that the taxes were assessed upon notes of which she is the owner, amounting to $6,000, and secured by liens upon real estate situated in the city of Louisville; that for more than five years next before the institution of the action she was a resident of Oldham county, and her notes were not, during the years for which they were assessed and the taxes paid by her, either assessable or taxable in the city of Louisville. The appellant demurred to the petition; but the demurrer was overruled. It declined to plead further, and the circuit court thereupon entered judgment in appellee's favor for the amount claimed in her petition, with interest. The case is now before this court on appeal from that judgment.

The written opinion of the learned special judge so tersely expressed his reasons for overruling the demurrer that we here insert it: "The assessments complained of in the petition were void under § 2080, Ky. Stat. (Russell's Stat. § 905), and Com. v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 796, 107 S. W. 233, for its situs was in Oldham county, and the payment of a void tax upon a void assessment does not give to the city any right to collect or withhold from the person paying the same the amount paid. Demurrer to petition overruled."

The case of Com. v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. was not an action to recover taxes paid, but one to compel the insurance company, a nonresident, to list for taxation in the county of Jefferson, under § 4241, Ky. Stat. (Russell's Stat. § 6170), its notes and choses in action representing loans made by it, secured by mortgages on lands in this state, or by pledge of policies or other collateral owned by persons in this state. In deciding the single question presented, the court held that as the insurance company was a foreign corporation, and the statute did not fix the situs of its notes and choses in action in this state for the purpose of taxation, they were not taxable therein. It does not, therefore, appear to have been held in that case that "the payment of a void tax upon a void assessment does not give to the city any right to collect or withhold from the person paying the same the amount paid."

So, the question decided in that case is only incidentally involved in the case at bar. It is admitted by the appellant city that appellee's notes were not legally assessable or taxable in the city of Louisville, and that, if she had resisted the assessment or refused to pay the taxes, the court would have relieved her of paying them. She did not, however, pursue that course, but voluntarily, and in order to obtain the rebate allowed by law, paid the taxes before the city could enforce their payment or impose a penalty for their nonpayment, and now seeks to recover them back, upon the ground that they were paid under a mistake of law. In explanation of its alleged action in assessing appellee's property and receiving of her the taxes paid thereon, the city's counsel says that she had previously been a resident of the city, and, as such, from year to year, listed the same property for taxation and paid the taxes thereon, and that the city assessor, not being aware of her removal to Oldham county, continued to assess her property, and the city tax collector to receive the taxes thereon, for the years complained of, believing her to be still a resident of the city and the taxes legally assessed and collectable. This explanation does not affect the legal status of the parties, for, after all is said, the question we are called on to decide is: Can one who has voluntarily and under a mistake of law paid an illegal tax, which the city has paid out and applied to the purposes for which it was assessed and collected, recover it?

While this court has repeatedly held, as in Ray v. Bank of Kentucky, 3 B. Mon. 514, 39 Am. Dec. 479, that "whenever, by a clear and palpable mistake of law or fact essentially bearing upon and affecting the contract, money has been paid without cause or consideration, which in law, honor, or good conscience was not due and payable, and which in honor or good conscience ought not to be retained, it was and ought to be recovered back," it has never committed itself to the doctrine that this rule should be invoked to compel the refunding to the taxpayer of taxes, which he, following an assessment by the assessing officer, had voluntarily paid to an officer of the law charged with the duty of collecting the taxes. Hesitancy in so applying the rule may well be indulged when it is considered that the duty to pay taxes does not arise out of contract, but out of an obligation resting upon every citizen to contribute to the support of the government to which he owes allegiance. Moreover, taxes are assessed and collected for purposes of government, and while it is a hardship to a citizen to be refused repayment of a tax, as in this case illegally collected of him, though voluntarily paid, it must be borne in mind, if the city is required to show on every such complaint its right to retain the tax received, it could never regard the voluntary payment of a tax as a thing settled, or know whether to apply such taxes as it may have collected to the discharge of its numerous obligations and municipal needs.

In view of what has been said as to the purposes of taxation, it can readily be seen that the principles applicable to transactions between individuals do not apply to an action by a taxpayer against the government for the recovery back of taxes paid voluntarily, though paid under a mistake of law.

It is apparent from the averments of appellee's petition that the taxes for which she sues were voluntarily paid, and this fact bars the recovery sought. Cooley on Taxation, vol. 2, p. 1495, in stating the general rule, "that a tax or assessment voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, the authorities generally agree," gives the following reason, for its adoption: "The rule of law is a rule of sound public policy; also, it is a rule of quiet as well as of good faith, and precludes the courts being occupied in undoing the arrangements of parties which they have voluntarily made, and into which they have not been drawn by fraud or accident, or by any excusable ignorance of their legal rights and liabilities. All payments are supposed to be voluntary until the contrary is made to appear." p. 1498. On page 1502 of the same volume an excellent definition of "compulsion" is given: "And it has been said in some cases that, when it is sought to recover back a payment as having been made under compulsion, it should be made to appear that payment was made to release either person or property from the power of the officer. And this may be said to express the general sense of the authorities." Smith's Modern Law of Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 244, defines "compulsion" as applied to a tax payment as follows: "It is, however, upon the whole well settled that the payment must be made under direct and immediate compulsion, and under such circumstances that the person called upon to pay the tax can save himself or his property only by paying the illegal demand. The stringent application of this rule often results in hardship in individual cases; but, for the reasons already stated, the general beneficence of the rule is undoubted." Baltimore v. Lefferman, 4 Gill, 425, 45 Am. Dec. 145; Dear v. Varnum, 80 Cal. 86, 22 Pac. 76; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 760.

While this court has not in terms adopted any of the definitions of "compulsion" as applied to tax payments, referred to, it has in several cases held that taxes illegally paid might be recovered back, where the payments were made involuntarily, and the tax collector had authority to levy and sell on the refusal to pay. In Louisville v. Anderson, 79 Ky. 334, 42 Am. Rep. 220, which was an action to recover back from the city taxes illegally assessed and paid by mistake of law, upon land used for farming purposes, it was alleged that, if the taxes had not been paid, the city would have proceeded, "as it threatened to do, to coerce payment by a sale of the property." The court, though recognizing the rule announced by Cooley, "that a tax voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back," allowed a recovery by the taxpayer on the ground that the tax had been involuntarily paid, because "the money was not paid at the instance of the taxpayer to one who was a mere passive agent without authority to demand or coerce payment, but to one who had not only the authority to receive it, but to exact payment by levying on the property taxed; and, upon the refusal of the appellee to pay, a sale of the property was inevitable. The party charged with payment has been afforded no opportunity of being heard, and knows that the tax gatherer is clothed with the process of the law to enforce his demand if payment is denied. Such a payment, or a payment made in ignorance of the fact that the taxation is void, with a knowledge that compelling process is at hand to coerce the demand, must be regarded as involuntary, and the party entitled to recover his money. Where a party is entitled to a day in court, and can litigate the demand about to be enforced against him, but, instead of doing so, voluntary pays it, he is without remedy. When he can plead and make his defense, a payment made under protest will be regarded as voluntary; or, if he has an option either to litigate the question or submit to the demand and pay the money, in all such cases there is no compulsion, and relief will be denied."

It appears that the city of Louisville, when the taxes were paid by Anderson, had the power under the law to coerce payment of taxes by distraint, or a summary sale of the taxpayer's property upon his refusal to pay, but that the latter was given no opportunity to litigate the matter in the courts. When appellee's taxes were paid, the law was different. Under the present laws, which were also in force when appellee's taxes were paid, the city was authorized to sue or distrain for taxes uncollected, also to collect them by garnishment of rents; but the law also provides (Ky. Stat. § 3008 [Russell's Stat. § 957]) that "the taxpayer may have the right to a day in court to contest any unlawful distraint or garnishment of rent." In other words, no matter by which of the methods allowed the city might have attempted to collect the taxes of appellee for the years complained of, she had under the law guaranteed facilities for resisting their payment. She, therefore, unlike Anderson, had an opportunity to make defense, litigate the right of the city to the taxes in question, and defeat their collection, but, instead of doing so, elected to pay them, and did in fact pay them each year before their payment could be coerced.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hopkins County, 87 Ky. 605, 9 S. W. 497, the taxes sought to be recovered back were held to have been paid voluntarily. Hence the principle announced in the case at bar was applied as follows: "And such being the fact, we perceive no reason to make in these cases an exception to the general rule laid down in Louisville v. Anderson, that a party paying taxes who is entitled to a day in court and can litigate the demand about to be enforced against him, but, instead of doing so, voluntarily pays it, is without remedy."

In discussing the above rule in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 89 Ky. 531, 12 S. W. 1064, the court said: "Considerations of public policy require this rule, and the taxpayer cannot complain with grace, because he has by his own neglect missed the opportunity afforded him by law for his protection."

In the much later case of Brands v. Louisville, 111 Ky. 56, 63 S. W. 2, recovery by the appellants of apportionment warrants admittedly illegal, paid the city, was refused. The opinion, after a careful consideration of the question involved, and elaborate review of all the authorities in this state thereon, reaffirmed with marked emphasis the rule stated in the cases of Louisville v. Anderson and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hopkins County and Louisville & N. A. Co. v. Com.,—supra, as to the necessity for the enforcement of the rule, saying: "But the court is of opinion that the reasons of public policy which sustain the cases above cited apply with equal force to the case before us. Reduced to its last analysis, the case comes to this: The city assessed against the appellants' property for the improvement of the street in front of it an amount larger by 10 per cent than it should have assessed. If a recovery can be had in this case, then one may be had in every case where the burden is wrongfully apportioned, although the assessment has been voluntarily paid. Such a rule would involve the city government in inextricable confusion. The council could not know what liabilities might be anticipated or what taxes should be levied. Under the Constitution the levy of taxes must specify the purpose for which the tax is to be used, and a tax levied for one purpose cannot be applied to another. The reason for the rule denying a recovery of taxes voluntarily paid is, after all, the security and efficiency of the city government, and every reason which forbids the recovery of municipal taxes that have been voluntarily paid seems to us to apply with equal force to assessments for municipal improvements. The city is required to make the apportionment. If an error is made, it is the duty of the property owner, no less than the city officials, to detect and correct it. If, instead of doing this, he voluntarily pays the assessment, and the city makes other contracts and assumes other obligations on the idea that these matters are all settled, it seems to us that sound public policy requires the loss to fall on the taxpayer, who has acquiesced in the assessment and voluntarily paid the money rather than litigate the right."

Of the cases relied on by counsel for appellee, we find but one that can in any sense be said to conflict with the cases from which we have quoted. The case referred to is that of Newport v. Ringo, 87 Ky. 635, 10 S. W. 2, in which it was held that taxes paid under compulsion and a mistake of law could be recovered. The court seems to have expressed its conclusion in the first paragraph of the opinion without a citation of authority. The decision must have been based on some provision of the charter of the city of Newport, though we are not advised by the opinion of the method provided by the charter of the city for collecting taxes, in view of which it is not to be considered as controverting the authoritative-ness of the rule announced in Louisville v. Anderson; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hopkins County; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com.; and Brands v. Louisville,—supra.

It is not perceived that appellee's claim of right to recover the taxes sued for finds any support from the case of Scott v. New Castle (Ky.) 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 116 S. W. 788, in which the recovery back of the unearned part of a liquor license paid under a mistake was allowed, for in the opinion of that case it is said: "We do not agree with counsel for appellees that a license such as appellant paid is a mere tax, which, when voluntarily paid, cannot be recovered. It is true that a tax, when voluntarily paid, cannot be recovered, though illegally collected. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 89 Ky. 531, 12 S. W. 1064. But this rule is based upon considerations of public policy and because the law provides ample means of correcting an illegal assessment before the process of collecting the tax begins; but a license such as appellant paid is on a different footing."

Manifestly, appellee paid voluntarily, without dispute, and before their collection could have been enforced, the taxes sued for, and, while the loss of the amount claimed may prove a hardship to her, the law and the sound public policy underlying it compel us to refuse her the relief demanded.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

ARTHUR E. TAGGART

v.

TOWN OF JAFFREY.

(75 N. H. 473, 76 Atl. 123.)

Water — artificial stream — riparian rights.

1. The rights of an owner of land on an artificial channel made for a stream of water which was evidently intended to be permanent, and has existed for more than sixty years, are the same as though the course was the natural one.

Same — public rights — conflict with riparian right.

2. The public cannot, after granting the bed of the outlet of a pond to private owners, use the water in the pond to the injury of such owners, without making compensation to them, although it retains title to the bed of the pond.

Same — diversion — duty to minimize injury.

3. The fact that proper conservation of the water left in a stream would render it sufficient to serve the purpose to which a complaining riparian owner was putting the stream is no defense to an action by him for wrongful diversion of water from the stream.

(April 5, 1910.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Cheshire County made during the trial for an action brought to recover damages for the alleged unlawful diversion of the waters of a natural stream which resulted in the assessment of damages. Overruled.

Plaintiff claimed the rights of a riparian owner in the waters of an artificial channel by which a portion of the waters of Bullet pond was carried to mills below his premises. The channel appeared to be permanent, although it required annual repairing.

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Cain & Benton, for defendant:

The plaintiff had no right to the water in the canal.

Fox River Flour & Paper Co. v. Kelley, 70 Wis. 287, 35 N. W. 744; Lawson v. Mowry, 52 Wis. 219, 9 N. W. 280.

The waters in the pond were public waters, and could be used by the state or any particular subdivision of it for any public purpose, without compensation to the plaintiff.

St. Rep. 143, 30 So. 645.

Messrs. Doyle & Lucier, for plaintiff:

A water course, though artificial, may have been originally made under such circumstances and have been so used as to give all the rights that the riparian proprietors would have if it had been a natural stream.

Sutcliffe v. Booth, 9 Jur. N. S. 1037; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 350.

Every owner of land over or through which a stream of water runs is, by virtue of such ownership, entitled to the use of water flowing over it in its natural current without diminution or obstruction.

Peaslee, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The waters flowing from Bullet pond were diverted from their natural channel more than sixty years ago, and have since flowed in the channel then prepared for them. The change was evidently intended to be permanent, and the present channel of the stream is now, for all legal purposes, its natural one. "It has often been decided, both in England and America, that water courses made by the hand of man may have been created under such conditions that, so far as the rules of law and the rights of the public or of individuals are concerned, they are to be treated as if they were of natural origin." Stimson v. Brookline, 197 Mass. 568, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 280, 125 Am. St. Rep. 382, 83 N. E. 893, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 907; Townsend v. McDonald, 12 N. Y. 381, 64 Am. Dec. 508; Magor v. Chadwick, 11 Ad. & El. 571, 586; Suteliffe v. Booth, 9 Jur. N. S. 1037; 3 Farnham, Waters, § 827b. Cases involving the rights of proprietors along artificial streams, as distinguished from natural streams running in artificial courses, are not in point. The distinction between the two has often been recognized. Murchie v. Gates, 78 Me. 300, 4 Atl. 698; Stimson v. Brookline, supra; Nuttall v. Bracewell, L. R. 2 Exch. 1; Wood v. Waud, 3 Exch. 748, 777, 10 Eng. Rul. Cas. 226. Rights in new courses for natural streams have been supported upon various grounds. "When a stream flowing through a person's land is diverted into a new channel, either artificially or by a sudden flood, affecting the rights of other riparian proprietors favorably, and the owner acquiesces in the new state of the stream for so long a time that new rights accrue, or may be presumed to have accrued, such acquiescence is binding, like a public dedication, and the stream cannot be lawfully returned to its former channel." Gould, Waters, § 159; Ford v. Whitlock, 27 Vt. 265; Burk v. Simonson, 104 Ind. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 304, 2 N. E. 309, 3 N. E. 826.

In some cases the mere running of the water for the prescriptive period, under conditions apparently intended to be permanent, has been considered sufficient to warrant a holding that the usual riparian rights along a natural stream have attached. Murchie v. Gates, supra; Gaved v. Martyn, 19 C. B. N. S. 732.

"There is a much more impregnable foundation [than prescription] upon which to put such decisions, and that is upon the ground of estoppel. If a landowner makes a change in the course of the stream which to all appearances is permanent, and holds out to the world the representation that such condition is permanent, he will be bound by his acts; and after other persons have acquired rights by changing their positions upon the faith of such representations, he will not be permitted to deny that they were true, or claim that the stream is not flowing in its true channel." 3 Farnham, Waters, § 827c; Woodbury v. Short, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

17 Vt. 387, 44 Am. Dec. 344; Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505; Lammott v. Ewers, 106 Ind. 310, 55 Am. Rep. 746, 6 N. E. 636.

"If the landowner, having changed the direction of the natural stream through his land, were to suffer others who are entitled to use the water to expend money in reference to such use, under a belief that the new channel was to be permanent, and this were known to him, he could not afterwards change its course so as to injure the party who had expended his money. In these and like cases, whenever one who owns a water course in which another is interested, or by the use of which another is affected, does any act, or suffers any act to be done, affecting the rights of other proprietors, whereby a state of things is created which he cannot change without materially injuring another who has been led to act by what he himself had done or permitted, the court applies the doctrine of equitable estoppel." Shepardson v. Perkins, 58 N. H. 354, 356. Whether this case is fairly open to criticism because of an attempt to sustain the conclusion reached by inconsistent lines of reasoning (3 Farnham, Waters, § 827), it is not now necessary to inquire.

The rule is universal that riparian rights may be acquired along the artificial channel of a natural stream. Upon any of the grounds suggested, this plaintiff could maintain his position. There was a dedication. The stream had been changed in a manner to indicate that the alteration was permanent. There are prescriptive rights. It ran in this way for more than twice the period necessary to the presumption of a grant, before the plaintiff purchased his tract of land. There is an estoppel. He relied upon the apparently permanent conditions when he made his purchase; and since that time, and acting upon conditions as they were, he has openly made the improvements which he says are now interfered with. That he has the rights of a riparian proprietor upon a natural water course cannot be open to serious question.

The cases relied upon by the defendant (Fox River Flour & Paper Co. v. Kelley, 70 Wis. 287, 35 N. W. 744; Lawson v. Mowry, 52 Wis. 219, 9 N. W. 280) are not applicable here. The law of Wisconsin is in harmony with that elsewhere. In a recent case in that state many of the American authorities are quoted with approval, and the court declares the law to be that "the watercourse, though artificial, may have originated under such circumstances as to give rise to all the rights that riparian proprietors have in a natural and permanent stream, or have been so long used as to become a natural watercourse prescriptively." Smith v. Youmans, 96 Wis. 103, 37 L.R.A. 285, 65 Am. St. Rep. 30, 70 N. W. 1115. While in a case like this the right acquired includes the privilege of taking water for domestic use (Roberts v. Richards, 44 L. T. N. S. 271), the defendant is in error in basing its argument upon the proposition that the complaint is for the interference with such right. There is no suggestion in the case that there is not at all times sufficient water in the stream to supply the plaintiff's domestic needs. The complaint is for loss of power to drive the plaintiff's hydraulic ram. The depletion of the water power is the wrong for which compensation is sought.

The defendant also sets up the claim that "the waters in the pond were public waters, and could be used by the state or any particular subdivision of it for any public purpose without compensation to the plaintiff." The law is otherwise. The bed of the pond is the property of the state. "Before the township was granted, the public held not only the basin of the pond, but also the bed, banks, and valley of the brook that flows from the pond to the river. In that position of the title, the public owner could divert the entire pond from its outlet without infringing private rights between the pond and the river. If the original title of the valley had remained unchanged, this suit could not be maintained. But the public owner elected to convert into private property the mill site. . . . The grant of the bed of the brook to private proprietors, whose title has come to the plaintiffs, conveyed rights of air, light, heat, and water. . . . If the original owner had desired to retain an unlimited right to divert the pond and destroy the mill privilege, there should have been an express reservation. A right to the natural flow of the brook, not unreasonably diminished or polluted, was inherent in the land and one of the rights of use and occupation of which the title was composed. . . . By an elementary rule of conveyancing, it passed from grantor to grantee, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary. The operation of the rule did not depend upon the question whether the water was a natural pond, large or small, before it entered the plaintiffs' lot. . . . If the plaintiffs have been injured by an unreasonable use of the pond, or of any other lot of land or water, there is a legal remedy." Concord Mfg. Co. v. Robertson, 66 N. H. 1, 20, 18 L.R.A. 679, 25 Atl. 718, 731, 732.

2. Exception was taken to the exclusion of certain evidence. The defendant was urging that the plaintiff ought to conserve the surplus waters for use in dry seasons, and was offering evidence as to how this might be done. It was then suggested that it did not appear that the plaintiff had any right to control or repair the structures referred to. The court then caused the following statement to be entered upon the record: "The evidence introduced, whereby it is claimed that the plaintiff could have conserved the water at Rugg meadow and Grassy pond, is excluded." The defendant then made the following offer of proof: "We offer the evidence excluded and other evidence tending to show that if the plaintiff, or the persons having control of the canal and the dam at Rugg meadow and Grassy pond, maintained the structures for the conservation of water at those places as they stood several years ago, the stream flowing past Taggart's house would be fed at all seasons of the year so that he would have sufficient water to run his ram. The evidence is offered upon the ground that Taggart's claim to recover is based upon his claim to rights in the canal, and on the further ground that the defendant is entitled to show that the damage of which the plaintiff complains is caused by the acts of the persons having control of the canal, in allowing the same to fall into a lack of repair which did not formerly exist, and is not attributable to the acts of the defendant." The proffered evidence was excluded, subject to exception.

The plaintiff based his case upon evidence that he suffered no shortage until the first drought after the defendant built its waterworks. This was in the fall of 1902. It then became competent for the defendant to show that the shortage at that time was caused by a want of repair in the structures between Bullet pond and the plaintiff's premises. This is manifestly a different proposition from the offer to show that better conservation facilities would improve the plaintiff's water supply. The testimony that the structures were out of repair was not excluded. The offer of proof is said, by those who tendered it, to have been "made with extreme care," and is to be here treated as stating fully what the defendant expected to prove. The presiding justice understood that the offer was merely to show that conservation would have furnished sufficient water to operate the plaintiff's ram. The idea of the defendant seemed to be that the plaintiff's rights were limited to the amount of power he used. His right was to the whole power, less reasonable diminution by the upstream proprietors. There was no offer to show that conservation would have given the plaintiff his full right; and it is no answer for one who has interfered with it to say that, if it had not been for other interference by third persons, the plaintiff would still have had as much of his right as he desired to use. Neither is it an answer to say that if the plaintiff took care of what the defendant left for him he would have no need for what the defendant had wrongfully taken. This is what the offer of proof amounted to. It was an offer to show that he would have "sufficient water to run his ram." The statement now relied upon, that "the defendant is entitled to show that the damage of which the plaintiff complains is caused by the acts of the persons having control of the canal, in allowing the same to fall into a lack of repair which did not formerly exist, and is not attributable to the acts of the defendant," was not made as an offer to prove these facts. It was stated as a reason why the facts which were offered ought to be received. The record shows that the defendant had been persistently urging the position that because the plaintiff, or those controlling the outlets at Grassy pond and Rugg meadow, did not take care of what water the defendant left in the stream, therefore the defendant was not accountable to the plaintiff for what it took. The offer of proof was the culmination of the discussion of this proposition, and was understood by the presiding justice to have the meaning above indicated. "The court did not exclude, but allowed the defendant to introduce, testimony tending to show that, because of the condition of the dams and canal as they have been since the fall of 1902, the water went to waste and was diverted,—as tending to show that the depletion of the water complained of by the plaintiff was not the taking of the water by the town as aforesaid. The evidence excluded was simply evidence tending to show how the water of the canal might be conserved." The offer of proof was made in such a form that it was not unreasonable for the court to understand it as he did. If counsel had a different understanding, the burden was upon them to state it plainly. Felch v. Weare, 66 N. H. 582, 27 Atl. 226. If, as they now seem to claim, the defendant's counsel understood the ruling to prevent them from introducing other evidence upon the facts as to the comparison between the past and present conditions of the structures at Grassy pond and Rugg meadow, their remedy is to apply to the superior court for a new trial upon the ground of accident or mistake. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 230, § 1. The exception is overruled.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

OLIF SHOLIN, Resp't.,

v.

SKAMANIA BOOM COMPANY, Appt.

(56 Wash. 303, 105 Pac. 632.)

Jury — failure to demand — discretion to allow.

1. It is not reversible error for the court to permit a jury trial, although notice of election to try the case to a jury was not given, as required by statute.

Continuance — to secure testimony.

2. The court may grant a continuance to permit the securing of a copy of a contract, proof of which is necessary to the decision of the case, where objection is made to its proof by parol evidence.

Bridge — destruction — special injury — mail carrier.

3. One having a contract with the Federal government to carry mail over a certain route six times a week, who is compelled to take a circuitous route because of the negligent destruction of a bridge, suffers special damages giving him a right of action against the one through whose negligence the bridge was destroyed.

(December 11, 1909.)

Note. — Does the fact that one is prevented by an unlawful obstruction from using a highway cause him a special damage which will sustain an action by him against the wrong-doer.

In general it may be said that an individual traveler on a highway is entitled neither to bring an action to abate an obstruction thereon nor for damages, unless his injury is different in kind and degree from that suffered by the public generally. Schall v. Nusbaum, 56 Md. 512.

A traveler upon a highway does not suffer special damage sufficient to support a private action, by reason of an obstruction in the highway which causes delay in his journey, or compels him to take a more circuitous route, or deprives him of his journey altogether, the injury being common to all who attempt to use the highway. Baier v. Schermerhorn, 96 Wis. 372, 71 N. W. 600.

Thus, it has been held that an obstruction in a road not upon or adjoining plaintiff's land, but between his land and places to and from which he wishes to travel over the road, which prevented his using the same, does not occasion him special injury so that he may maintain a bill to abate the obstruction. San José Ranch Co. v. Brooks, 74 Cal. 463, 16 Pac. 250; Atwood v. Partree, 56 Conn. 80, 14 Atl. 85; Storn v. Barger, 43 Ill. App. 173.

The special injury which an individual must suffer in order to allow him to maintain an action for obstructing a highway must be different not merely in degree but in kind from that suffered by the public APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Skamania County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover special damages alleged to have resulted from the negligent destruction by defendant of a certain public bridge. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George S. Shepherd and George E. O'Bryon, for appellant:

The mere fact that, by reason of the obstruction, the plaintiff was obliged to travel a longer and more circuitous route, is not such special damage as to entitle him to maintain an action.

Houck v. Wachter, 34 Md. 265, 6 Am. Rep. 332.

The obstruction of a public right of way is a public, not a private wrong, and therefore is one to be redressed by a public prosecution, and not by a private action for damages.

Mr. Virgil A. Crum, also for appellant:

The defendant had neither the power nor the authority, let alone the duty, of repairing the destroyed bridge.

Kirtley v. Spokane County, 20 Wash. 111, 54 Pac. 936; Freedom v. Weed, 40 Me. 383, 63 Am. Dec. 670.

Negligence cannot be predicated on an omission to do what one has no right to do.

Veeder v. Little Falls, 100 N. Y. 343, 3 N. E. 306; Hyams v. Webster, L. R. 4 Q. B.

generally, and the fact that one who has very frequent occasion to use a highway is obliged to use a longer route because of an obstruction does not constitute such special damage. Crook v. Pitcher, 61 Md. 510; Hartshorn v. South Reading, 3 Allen, 501 (injunction).

The fact that a person is obliged, by an obstruction in the highway, to travel a longer and more circuitous route in going with products from his farm to a market town, is not such special damages as will support an action by him to recover the alleged damage. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 34 Fla. 346, 26 L.R.A. 410, 16 So. 282; Sohn v. Cambern, 106 Ind. 302, 6 N. E. 813.

Nor may an individual maintain an action against a town for damages because of a total obstruction of a highway by snow, in consequence of which the plaintiff was wholly unable to use it, as he had occasion to do, for hauling wood to market and for other purposes, by reason of which he lost the sale of the wood and was unable to perform his engagements. Griffin v. Sanborn-ton, 44 N. H. 248.

In Shaw v. Boston & A. R. Co. 159 Mass. 597, 35 N. E. 92, it was held that the plaintiff had not suffered such special injury as to entitle him to recover damages, where he complained of the obstructing of a public highway in a city due to repair work upon a bridge which he was obliged to cross in delivering milk and garden products to his customers, and the consequent loss of his said business.

In Farrelly v. Cincinnati, 2 Disney (Ohio) 516, it was held that the owner of an omnibus route did not suffer special damages so as to entitle him to maintain an action therefor, because his omnibuses were unable to cover their regular route, due to disrepair of a street.

In Aram v. Schallenger, 41 Cal. 449, a demurrer to a complaint in an action for an injunction was sustained on the ground that no special damage to plaintiffs was shown, although it was alleged that the plaintiffs owned tracts of land adjoining an obstructed road and had no other means of access to their lands.

Winterbottom v. Derby, L. R. 2 Exch. 316, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 511, distinguishing Iveson v. Moore, infra, held that no special damage beyond that to the public generally was suffered by a traveler who, on one or two occasions, merely went up to an obstruction and returned, and on one occasion removed the obstruction.

The fact that one lives on an obstructed street, and so has more occasion to pass through it, is not sufficient to entitle him to recover special damages, the inconvenience being in degree only, and not an injury in kind different from that sustained by the public. Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 403.

The closing of a road which afforded access to a cemetery does not result in special injury to relatives of certain persons buried in the cemetery, so as to entitle them to enjoin the obstruction of the road. Sunderland v. Martin, 113 Ind. 411, 15 N. E. 639.

But it was held in Nelson v. Randolph, 222 Ill. 531, 78 N. E. 914, that averments of a bill in equity that complainant had members of his family buried in a cemetery is sufficient to show special injury to him by the obstruction of a highway leading to the cemetery.

An averment that plaintiff was hindered, obstructed, and prevented from passing along a public way by reason of the erection of a wall thereon, was held insufficient in Holmes v. Corthell, 80 Me. 31, 12 Atl. 730, there being no allegation showing any specific damage, and it not appearing that upon any special occasion he was thereby compelled to make a longer detour, nor that he lost any time, or was put to any expense thereby.

It was held in Baxter v. Winooski Turnp. Co. 22 Vt. 114, 52 Am. Dec. 84, that the liability of the defendant company for "all damages" happening from want of repair of their road was the same as the statutory liability of incorporated towns, and could not be extended to include damages resulting to one who was injured in his business by reason of not attempting to use the road

Rudkin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 19th day of May, 1906, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the United States, acting through the Postmaster General, to transport the mail from Collins by way of Home Valley and Carson to Stevenson and return six times each week for the term of four years from the 1st day of July, 1906. At the time this contract was entered into and for some considerable time thereafter, the usual and only route of travel from Carson to Home Valley was along a public highway which crossed Wind river, a rapid mountain stream, on a public bridge constructed and maintained by Skamania county. The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and at the times herein mentioned was engaged in driving logs and other timber products down Wind river. On the 19th day of October, 1906, the defendant so negligently conducted its logging operations that the bridge in ques-because of its general bad condition, or from not being able to travel it as expeditiously and carry as large loads as he otherwise could have done. The court said that if the action were on the case at common law, to recover damages for an obstruction of the highway by some positive act whereby the plaintiff was delayed in passing along it, or compelled to carry less loads than he otherwise might and would have carried, it might well admit of a question whether this would not be such a special damage as to give a private action.

In Powell v. Bunker, 91 Ind. 64, the right of an individual to bring an action for damages and for an injunction, because of an obstruction in a road, was denied because it did not appear that the plaintiff was specially injured. It is suggested in the opinion that there would have been a special injury if the plaintiff had abated the obstruction, or, when actually passing along the highway, had been delayed or turned back by such obstruction. Upon this point the court said (p. 68): "To be prohibited by one through whose lands a highway runs from passing upon the highway, and to cease to use or refrain from using the road because of such order, will not constitute a special injury from a public nuisance, or afford a right of action for the loss and inconvenience arising from going a more circuitous and difficult way; and while the injury to the public from an obstruction of a highway may rest in contemplation, there must be an actual hindrance to an individual to entitle him to his private remedy." 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The obstruction of a public road or street which affords the only approach to property thereon used for business or other purposes is such special injury to the owner as to support his action for damages. Cushing-Wetmore Co. v. Gray, 152 Cal. 118, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47, 92 Pac. 70; Stricker v. Hillis, 15 Idaho, 709, 99 Pac. 831; Brown v. Toronto & N. R. Co. 26 U. C. C. P. 206; Ross v. Thompson, 78 Ind. 90; Fossion v. Landry, 123 Ind. 136, 24 N. E. 90.

The same rule holds good in a bill to abate the obstruction as a nuisance. Miller v. Schenck, 78 Iowa, 372, 43 N. W. 225; Hayden v. Stewart, 71 Kan. 11, 80 Pac. 43; Gardner v. Stroever, 89 Cal. 26, 26 Pac. 618; Ross v. Thompson, supra.

There was held to have been sufficient special damage to warrant a private action for obstructing a road, in Pierce v. Dart, 7 Cow. 609, where the injury was due to a delay and the time spent in removing the obstruction.

A contractor was held to have suffered special damage, in Anne Arundel County v. Watts, 112 Md. 353, 76 Atl. 82, where the defendant's failure to repair a bridge on the highway prevented its use, and compelled the plaintiff to transport, by hand cars on a railroad, at large expense, materials to be used for construction work, there being no other highway between the points.

One who has occasion to travel over a highway with teams and wagons to deliver freight, and actually attempts to do so, suffers special and peculiar damages other than those sustained by the public in gen-tion was carried away and destroyed. On the 17th day of November following, the defendant paid to Skamania county the sum of $1,000 in full settlement for any and all loss or damage sustained by the county by reason of the destruction of the bridge. After the destruction of the bridge, the plaintiff was compelled to carry the mail down the Columbia river by boat, and thence overland, by a circuitous route, to the several postoffices and places of delivery. The present action was instituted to recover the special damages resulting to him from the destruction of the bridge. The case came on for trial on the 6th day of February, 1908; but, after a portion of the testimony had been introduced, the court sustained an objection to oral testimony tending to show the terms and conditions of the mail contract between the plaintiff and the government. A continuance was thereupon granted on the plaintiff's application, to enable him to procure a certified copy of the mail contract, which was on file in the postoffice department. A second trial was had on the 8th day of November, 1908, resulting in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $100, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

When the case was called for trial, the appellant objected to a trial by jury, for the reason that the respondent did not, at or before the time the case was called to be set for trial, serve upon the opposite party or his attorney, and file with the clerk of the court, a statement of himself or attorney that he elected to have the case tried by jury, as required by the act of March 6, 1903 (Laws 1903, chap. 43, p. 50). In answer to a similar complaint in Knapp v. Order of Pendo, 36 Wash. 601, 79 Pac. 209, we said: "It is within the discretion of the trial court to permit a demand for a jury to be made after the case is called to be set for trial, or to submit the issues of fact in a case to a jury of its own motion, and no error can be predicated upon its ruling in that regard." To the same effect, see Fleming v. Wilson, 39 Wash. 106, 80 Pac. 1104; Hart v. Cascade Timber Co. 39 Wash. 279, 81 Pac. 738. The granting of a continuance of the first trial is also assigned as error. This ruling was clearly within the discretion of the trial court. Had the court refused the continuance, the respondent could have taken a voluntary nonsuit, and the appellant would have gained nothing by such a course, except a recovery of its costs. Perhaps the court would have imposed this burden upon the respondent as a condition eral, for which he may have a recovery, where he was prevented and delayed for a period of five and a half days by an obstruction placed in the road by the defendant. Milarkey v. Foster, 6 Or. 378, 25 Am. Rep. 531.

Where a fence extended into the street and compelled plaintiff to pass around it in order to go to and from his premises situated on that street, he suffered a peculiar injury, for the abatement of which equity gave a remedy. Crooke v. Anderson, 23 Hun, 266.

Where an obstruction in a highway is such that one has to use a circuitous route to reach his place of business, he is entitled to recover damages for the special injuries sustained. Beaudean v. Cape Girardeau, 71 Mo. 392.

It was held in Patterson v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 56 Mich. 172, 22 N. W. 260, that an individual who had been held up by a train of cars standing across the highway upon which he was traveling was entitled to recover for the special injury he suffered by the detention.

There is special injury authorizing a private person to bring a bill to abate a nuisance, where he owns a farm and nursery adjacent to a highway which has been unlawfully obstructed, and such highway affords the only outlet to market for his products. Smith v. Mitchell, 21 Wash. 536, 75 Am. St. Rep. 858, 58 Pac. 667.

In Iveson v. Moore, 1 Id. Raym. 486, it was held that an action was maintainable for damages due to an obstructed highway, where the special injury was to the owner 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of a colliery in not being able to carry coal to his customers.

In Chichester v. Lethbridge, Willes, Rep. 71, particular damages were held to have been shown sufficient to support the action, which was for damages for an obstruction, first, because it was expressly laid that the plaintiff was attempting to travel this road several times with his coach, but could not by reason of the obstruction, and, secondly, it was also laid that the defendant in person withstood and opposed him from removing the obstruction.

In Maynell v. Saltmarsh, 1 Keble, 847, an allegation was held to show sufficient special damage when it stated that an obstruction of a road prevented plaintiff's removing his corn from the field, with the result that it became corrupted and spoiled.

As to the right of an owner of property where means of access from one direction is shut off or interfered with by the closing of an adjoining street, or a portion of the street on which he is situated, see Hyde v. Fall River, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 269, and the accompanying note.

As to obstructions in a highway preventing access to property except by a circuitous route, as a special injury entitling the owner to maintain an action for damages or to abate the nuisance, see the note to Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Johnson, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 226.

to the granting of a continuance, had the appellant requested it, but no such request was made.

The remaining assignments of error go to the sufficiency of the complaint and to the sufficiency of the evidence to make out a cause of action. Upon this question there is a conflict of authority, both within and without this state. All the authorities agree that a private action for the obstruction of a public highway is only maintainable by those who suffer some particular loss or damage therefrom, beyond that suffered by the general public. Interference with a common right does not of itself afford a cause of action to the individual, but special or particular damages consequent upon such interference does. There is little difficulty in stating the general rule, but, when we look to the decided cases to ascertain what constitutes particular or special damages within the meaning of the rule, we find a hopeless conflict. Any attempt to review the authorities, or to extract from them a rule which might be said to be sustained by the weight of authority, would be both futile and fruitless. The extreme view on the one side is perhaps taken in Massachusetts, where it has been held in numerous cases that individuals suffering very considerable loss and damage from the obstruction of navigable streams and public highways have no right of action, because their loss differs in degree, and not in kind, from that sustained by the general public. Many of the cases from that state may be found cited in Jones v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 16 Wash. 25, 47 Pac. 220, upon which the appellant chiefly relies. The extreme view on the other side is perhaps taken in Maine, where it has been held that a person stopped by an obstruction in a public highway while returning home with a loaded team, and compelled to return by a more circuitous route, suffered special damages, and had a right of action against the wrongdoer. Brown v. Watson, 47 Me. 161, 74 Am. Dec. 482. A review of many cases bearing upon this general question will be found in Viebahn v. Crow Wing County, 96 Minn. 276, 104 N. W. 1089, and in the note to that case in 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1126. The rule is thus stated in Elliott on Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 669: "As a general rule, no person can maintain an action for damages from a common nuisance where the injury and damages are common to all. But, if a person sustains a special damage, peculiar to himself, from the obstruction of a highway, whether it be to his person or his property, he may maintain an action therefor. Thus, obstructing and cutting off the access to a person's place of business is a special injury, for which he may recover 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

damages in an action at law; and ejection or trespass will lie against one who wrongfully places an obstruction of a permanent character upon that part of a highway in which the complainant owns the fee. So, if the complainant, by reason of an obstruction in a highway, is compelled to turn back or go by a more circuitous route, whereby he is specially damaged by being rendered unable to perform a contract, he may maintain an action therefor; and the same is true if, by reason of such an obstruction, he sustains peculiar damage in the labor of himself and his servants to remove the obstruction. So, where an obstruction wrongfully placed by a third person in a highway causes travelers to pass around it over the adjoining land, whereby the crops of the landowner are injured, the latter may have his action against the person creating the obstruction. But mere delay caused by an obstruction, unaccompanied by special injury, does not as a rule give any right to an action for special damages." In Wakeman v. Wilbur, 147 N. Y. 657, 42 N. E. 341, the court said: "The referee found from evidence entirely sufficient that the plaintiff was obliged to use the road in the winter for the purpose of drawing logs, but, on account of the obstruction, he was for several days compelled to take another and much longer route, to his pecuniary damage; that at other times he was obliged to clear the road from the drifts of snow that had accumulated in consequence of the fence, which required time and labor, and that in some other respects he was put to expense in the use of the road for his lawful business by reason of the defendant's acts. . . . These findings bring the case within the principle which permits a private person to maintain an action to abate a public nuisance, and to recover the damages which he sustained, and which were special and peculiar to himself, growing out of necessity on his part to use the road at the time of the obstruction more frequently, perhaps, than his neighbors. The obstruction was, no doubt, an offense against the public, but it was none the less in a special and peculiar sense an injury to the plaintiff." In Knowles v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 175 Pa. 623, 52 Am. St. Rep. 860, 34 Atl. 974, it was held that one who contracted to haul dirt at a specified price per load might recover damages from a railroad corporation for thereafter erecting and maintaining a fence across a highway which was the natural route from the place where the dirt was taken to the place of delivery, and over which several loads could have been hauled in the time required to haul one load by the circuitous route which the contractor was compelled to take because of the obstructions. See also Milarkey v. Foster, 6 Or. 378, 25 Am. Rep. 531. In Jones v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. supra, this court followed the extreme views of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, and held that the owner of a steamboat accustomed to navigate a river could not recover damages caused by an obstruction to navigation compelling him to tie up his boat for several days. This case is in conflict with many decisions of this court, and is opposed to the weight of authority. Viebahn v. Crow Wing County, supra, and cases there cited.

Thus, in Carl v. West Aberdeen Land & Improv. Co. 13 Wash. 616, 43 Pac. 890, it was held that persons engaged in driving logs might maintain an action to abate a dam which constituted an obstruction to navigation. To the same effect are Sultan Water & P. Co. v. Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. 31 Wash. 562, 72 Pac. 114; Monroe Mill Co. v. Menzel, 35 Wash. 487, 70 L.R.A. 272, 102 Am. St. Rep. 905, 77 Pac. 813; Dawson v. McMillan, 34 Wash. 269, 75 Pac. 807. The rule has been extended to actions to enjoin or abate other nuisances. Ingersoll v. Rousseau, 35 Wash. 92, 76 Pac. 513, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 35; Wilcox v. Henry, 35 Wash. 591, 77 Pac. 1055. In Creech v. Humptulips Boom & River Improv. Co. 37 Wash. 172, 79 Pac. 633, it was held that individuals injured by the obstruction of a navigable slough might recover special damages caused by the obstruction. In Smith v. Mitchell, 21 Wash. 536, 75 Am. St. Rep. 858, 58 Pac. 607, it was held that where the only means of ingress and egress to and from the lands of a private person, in order to reach a market for the products of his farm and nursery, is over a public highway, the obstruction of such highway is of such special injury as will sustain an action to enjoin the nuisance, under § 3093, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes [Pierce's Code, § 1867], which provides that "a private person may maintain a civil action for a public nuisance, if it is specially injurious to himself, but not otherwise." Section 5660, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes [Pierce's Code, § 1265], provides that "the obstruction of any highway . . . is a nuisance and the subject of an action for damages and other and further relief." The following section, 5661, provides that "such action may be brought by any person whose property is injuriously affected or whose personal enjoyment is lessened by the nuisance." Under these sections and under what we believe to be the weight of authority, the present action is maintainable. A rule that prohibits such actions may tend to discourage litigation, but does not tend to promote justice.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

S. F. WALTERS

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(82 Kan. 739, 109 Pac. 173.)

Carrier — negligence — failure to stop at passenger's destination.

1. It is the duty of a railway company to use the highest degree of care which is reasonably practical in transporting passengers and in setting them down at their destination, and the failure to stop a train at the destination of a passenger and afford him an opportunity to alight with safety is culpable negligence.

Same — direction to alight from moving train — contributory negligence — question for jury.

2. Where the railway company fails to stop its train at the destination of a passenger, and as it is passing the station the conductor of the train advises and directs the passenger to alight from the train while it is moving at a speed of from 3 to 4 miles an hour, the question whether the passenger, who acts on the direction of the conductor and is injured, is guilty of contributory negligence, is one for the determination of the jury.

Trial — verdict — evidence — sufficiency.

3. The special findings of the jury examined, and found not to be without support in the evidence nor contrary to the instructions of the court, and not inconsistent with the general verdict.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Marshall County in plaintiff's favor in an action

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Note.— See note to Hoylman v. Kanawha & M. R. Co. 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 741, on the general question as to negligence of passenger in getting on or off moving train, and cases cited at page 751 of that note, as to the effect of a direction or invitation by those in charge of the train. brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. J. Gregg, James W. Orr, and B. P. Waggener, for appellant:

The mere fact that plaintiff acted upon the advice or command of the conductor would not justify him in attempting to alight from the train when it was obviously dangerous; and the default of the conductor would not relieve the passenger from the consequences of his own reckless acts.

A passenger who steps from a moving train to avoid being carried past his destination is guilty of negligence per se.

The boarding or alighting from a moving car is not, under all circumstances, contributory negligence.

It was clearly a question for the jury to determine, whether plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care when he obeyed the order of the conductor and attempted to alight from the train.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This litigation, instituted to recover for injuries sustained by a passenger while alighting from a train, is here for a second review. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Walters, 78 Kan. 39, 96 Pac. 346. In his petition, S. F. Walters alleged that on July 25, 1903, he was a passenger on a train of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company due to arrive at Bigelow at about 4 o'clock in the morning, and as the train approached his destination the conductor in charge of the train came into the car in which he was riding, and directed him to go out upon the platform of the car and down upon the lower step; and that, relying upon the skill and prudence of the conductor, he did so, and in obedience to the order of the conductor he undertook to alight from the train believing it safe to do so; that just as he was about to alight the conductor "signaled the train to proceed, and, without any notice to plaintiff, said train suddenly jerked forward, and, in consequence of the aforesaid acts of the conductor, plaintiff was jerked and thrown violently from the train, by reason whereof, and the jolt and shock incident thereto, the plaintiff sustained severe injuries to his spine and further injury to his person and nerves in general as to produce hydrocele, by reason of which, and the said injury to his spine, plaintiff has been greatly and permanently injured." At the trial Walters offered testimony tending to show that on the night in question he was a passenger for hire on the train of the railway company, and that as he approached the station the conductor came in and told him: "This is Bigelow! Come on!" That he followed the conductor out of the car, and that the conductor directed him to "get down there on that step, and don't step straight out, but step with the train, so it won't hurt you, and be quick about it." He stated that the night was cloudy and somewhat dark, and when the coach had passed the depot about 60 feet he stepped off the train, and sustained the injuries for which the action was brought. A witness who came to get the mail sack thrown from the same train testifies that, as the train passed the station, a passenger was standing on the steps and the conductor was above him with a lantern in his hand; that he heard the conductor tell the passenger, who turned out to be Walters, to face the way the train was going or he would fall. The witness said the train did not stop, but was moving at the rate of about 6 miles an hour, and also that the conductor gave the "high-ball" or go-ahead sign over the head of the passenger, who was standing on the lower step. There is also testimony that on the return trip the conductor inquired of the mail carrier if Walters was badly hurt, and that he also made inquiry as to the age and family of Walters. Testimony of a contrary nature was given by the train men; but the general verdict of the jury was in favor of Walters, and with it were returned answers to a number of special questions that were submitted.

It is contended by appellant that the court should have directed a verdict in favor of the railway company. It was the duty of the railway company to exercise the highest degree of care which was reasonably practical in transporting this passenger, and also in setting him down at his destination, and the failure of the company to stop the train long enough to enable him to alight with safety, as the jury found in this case, is culpable negligence. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hughes, 55 Kan. 491, 40 Pac. 919; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Walters, supra; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Wimmer, 72 Kan. 566, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 140, 84 Pac. 378, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 756.

It is insisted, however, that, as Walters voluntarily alighted from the train when it was in motion, the trial court should have held as a matter of law that his own negligence barred a recovery. There is, of course, some danger in getting off a moving train, however slow the rate of speed; but it cannot be said as a matter of law that every case of boarding or alighting from a train in motion, without regard to the speed or the circumstances under which it is done, renders the passenger guilty of contributory negligence. In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCandliss, 33 Kan. 366, 6 Pac. 587, it was said that "stepping from a train of cars in motion to a stationary platform, or to the stationary ground, which is more dangerous, is not always culpably dangerous and is not negligence per se." In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hughes, supra, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

where the conductor failed to bring his train to a stop, but directed the passenger to alight while it was in motion, the contention was made that the attempt to alight, with or without the invitation or order of the conductor, was contributory negligence. It was there said: "It is not contributory negligence per se for a passenger to leave a train which is in motion. Of course, a passenger must exercise ordinary care, and if he voluntarily places himself in a perilous position, and incurs a danger so obvious that an ordinarily prudent man would not encounter it, there can be no recovery. Whether the act of Hughes in leaving the train while it was in motion constitutes contributory negligence barring a recovery depends upon whether the danger was so patent that a prudent man under the circumstances would not have made the attempt. We think it was clearly a question of fact for the jury to determine." Along the same line, see Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Sanford, 45 Kan. 372, 11 L.R.A. 432, 25 Pac. 891; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Loewe, 69 Kan. 843, 74 Pac. 234; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holloway, 71 Kan. 1, 114 Am. St. Rep. 462, 80 Pac. 31. Of course, exceptional cases may be surmised of a passenger jumping from a train where the speed was so great, the danger so obvious, and the circumstances such, that a court would be justified in directing a verdict against the passenger. The present case does not fall within that class. When Walters approached Bigelow and was escorted by the conductor to the platform of the coach, he had a right to assume that the train would be brought to a stop. When he went down upon the lower step of the coach, he must have known that the train was still in motion; but it appears that it was then going at the speed of about 3 to 4 miles an hour. Passing by the station without stopping, and carrying him away from his home, would naturally have a tendency to disturb him. At that time the conductor advised him as to the manner of alighting, and also gave him the imperative direction to get off the train and do it quickly. In view of these circumstances, including the speed of the train and the direction of the conductor to alight, the matter of contributory negligence was a fair question for the determination of the jury. Cumberland Valley R. Co. v. Mangans, 61 Md. 53, 48 Am. Rep. 88; New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Coulbourn, 69 Md. 360, 1 L.R.A. 541, 9 Am. St. Rep. 430, 16 Atl. 208; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Crunk, 119 Ind. 543, 12 Am. St. Rep. 443, 21 N. E. 31; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lyons, 129 Pa. 113, 15 Am. St. Rep. 701, 18 Atl. 759; Carr v. Eel River & E. R. Co. 21 L.R.A. 354, and note (98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213); 3 Thomp. Neg. § 3027; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 643.

It is argued that, whatever may be the true rule on this question, the instructions given by the trial court constituted the law of the case, which the jury were bound to observe, and that the jury in their findings went contrary to the instructions, and therefore there should be a reversal. In one of its instructions the court told the jury in effect that, if an ordinarily careful and prudent person would not, under the circumstances which surrounded Walters when he alighted from the train at the time of the injury, have stepped from the train while it was in motion, the plaintiff was necessarily negligent and cannot recover. In a later instruction the jury were told: "I instruct you as a matter of law that it is contributory negligence for a passenger on a train to undertake to alight from it in the darkness of the night while it is in motion at the rate of from 2 to 6 miles an hour, without any light to guide his steps or movements." The jury found that the train was in motion when Walters alighted, and that it was moving at a speed of from 3 to 4 miles an hour, and it is therefore argued that the finding necessarily violated the instruction of the court. Leaving out of the question the correctness of the instruction quoted, it will be seen that it clearly involves other considerations than that the train was in motion and moving at the rate of speed mentioned by the court. It will be observed, too, that the instruction includes the darkness of the night when the passenger alighted, and when there was no light to guide his steps or movements. While Walters alighted from the train on the morning of July 26th between half past 3 and 4 o'clock, it is also found by the jury that it was not then so dark as to prevent Walters from seeing where he was stepping when he alighted. As the element of darkness is lacking, the argument of appellant that the jury disregarded the instruction is not good.

It is further contended that the jury must have violated an instruction to the effect that the direction or advice of the conductor to the passenger to alight from the train while it was in motion is not sufficient reason to justify him in doing so. That single circumstance may not be sufficient to justify a passenger in stepping from a moving train. The speed might be so great, the danger so palpable, and the surrounding circumstances such, that it would be gross negligence to jump from the train even upon the invitation or direction of the conductor. As we have seen, other circumstances entered into the consideration in this case, and hence it cannot be said that the verdict violated the instruction of the court in this particular.

Another point of contention in the case was whether the hydrocele from which Walters was suffering resulted from the injury received when he alighted from the train, or from an earlier injury which was inflicted while he was working as a section hand for the railway company, and for which settlement had been made and compensation paid. The court instructed the jury, in substance, that Walters could receive nothing because of that injury or any condition resulting from it. The jury were asked the question whether, on alighting from the train, Walters sustained an injury called "hydrocele," and whether it was originally so caused, or was a recurrence of a former complaint. The answer of the jury was "recurrence." The appellant infers from this answer that the jury awarded damages for the previous injury, for which compensation had been made. Of course, no recovery could be had for that injury; but if Walters had been cured of the disease of hydrocele resulting from the first injury, as the physicians of the railway company had decided when he was discharged from the hospital, and the later injury brought on the same disease or condition, no reason is seen why he could not recover for the consequences of the injury. Apart from that consideration, the jury found that other injuries than hydrocele resulted from the fall, and that, in addition to this disease, there were sprains of the back and the hips. A witness for the railway company who is a physician testified that, when Walters returned to the hospital for treatment after the accident, he was suffering from a sprain of the back and left hip, and that he then complained that the hydrocele had returned, but that the witness found no fluid in the sac and could discover no evidence of hydrocele. It cannot be said that the injury for which appellee recovered was the earlier one, for which the company had settled, nor that it was not the one which resulted from falling from the train. Appellant contends, also, that hydrocele is a disease which may be easily and permanently cured, and that the testimony shows that, if Walters had submitted to a slight surgical operation, he might have got rid of the disease. The court told the jury, in substance, that if, by a reasonable and safe operation, he might have been restored to health, and neglected or refused to submit to it, he would not be entitled to recover as for a permanent disability, but could only recover for the losses sustained up to the time reasonably necessary to perform the operation and to bring about his recovery. It was not an undisputed fact in the case that the hydrocele with which Walters was afflicted after falling from the train could have been removed by a surgical operation, nor that he could safely have submitted to an operation. A physician who examined him testified at length as to his condition, and stated that an operation could not have been performed with an assurance of a cure; that radical treatment was not advisable and might terminate fatally. On the testimony it cannot be held that the award of damages is excessive, and we discover no error in the proceedings which justifies a reversal. The judgment is affirmed.

JOHN H. GAY et al., Respts.

(— Cal. —, 109 Pac. 880.)

Special assessment — allowing attorney's fee against delinquent.

The legislature may allow an attorney's fee against one whose delinquency makes necessary a proceeding to enforce a special assessment for public improvements against his property, although no such fee is allowed in his favor.

(June 13, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in his favor for a less sum than was demanded in an action brought to establish a lien on certain real estate to the amount of a certain assessment for street improvements and costs. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Haines & Haines, for appellant.

The provision for allowance to the successful plaintiff of attorney's fees is valid.

Mr. L. L. Boone for respondents.

Angellotti, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a portion of the same judgment as is involved in Engbretsen v. Gay (L. A. 2,478) 109 Pac. 879, this day decided, a judgment sustaining plaintiff's claim of a lien on property of defendant to secure payment of the amount of an assessment for street improvements, and directing a sale of such property to satisfy such assessment with

Note. — Validity of statutory provision for attorney's fees in proceedings involving collection of taxes or special assessments.

The general question as to the validity of statutory provisions for attorney's fees was considered in the note to Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 909. As is therein shown, there has been much conflict upon that general question. However, there is no conflict upon the question considered in this note, the courts being agreed that the legislature may impose liability for attorney's fees upon delinquent debtors of the state or its agencies.

The legislature has the undoubted right to prescribe what costs shall be taxed in a case, and when an unsuccessful attempt is made to resist and defeat the collection of a just debt due the state, the general assembly may lawfully visit upon the defendant, not only the costs usually taxed, but further costs by way of a fee to the attorney who represents the state. United States Electric Power & Light Co. v. State, 79 Md. 63, 28 Atl. 768.

So, it may compel delinquents to pay attorney fees in actions for the collection of taxes. People v. Seymour, 16 Cal. 332, 76 Am. Dec. 521.

A statute passed in pursuance of such power is purely remedial, and is therefore not open to the objection that it creates a new liability and is retrospective in its operation. State ex rel. Rosenblatt v. Kerr, 8 Mo. App. 125.

So, a statute is constitutional which provides that the attorney who represents a tax collector in all proceedings for the reduction of assessments and the collection of taxes, and in all injunction proceedings wherein the tax collector is sought to be restrained from collecting taxes, shall receive a compensation of 10 per cent on the amount collected. State ex rel. Stempel v. New Orleans, 105 La. 768, 30 So. 97; Methodist Episcopal Church, South v. New Or- interest and costs. While otherwise in favor of plaintiff, this judgment denied his right to recover the sum of $15 in addition to the taxable costs, as an attorney fee, and disallowed the same. Plaintiff's appeal is from so much of the judgment as denies him a recovery of such attorney fee.

Section 12 of the act relating to street improvements, the act of March 18, 1885 (Stat. 1885, chap. 153), as amended by Stat. 1889, chap. 151, § 8, in terms provides that, "in all cases of recovery under the provisions of this act, the plaintiff shall recover the sum of $15 in addition to the taxable costs as attorneys' fees." The theory upon which the lower court disallowed plaintiff's claim was that this provision is invalid under the doctrine of Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 150 Cal. 265, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 909, 119 Am. St. Rep. 193, 88 Pac. 982, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 712. In that case it was held, in regard to liens of mechanics and others on real property for labor or materials furnished in improving the same (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183-1203a), that the statutory provision for the allowance of reasonable attorney's fees to each lien claimant whose lien is established (Code Civ. Proc. § 1195) is void, as violative of the provision of the Federal Constitution which guarantees to every person the equal protection of the law, and of the provisions of our own Constitution "which provide that general laws shall be uniform, prohibit special laws, and declare the inalienable rights of all men of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property." That ruling has been followed in Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 41, 91 Pac. 983, and Merced Lumber Co. v. Bruschi, 152 Cal. 372, 375, 92 Pac. 844, and must now be taken as settled law in this state. The reasoning upon which this conclusion is based in the first case cited (Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, supra) was that of the United States Supreme Court in Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, wherein a statute of the state of Texas gave an attorney fee of $10 to any person having a valid bona fide claim against a railroad corporation not exceeding $50, for personal services rendered or labor done, or for damages, etc. The court said that the effect of this statute was simply to impose a penalty upon railroad corporations for failure to pay certain debts, while individuals or other corporations guilty of similar delinquencies were not thus punished. It was declared that under this statute the railroad corporations were not treated as other debtors "or equally with other debtors;" that they could not appeal to the courts as other litigants under like conditions and with like protection; that, if the litigation terminated adversely to them, they were mulcted in the attorney's fees of the successful plaintiff, while, if successful, they recovered no attorney's fees; that they are therefore discriminated against, and do not stand leaves, 107 La. 611, 32 So. 101; Globe Lumber Co. v. Clement, 110 La. 438, 34 So. 595.

Such statute does not constitute a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and is not obnoxious to a provision of the state Constitution declaring that all courts shall be open, and that every person shall have for injury done to him adequate remedy by due process of law, and without denial or partiality. Liquidating Comrs. v. Marrero, 106 La. 130, 30 So. 305.

So, too, a statute is constitutional which provides that if a property owner refuses to pay a special assessment made against his property, the contractor may sue and recover, in addition to the assessment, a reasonable attorney's fee. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taber, 168 Ind. 419, 77 N. E. 741, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 808.

For legislative power so to provide can be upheld upon the ground that an assessment is laid by virtue of the state's power to tax, and that the state may impose a penalty upon the property owner for delay in discharging his obligation. Brown v. Central Bermudez Co. 162 Ind. 452, 69 N. E. 150.

Such a provision does not make the attorney's fees a part of the assessment, but pertains to the remedy. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Fish, 158 Ind. 525, 63 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

N. E. 454. And therefore it cannot be regarded as unconstitutionally invading any vested right because it is made to extend to assessments levied before its enactment. Dowell v. Talbot Pav. Co. 138 Ind. 675, 38 N. E. 389; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Walters, 13 Ind. App. 275, 41 N. E. 465.

In some cases the courts have allowed attorney's fees in actions for the enforcement of special assessments, without passing upon the question of the validity of the statute in pursuance of which they were allowed: School Dist. v. Board of Improvement, 65 Ark. 343, 46 S. W. 418; Gillis v. Cleveland, 87 Cal. 214, 25 Pac. 351; Hughes v. Alsip, 112 Cal. 587, 44 Pac. 1027; Reid v. Clay, 134 Cal. 207, 66 Pac. 262; McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 204, 103 Pac. 924; Scott v. Hayes, 162 Ind. 548, 70 N. E. 879; Palmer v. Nolting, 13 Ind. App. 581; 41 N. E. 1045; Tuttle v. Polk, 84 Iowa, 12, 50 N. W. 38; Montesano v. Blair, 12 Wash. 188, 40 Pac. 731.

So, attorney's fees in suits for the enforcement of taxes have been allowed in obedience to statutes whose validity was not passed upon. Files v. Fuller, 44 Ark. 273; State ex rel. Bauer v. Edwards, 144 Mo. 467, 46 S. W. 160; Harrison v. Johnston, 109 Tenn. 245, 70 S. W. 414 (inheritance tax).

L. A. W.

equal before the law. The Texas statute was therefore held invalid. This court said, in Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, supra: "A statute which gives an attorney's fee to one party in an action and denies it to the other, and allows such fee in one kind of action and not in other kinds of actions, where, as in the statute here in question, the distinction is not founded on constitutional or natural differences, is clearly violative of the constitutional provisions above noticed." There is, however, nothing in the opinion in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, supra, or in our own Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, supra, to suggest that attorney's fees may not be allowed a successful plaintiff in certain classes of cases, even though no such allowance be made to the defendant in the event that he prevails. The right to classify in this respect, as long as the classification is "based upon some difference bearing a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is attempted," was conceded by the opinion in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, supra (see Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609), and is recognized by all the authorities. The difficulty in the Texas case was that there was no such difference, and the same was held to be true by this court in regard to our mechanics' lien law provision. In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, supra, the United States Supreme Court upheld a statute of the state of Kansas allowing a reasonable attorney's fee to a successful plaintiff in an action against a railroad company for damages by fire caused by the operating of the railroad, on the ground that the same was a reasonable regulation in the nature of a police regulation, to secure the utmost care on the part of railroad companies to prevent the escape of fire, and not simply a provision to secure the payment of debts. Upon the same principle, the United States Supreme Court has sustained a statute imposing a penalty on railroad corporations of $1.25 per day for failure to pay a laborer what is due him upon discharge, the statute being held to be a reasonable regulation for the protection of servants and employees of railroads (St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419), and a statute imposing a penalty of $50 on a common carrier who failed to adjust and pay a valid claim for damages for loss of property within a stated time, it being held that the design was not to penalize the carrier for the nonpayment of a debt, but that the statute was a reasonable regulation to bring about prompt settlement of such claims (Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U. S. 73, 52 L. ed. 108, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28.) Decisions of state courts along the same lines are numerous. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crider, 91 Tenn. 489, 19 S. W. 618, an act imposing on unfenced railroads absolute liability for injuries done to live stock by their moving trains, and making them liable for a reasonable attorney's fee in any action brought to recover the amount appraised as due the plaintiff therefor, where the plaintiff recovers the amount of the appraisement, was upheld. The act was held to be a valid exercise of the police power of the state; the object thereof being to compel the inclosure of the track in such manner as to prevent live stock going on the road. As to the provision for an attorney's fee, objection was made that it was the imposition of a burden upon one class of litigants in favor of another, and a violation of the constitutional rule requiring equality of right, privilege, and exemption. To these objections the court said, through Judge Lurton, that they overlooked the fact that the legislation is intended to compel railroad companies to fence in their tracks, and that the state having the right, in the exercise of its police powers, to compel all railroad companies to fence in their tracks, might enforce such policy, not only by making the offending company liable to all sustaining injury by reason of their neglect, but, blending public and private interests, by permitting a recovery in excess of actual damages, by way of punitive damages and reasonable attorney's fees. In Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Salmon, 161 Ind. 131, 67 N. E. 918, a statute allowed an owner to fence a railroad right of way where the railroad company refused on proper notice to do so, and to recover the cost, with reasonable attorney fee. It was held that the legislature had the right, in the exercise of its police powers, to prescribe this duty and impose penalties for failure to perform, in shape of double actual damages, double costs, attorney fee, and absolute liability in case of injury to animals. The court said that the attorney fee was in the nature of a penalty for damages, imposed by the legislature as a punishment for the neglect and wilful failure of the railroad company to erect said fence as required by the statute, and to compel it to construct the same. See also Humes v. Missouri P. R. Co. 82 Mo. 221, 52 Am. Rep. 369; Perkins v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 103 Mo. 52, 11 L.R.A. 426, 15 S. W. 320; Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Duggan, 109 Ill. 537, 50 Am. Rep. 619; Dow v. Beidelman, 49 Ark. 455, 5 S. W. 718, in which the attorney fee provision was upheld as a part of the penalty imposed for noncompliance with the duty imposed; Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Prior, 34 Fla. 271, 15 So. 760; note to Dell v. Marvin, 79 Am. St. Rep. 178.

More closely in point, but depending on the same general principle, are decisions upholding provisions for attorney's fees in actions to recover taxes, the validity of which has apparently never been doubted by the courts. In People v. Seymour, 16 Cal. 332, 76 Am. Dec. 521, an action for the recovery of taxes, it was held that a provision of a statute compelling a party delinquent in payment of taxes, if sued, to pay costs and a percentage by way of an attorney fee, in addition to the tax, was not unconstitutional. In State ex rel. Rosenblatt v. Kerr, 8 Mo. App. 125, such a provision was upheld; the court saying that it was purely remedial, and stands upon a like footing with any other provision for compelling the delinquent to bear the expenses incident to an enforcement of the state's claim for taxes. See also United States Electric Power & Light Co. v. State, 79 Md. 63, 72, 28 Atl. 708. It is the legal duty of every person liable for taxes to pay the same when due, and the power of the state to impose upon the taxpayer penalties for noncompliance with this duty, and such costs as are reasonably incurred in the enforcement of the same, including reasonable attorney's fees, cannot be doubted.

There is no distinction in principle in this regard between ordinary taxes and local assessments for improvements, under such statutes as our street improvement act. The assessment, it is true, is one in favor of the contractor to whom the contract for the improvement has been let by the public authorities, but it is one laid by virtue of the power of the state to tax, and the contractor may properly be regarded as the agent of the state in the matter of the enforcement of the tax against the assessed property. The obligation resting on the property assessed to answer for this tax is as clear and positive as is the duty of a taxpayer to pay the ordinary tax. The nature of the proceedings is such that the expense of collecting the tax on property delinquent, if not recoverable against such property in the proceeding to enforce the tax, would fall in part on those who voluntarily pay their assessments, since contractors, in bidding upon street work, would be compelled to include in their estimates an additional amount sufficient to indemnify them against the probable further expense in this regard. Such expense should equitably be borne only by the property as to which such proceedings are rendered necessary by the delinquency of the owners. It would seem that the legislature should have the power to provide for the payment of such additional expense by the property whose owners are responsible therefor. While the precise question has not been presented for determination many times, such rulings as have been made sustain the validity of such a provision. It is declared in Page & Jones, Taxation by Assessment, that, if the statute so provides, a penalty may be charged for failure to pay an assessment when due, and an attorney fee may be recovered in a suit to enforce an assessment. §§ 108, 1109, and 1110. The question was determined by the supreme court of Indiana in favor of such a provision for attorney's fees, in Brown v. Central Bermudez Co. 162 Ind. 452, 69 N. E. 150; the court saying in reply to a claim that the provision was unconstitutional: "A street assessment is laid by virtue of the power of the state to tax, and we think that a statute providing for the allowance of an attorney fee on foreclosure in such a case can be upheld on the ground that the state may provide for a penalty if the delay of the property owner to discharge such an obligation renders it necessary to commence suit. The enactment upon this subject may be compared to the provisions of statutes made for the benefit of purchasers at tax sale." See also Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taber, 168 Ind. 419, 422, 77 N. E. 741, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 808.

We are of the opinion that the provision for an attorney fee in this class of cases is not in violation of any constitutional provision, Federal or state, and that the judgment is erroneous in not including the allowance of $15 asked by plaintiff thereunder.

So much of the judgment of the court below as refuses plaintiff an allowance for attorney fee is reversed, with directions to the court below to modify its judgment by incorporating a provision allowing such a fee as provided by the statute.

JOHN THIEL, Appt.,

v.

HENRY BUTKER et al.

(125 La. 473, 51 So. 500.)

Note — purchase after maturity — rights.

1. Plaintiff is the holder after maturity and for value of a promissory note, executed by one of the defendants, who gave to his attorney, Maloney, money to pay the note at date of maturity. The attorney paid the note, and without authority sold it to plaintiff, who collected interest from Maloney, who also extended the time of payment for one year. When plaintiff acquired it, the note was past due and the attorney could not give it vitality as a negotiable instrument by indorsing on it an extension of the time of payment. The note bore notice of its dishonor on its face sufficient to place anyone on his guard.

Same — acts of agent.

2. The attorney had no authority to cut off the equities by attempting to extend the time of the note; for his authority was merely to pay the note, and his acts beyond this cannot give negotiability to the instrument, already matured. The plaintiff, who purchased it after maturity, acquired merely the rights of a transferee, which are not greater than those of the transferrer, and, as the one from whom he acquired the note had no rights against the defendants, the transferee, the plaintiff, can assert none.

Same — satisfaction — reissue by agent — liability of maker.

3. Where a person places an amount in the hands of an attorney for the purpose of paying a note, and, after so paying, the attorney reissues it without authority, thereby committing a fraud, the maker cannot be held for the payment of the dishonored paper, when such maker has acted in good faith.

Same — commercial law — application.

4. The principle that one who puts another in a position where he may perpetrate a wrong must suffer for the consequent loss has no application to the present case; for the strict rule of the commercial law, adopted in the interest of commerce, must prevail. The loss must fall on the one who trusted the attorney and accepted the note after maturity.

(January 17, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division "A," in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Zach Spearing for appellant.

Messrs. G. G. Kronenberger and J. C. Henriques for appellees.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff claims that he is the owner for consideration of a promissory note made by one of the defendants, bearing date November 19, 1902, to his own order and by him indorsed, for the sum of $2,000, payable in one year, identified by an act of sale and mortgage resting on property described in the petition.

The act imports confession of judgment.

One of the defendants sold this property to the other on May 4, 1906. At the date of the sale one of the defendants assumed this mortgage and interest and fee of attorney to be paid as stipulated in the act of sale.

Plaintiff sued for a writ of seizure and sale on the note and mortgage to pay note, interest, cost, and fee.

The defendant, who had assumed payment of this note at the time that he purchased the property, as before mentioned, sued for an injunction on the ground that the note had been taken up and paid by his attorney with money which he furnished on November 19, 1906.

The plaintiff in the proceedings for foreclosure (made defendant in the petition for an injunction) declared in his answer to the injunction that he in good faith acquired the note in open market.

Going back to the origin of the case, it appears that the plaintiff was informed by an acquaintance that the attorney before referred to as the attorney of one of the defendants had a $2,300 note for sale, whereupon plaintiff handed this acquaintance a check for the amount. He, the acquaintance, repaired to this attorney's office, took up this note, and handed it to plaintiff on his return.

Instead of being a $2,300 note, it was a $2,000 note, but the attorney had made his own note for the additional $300, which the acquaintance accepted subject to the approval of plaintiff.

The attorney's reputation at that time was good. The plaintiff accepted both notes, as he had no reason at that time to suspect the dishonesty of the attorney, who was also a notary public.

Plaintiff collected interest on this note from the attorney and notary, who indorsed the amount of the interest on the note and extended payment one year.

The plaintiff dealt exclusively with the attorney, and did not know the defendant

Note. — Effect of fraudulent reissue of bill or note which has been paid.

The conclusion reached in the above decision finds specific support in one of the cases cited therein,—State ex rel. Legier v. Sutherland, 111 La. 382, 35 So. 608, in which recovery was refused upon a note which was, after payment, sold by the agent of the maker without authority.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Weil v. Enterprise Ginnery & Mfg. Co. 42 La. Ann. 492, 7 So. 622, the other case cited by the court in THIEL v. BUTKER, there was no question of fraudulent reissue of a note by an agent, the specific holding being that payment of a note secured by a mortgage, by one not bound for it and who had no interest in discharging it, would not subrogate him to the rights of the party to whom he paid.

J. A. G.

Perfumo in the transaction at all save that, when the plaintiff took up the note, he was informed by the attorney that Perfumo had assumed the payment. Plaintiff knew nothing of Henry Butker (the other defendant) in this transaction. Butker was the vendor to Perfumo.

On the day that the note fell due, on November 19, 1906, it was in bank for collection for account of Robert E. Rusha.

Someone, whom neither the note clerk of the bank or anyone else could identify, called at the bank, and asked that it be not stamped "Paid." The bank officer telephoned to the holder, Rusha, who replied to collect the amount due, and turn over the note without the stamp "Paid."

The judge a quo took it for granted that the person calling and who paid was either Maloney or someone acting for him.

Plaintiff, Thiel, does not contest the judge's conclusion in that respect.

After Maloney or his agent had paid this amount to the bank and had taken up the note, it was reissued by Maloney for his own account. Maloney wrote to Thiel, the plaintiff, that he had examined the title of the property upon which the mortgage rested, and that he guaranteed its validity.

The evidence is that Perfumo had entire confidence in Maloney and intrusted him with the amount with which he took up the note.

Maloney's scheme in this case was to get from Perfumo, the debtor, an amount necessary to pay the note, which he did not use in paying the note, but in taking it up for his own account.

At the time that Maloney took up the note for his own account it was past due, and it therefore was dishonored paper, and it was not in the power of Maloney to give it vitality as a negotiable instrument by indorsing on it an extension of time for payment. The note bore notice upon its face because of its dishonor sufficient to place anyone to whom offered on his guard.

It is true that such paper may be transferred, though not negotiable, but those who take it without inquiry of the maker or the indorser or surety, whom they propose to hold (whether the paper is good and valid), have no recourse in case it has been paid. The transferee after maturity only acquires the right of the transferor. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. p. 699.

It is subject to all the equities existing prior to the transfer.

This note, for the purpose of illustration, may be compared to a note after maturity that has been stolen or lost or taken up by a bankrupt who has no authority to take up a note. The transferee has no greater right than the thief, the finder, or the bankrupt. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

They having no right, the last holder has none.

Here Maloney had no right to this note. He could transfer none to Thiel.

Very much the same principle was laid down in Weil v. Enterprise Ginney & Mfg. Co. 42 La. Ann. 492, 7 So. 622, and decisions cited therein.

It may be said further, as relates to the interest indorsed on the note, that he had no authority to receive interest and cut off the equities by attempting to grant time. His only authority was to pay the note. State ex rel. Legier v. Sutherland, 111 La. 382, 35 So. 608.

The principle that one must suffer the loss who places it in the power of the wrongdoer to commit a wrong has no application. We are governed by the strict rule of the commercial law adopted in the interest of commerce. Neither the maker nor the original payee, Butker, can be held. The latter could instruct the banker to receive the amount without indorsing or marking the note paid. The fraud committed afterward does not render him liable for a return of the amount he received.

There is no question of bad faith on the part of anyone, plaintiff or defendants. If a person were to act in bad faith and render it possible to commit a wrong on a third person, then the rule would have application. But where a person in good faith places an amount in the hands of an attorney for a particular purpose, and the attorney goes entirely beyond the scope of his authority, and commits a fraud by taking up a note and reissuing it without authority, for which he had paid with the money he held to pay the note, this maker cannot be held as one bound for the payment of the dishonored paper. The attorney's authority was to pay the note. He had money in his hand for that purpose. He could not give it vitality by appropriating it after maturity. The loss falls upon the one who chose to trust him by accepting the past-due note from him.

It was plaintiff's misfortune to have taken the word of Maloney after maturity, even to the extent of accepting his guaranty of the paper in order, it does appear, to provide against any possible defect in the title to the property on which the mortgage rested which secured the note.

The hardship is not one which we can remedy without disregarding one of the plain principles of the commercial law.

For reasons assigned the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied February 14, 1910.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

MATILDA VON ELLERT SISTARE, Plff.
in Err.,
v.

HORACE RANDALL SISTARE.

(218 U. S. 1, 54 L. ed. 905, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682.)

Foreign judgment — alimony — full faith and credit.

1. A decree for the future payment of alimony is, as to instalments past due and unpaid, within the protection of the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, provided that no modification of the decree was made prior to the maturity of such instalments, unless, by the law of the state in which the decree was rendered, its enforcement is so completely within the discretion of the courts of that state that they may annul or modify the decree, even as to overdue and unsatisfied instalments. Same — deprivation of protection — annulment.

2. Decrees of the New York courts for the future payment of alimony are not subject to annulment or modification by those courts as to overdue and unsatisfied instalments, so as to deprive such decrees of the protection, as to past-due and unpaid instalments, of the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution.

Judgment — full faith and credit — varied modes of enforcement — effect.

3. A judgment enforceable in the state where rendered must be given effect in another state, under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, although the modes of procedure to enforce its collection may not be the same in both states.

(May 31, 1910.)

Note. — Action to recover instalments of alimony accruing under a decree rendered in another state.

The earlier cases on this subject are discussed in the notes to Benton's Succession, 50 L.R.A. 178, and Israel v. Israel, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168.

While the principle laid down in Lynde v. Lynde, 181 U. S. 187, 45 L. ed. 814, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555, that a judgment for future alimony or maintenance which, either by its own terms or by the law of the state in which it is rendered, is subject to modification as to amount by the court rendering it, is not, even as to instalments which have accrued before the bringing of an action in another state to enforce the same, a final judgment within the "full faith and credit" provision of the Federal Constitution, is not impaired by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in SISTARE v. SISTARE, yet that case does give additional emphasis to the point that, to bring a case within the principle of the Lynde Case, it must appear that the power of modification possessed by the court which rendered the original decree extends to instalments of alimony that have already accrued, as well as instalments not yet due.

The practical importance of this point is apparent from the fact that, upon the supposed authority of the Lynde Case, the right to maintain an action in another state, to enforce instalments for alimony that had accrued under New York decrees, was denied by the supreme court of errors of Connecticut in Sistare v. Sistare, 80 Conn. 1, 125 Am. St. Rep. 102, 66 Atl. 772 (the case reversed by the United States Supreme Court in the foregoing opinion); and by the United States circuit court of appeals of the third circuit in Israel v. Israel, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168, 79 C. C. A. 32, 148 Fed. 576, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 697, and the Federal circuit court for the district of New Jersey in Valiquet v. Valiquet, 177 Fed. 994. Presumably the conclusion 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) of the United States Supreme Court in the SISTARE CASE, as to the law of New York on the subject of modification, was based on the same showing in that respect as the contrary conclusion of the Connecticut court on that point. The evidence or showing as to the New York law before the Israel Case does not appear. The opinion merely states that it appears that under the New York statute the judgment or decree, so far as it directed the payment of alimony and maintenance not then accrued or payable, could "at any time thereafter" be annulled, varied, or modified by the court rendering it. The court in the Valiquet Case apparently did not consider independently the extent of the power of the New York court to modify, but followed the ruling in the Israel Case on that point. Probably, the finding or conclusion in the latter case, that under the New York law the decree was subject to modification at any time by the court which rendered it, was an unconsidered inference drawn from the conceded power of that court to modify, without especially considering the question whether that power might be exercised after as well as before the maturity of the instalments. In this connection, however, it may be observed that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the SISTARE CASE is not necessarily conclusive in all other cases in which an action may be brought in other states to enforce instalments of alimony that have accrued under a New York decree, since, in the absence of a statute of the forum to the contrary, the question as to the law of another state is a matter of proof in the case, and it is conceivable, at least, that in another case the defendant might be able to introduce judicial decisions in New York which would establish, contrary to the finding of the United States Supreme Court in the SISTARE CASE, that the power to modify survived the maturity of the instalments of alimony. Of course, if the New York court of appeals should at any time so decide, that decision, if proven ERROR to the Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Superior Court for New London County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover certain instalments of alimony alleged to be due under a decree of the Supreme Court of New York. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert Goeller and Benjamin Slade, for plaintiff in error:

Alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is.

Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226; Howard v. Howard, 15 Mass. 196;

in the other state, would bring the case within the principle of the Lynde Case, and take it out of the operation of the decision in the SISTARE CASE.

In a recent case in Illinois (Britton v. Chamberlain, 234 Ill. 246, 84 N. E. 895), the court, without discussing the point except to recognize the existence of a conflict, held, on the authority of Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761, that an action would lie in Illinois to recover instalments that had accrued under a decree for alimony rendered in New York. This result is in accord with the conclusion reached in the SISTARE CASE, but there was no distinct finding in the Britton Case as to the right of the New York courts to modify the instalments of alimony already accrued.

In Hunt v. Monroe, 32 Utah, 428, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249, 91 Pac. 269, holding that an action could not be maintained in Utah upon an accrued instalment of alimony under a decree of divorce rendered in Colorado, the decision, so far as the law of Colorado on the subject of modification was concerned, rested upon a presumption that it was the same as the law of Utah on that point, which was apparently assumed to permit modification after as well as before the maturity of the instalments.

In Van Horn v. Van Horn, 48 Wash. 388, 125 Am. St. Rep. 940, 93 Pac. 670, holding that an action would not lie in Washington to enforce a decree for temporary alimony and suit money rendered in California, even though such decree is held in California a final decree from which an appeal will lie, the court said that the California supreme court had not, to its knowledge, held that such an order is not subject to change and modification in the discretion of the court in which it is made.

The syllabus by the court in Cureton v. Cureton, 132 Ga. 745, 65 S. E. 65, is that "a decree for alimony of a sister state, providing for future monthly payments, which by its own terms is subject to be revoked or modified, as to the amount to be paid thereunder, by the court rendering such decree, is not such a decree as is enforceable 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Clark v. Clark, 6 Watts & S. 85; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 2 Dane, Abr. 310; Knapp v. Knapp, 59 Fed. 641; Trowbridge v. Spinning, 23 Wash. 48, 54 L.R.A. 204, 83 Am. St. Rep. 806, 62 Pac. 125; Arrington v. Arrington, 127 N. C. 190, 52 L.R.A. 201, 80 Am. St. Rep. 791, 37 S. E. 212.

The court's power to modify a decree in respect to alimony does not destroy its finality.

Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761.

In the absence of a modification, the courts of Connecticut should be required to give to that decree the same binding force and effect that it has in the state of New York.

Barber v. Barber, supra; Kunze v. Kunze, in this state, under the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States or upon principles of comity." And the court cites to this proposition the Lynde Case and the Israel Case. The facts as set forth in the opinion, however, would seem to call only for a decision that the court of Georgia should not render judgment for instalments to accrue subsequently,—i. e., subsequently to the time of the Georgia judgment. The trial judge in the Georgia case directed the jury to find a verdict for $720, the amount due on the judgment in Tennessee up to "this" date (evidently referring to the date of the trial of the Georgia case), but refused to direct that the party against whom the Tennessee decree was rendered was bound by so much of that judgment as provided for future payments of $40 per month. The assignment of error was to this refusal, and no question seems to have been made as to the right to a verdict for the instalments that had accrued at date of the trial of the Georgia case. Apparently the effort of the wife in the Georgia case was to obtain in Georgia a judgment which should provide for the monthly payments subsequently to accrue, so as to avoid the necessity of further resort to the courts of Georgia from time to time as instalments should accrue under the Tennessee decree. Obviously the principle of the Lynde and the Israel Cases would apply a fortiori to prevent such an attempt. It would seem, however, that there would have been a grave question whether the principle of these cases, if invoked, would not have rendered erroneous the direction of the trial judge in the Georgia case, allowing the instalments that had accrued up to the time of the trial in that action, it being conceded that, by the terms of the Tennessee decree, the payments were to continue, within the discretion of the chancellor, only until a reconciliation should be effected.

In Bleuer v. Bleuer (Okla.) 110 Pac. 736, holding that an action would not lie in Oklahoma to recover instalments of alimony which had accrued under an order made in a divorce action in Illinois, it is 94 Wis. 54, 59 Am. St. Rep. 857, 68 N. W. 391; Trowbridge v. Spinning, supra; Dobson v. Pearce, 12 N. Y. 156, 62 Am. Dec. 152; Fletcher v. Ferrel, 9 Dana, 372, 35 Am. Dec. 143; Cheever v. Willson, 9 Wall. 108, 19 L. ed. 604; Shields v. Thomas, 18 How. 253, 15 L. ed. 368; Youngs v. Carter, 10 Hun, 194.

The judgment of a state court, if that court had jurisdiction to render it, is entitled to the same full faith and credit in the courts of another state that it has in the state where rendered, as a valid domestic judgment.

Harris v. Balk, 198 U. S. 215, 49 L. ed. 1023, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1084.

An action at law will lie in a Federal court upon a decree of divorce rendered by a state court of equity, to recover the alimony accrued at the time of the filing of the complaint.

Knapp v. Knapp, supra; McCracken v. Swartz, 5 Or. 63; Dubois v. Dubois, 6 Cow. 494; Allen v. Allen, 100 Mass. 374; Hansford v. Van Auker, 79 Ind. 302.

The judgment of a sister state is conclusive on the merits for the purpose of pleading and evidence, and is entitled to the full dignity of a record, and the defendant cannot, when sued on a judgment, deny the notice which it recites, or the obligation which it establishes, or impeach its justice.

Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411.

merely stated that no final judgment had been entered in the Illinois court making the claim sued for final, as the statute pleaded in plaintiff's petition provides that the court may, on application from time to time, make such alterations in the allowance of alimony as shall appear reasonable and proper. Apparently, if the court had the point in mind at all, it assumed that the power to modify extended to instalments already accrued as well as those still to accrue.

In Rogers v. Rogers (Ind. App.) 89 N. E. 901, it was held that an Ohio decree for alimony, payable in instalments, was entitled to full faith and credit under the Federal Constitution, and that an action would lie thereon in Indiana to recover instalments already accrued. The Ohio decree did not expressly reserve the right of modification, and the Indiana court did not expressly find what the state of the Ohio law on this subject was. From the remark in the opinion, however, that if the defendant wanted the judgment modified, he had his remedy by petitioning the court that rendered it to hear and determine the matter, and that, if modified in any manner, he could set up the modification by way of defense, it may be inferred that the court assumed that there was a right of modification under the Ohio law, at least as to instalments that had not already accrued. The court relied on Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226, and seems to have recognized that the Lynde Case was an authority to the contrary. In denying a petition for rehearing in this case (Rogers v. Rogers [Ind. App.] 92 N. E. 664), the court referred to the SISTARE CASE, decided in the supreme court after the original hearing, as additional support for its decision.

In Mayer v. Mayer, 154 Mich. 386, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 245; 129 Am. St. Rep. 477, 117 N. W. 890, the decision that the court of Michigan would entertain an action for instalments of alimony already accrued under a decree rendered in Oklahoma rested upon the ground that neither by the decree itself nor by statute in Oklahoma was the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

power reserved to modify the decree in that respect. The court, however, refused to entertain the action so far as it sought to enforce a provision directing payments in instalments for the support of the children, it appearing that the Oklahoma statute expressly provides that such a provision may be changed whenever circumstances render a change proper. This decision, under the principles laid down in the United States Supreme Court, was doubtless correct as to both points, unless it may be that there was error in finding that the power to modify the decree in respect of support of the children applied to instalments already accrued as well as those to accrue in the future. Apparently that finding was based on the terms of the statute itself.

In Patton v. Patton, 123 N. Y. Supp. 329, a demurrer to a complaint in an action to recover accrued instalments of alimony under a decree rendered in the District of Columbia was overruled, the decree being absolute in form, and no reference being made in the complaint to any law of the District of Columbia relative to the power of the court to modify a decree of that character. The court said that, in the absence of proof of the law of the District, there was no presumption that there was a statute in force there similar to the New York statute, and that the jurisdiction of the courts of New York over the subject of divorce was derived exclusively from statute, and therefore the presumption as to the common law did not aid the demurrer.

The case of Freund v. Freund, 71 N. J. Eq. 524, 63 Atl. 756 (cited in the note in 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1108), was affirmed with out opinion in 72 N. J. Eq. 943, 73 Atl. 1117.

Assuming that, under the law of the state in which the decree for alimony was rendered, it is subject to modification after as well as before the maturity of the instalments, yet, if the court which rendered the decree, acting within its jurisdiction and upon application duly made, determines the amount due at a particular time under instalments already accrued, and fixes that amount beyond further modification, the decree as to that amount may be enforced by action in another state. This is implied in the following statement of the general rule made in Hunt v. Monroe, supra: "But the fact that a sum is not specifically fixed as due from one to the other of the parties to the original suit, and certain sums are to become due in the future and payable in instalments or otherwise, does defeat the right of action, unless the amount due is ascertained and fixed by some appropriate proceeding before the action on the judgment or order or decree is commenced."

The case of De Vall v. De Vall (Or.) 109 Pac. 755, seems to fall within the limitation or distinction just suggested. The Wisconsin decree there involved expressly provided that it was not absolute as to the amount to be paid, but, after the accrual of the instalments for which the Oregon action was brought, it appeared that the Wisconsin court, upon application, had determined the amount due thereon, and had directed that the plaintiff have execution therefor. In this situation the Oregon court, having found that this action by the Wisconsin court was within its jurisdiction, held that the action would lie in Oregon.

The question here considered presupposes, of course, that the original decree was within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it, and that there was no objection to its enforcement in other states, except that it was subject to modification. The effort to enforce a decree for alimony rendered in another state sometimes fails because the decree was rendered on constructive service, and on that account was not 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

within the jurisdiction of the court. See, on this point, note in 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 593. The question as to equitable jurisdiction to enforce a decree for alimony is considered in the note in 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1071.

It is apparent from what has already been said that it may become important in this connection to determine the necessity of proving the law of the state in which the decree was rendered, or to ascertain the presumption to be indulged or course to be pursued in the absence of such proof. This general subject is treated in a note to Cherry v. Sprague, 67 L.R.A. 33. It is sufficient, for the purposes of this note, to say that in general, and in the absence of a statute of the forum to the contrary, the courts of one state will not take judicial notice of the law of another whether embodied in statutes or judicial decisions, and that the Federal Supreme Court, upon writ of error to a state court involving the "full faith and credit" provision of the Federal Constitution, will not take judicial cognizance of the law of another state, unless the court from which the case comes takes cognizance thereof. The question whether, in the absence of proper proof of the law of the other state, the presumption is to be indulged that it is the common law or that it is the same as the law of the forum, even though the latter is statutory, is involved in great conflict. As pointed out in the note referred to, some of the cases, without indulging either presumption, apply the substantive law of the forum, upon the ground that it is the only law before the court.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

court of the state of New York, the plaintiff in error was granted a separation from bed and board from her husband, the defendant in error, and he was ordered to pay her weekly the sum of $22.50 for the support of herself and the maintenance and education of a minor child. The judgment, omitting title, is copied in the margin.†

In July, 1904, at which time none of the instalments of alimony had been paid, the wife commenced this action in the superior court of New London county, Connecticut, to recover the amount then in arrears of the decreed alimony. The cause was put at issue and was heard by the court. As stated by the trial judge, in a "finding" by him made: "The defendant made the following

And it is further

Ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the sole care, custody, control, and education of said minor child, Horace Von Ellert Sistare, is hereby awarded to the plaintiff, and the defendant, upon complying fully with each and all of the directions of the decree herein, and not otherwise, and during his good behavior, shall, until the further order of this court, be permitted to see said child for the space of two hours, between the hours of 10 and 12 o'clock in the forenoon on Wednesdays and Saturdays, excepting Wednesdays and Saturdays during the months of July, August, and September of each year. And it is further Ordered, adjudged and decreed that costs are hereby awarded to the plaintiff against the defendant, taxed at the sum of one hundred and seventeen and 67-100 dollars ($117.67), and that the plaintiff do recover said costs from the defendant and have execution therefor. And it is further claims of law as to the judgment to be rendered in this action:

"(a) That the judgment rendered by the supreme court of the state of New York, in requiring the future payment of $22.50 per week, did not constitute a final judgment for a fixed sum of money, which is enforceable and collectable in this action.

"(b) That said judgment, being subject to modification by the court which granted it, is not a judgment which the courts of this state will enforce.

"(c) That the requirement that said sums of money should be paid as aforesaid does not constitute a debt or obligation from the defendant to the plaintiff which can be enforced in this action.

"(d) That said judgment requiring the said weekly payments cannot be enforced in any other way than according to the procedure prescribed in the statutes of the state of New York, and cannot be enforced in this action.

"(e) That the judgment which is sought to be enforced in this action is not a final judgment, entitled to full faith and credit in this state by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

"(f) That the judgment which is sought to be enforced in this action will not be enforced by the courts of this state through comity.

"(g) That the facts will not support a judgment for the plaintiff."

The court, however, adjudged in favor of the plaintiff, and awarded her the sum of $5,805, the arrears of alimony at the commencement of the action.

On appeal, the supreme court of errors (80 Conn. 1, 125 Am. St. Rep. 102, 66 Atl. 772) reversed the judgment and remanded the cause "for the rendition of judgment in favor of the defendant;" and such a judgment, the record discloses, was subsequently entered by the trial court. This writ of error was prosecuted.

The supreme court of errors of Connecticut reached the conclusion that the power conferred upon a New York court to modify a decree for alimony by it rendered extended to overdue and unsatisfied instalments as well as those to accrue in the future; that hence decrees for future alimony, even as to instalments after they had become past due, did not constitute debts of record, and were not subject to be collected by execution, but could only be enforced by the special remedies provided in the law, and were not susceptible of being made the basis of judgments in the state of New York in another court than the one in which the decree for alimony had been made. Guided by the interpretation thus given to the New York law, and the character of the decree for future alimony which was based thereon; it was decided that the New York judgment for alimony which was sought to be enforced, even although the instalments sued for were all past due, was not a final judgment, which it was the duty of the courts of Connecticut to enforce in and by virtue of the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States. While the ruling of the court was, of course, primarily based upon the interpretation of the New York law, the ultimate ruling as to the inapplicability of the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution was expressly rested upon the decision of this court in Lynde v. Lynde, 181 U. S. 187, 45 L. ed. 814, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555.

To sustain her contention that the action of the court below was in conflict with the duty imposed upon it by the full faith and credit clause, the plaintiff in error, by her assignments, in effect challenges the correctness of all the propositions upon which the court below rested its action, and virtually the defendant in error takes issue in argument as to these contentions. In disposing of the controversy, however, we shall not follow the sequence of the various assignments of error, or consider all the forms of statement in which the contentions of the parties are pressed in argument, but come at once to two fundamental questions which, being determined, will dispose of all the issues in the case. Those inquiries are: 1st. Where a court of one state has decreed the future payment of alimony, and when an instalment or instalments of the alimony so decreed have become due and payable and are unpaid, is such a judgment as to accrued and past-due alimony ordinarily embraced within the scope of the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States so as to impose the constitutional duty upon the court of another state to give effect to such judgment? 2d. If, as a general rule, the full faith and credit clause does apply to such judgments, is the particular judgment under review exceptionally taken out of that rule by virtue of the nature and character of the judgment, as determined by the law of the state of New York, in and by virtue of which it was rendered? We shall separately consider the questions.

First. The application, as a general rule, of the full faith and credit clause to judgments for alimony as to past-due instalments.

An extended analysis of the principles involved in the solution of this proposition is not called for, since substantially the contentions of the parties are based upon their divergent conceptions of two prior decisions of this court (Barber v. Barber, 21

How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226, and Lynde v. Lynde, supra), and an analysis of those cases will therefore suffice. For the plaintiff in error it is insisted that the case of Barber v. Barber conclusively determines that past-due instalments of a judgment for future alimony, rendered in one state, are within the protection of the full faith and credit clause, while the defendant in error urges that the contrary is established by the ruling in Lynde v. Lynde, and that if the Barber Case has the meaning attributed to it by the plaintiff in error, that case must be considered as having been overruled by Lynde v. Lynde.

Substantially the controversy in Barber v. Barber was this: In the year 1847, the court of chancery of New York granted Huldah B. Barber a separation from Hiram Barber, and directed the payment of alimony in quarterly instalments. Although the separation was decreed to be forever, the power to modify was reserved by a provision that the parties might at any time thereafter, by their joint petition, apply to the court to have the decree modified or discharged. It was provided that unpaid instalments of alimony should bear interest, "and that execution might issue therefor toties quoties." The husband failed to pay any of the alimony, and removed to Wisconsin, where he procured an absolute divorce. Subsequently an action was brought by Mrs. Barber upon the common-law side of the district court of the United States in the territory of Wisconsin, to recover the arrears of alimony, but relief was denied "for the reason that the remedy for the recovery of alimony was in a court of chancery, and not at law." A suit in equity to recover the overdue alimony was then commenced by Mrs. Barber, Wisconsin having been admitted into the Union, in the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin. Among other things, it was urged in a demurrer by the respondent, as a reason why the relief should be denied, "that the relief sought could only be had in the court of chancery for the state of New York, and that it did not appear that the complainants had exhausted the remedy which they had in New York." The proceedings culminated in a decree in favor of the complainant for the amount of alimony in arrears at the commencement of the suit, and the case was then brought to this court and the questions arising were disposed of in a careful and elaborate opinion. The decree was affirmed. In the course of the opinion it was declared, among other things, that courts of equity possessed jurisdiction to interfere to prevent the decree of the court of another state from being defeated by fraud, and reference was made to English decisions asserting the power of chancery to compel the payment of overdue alimony. Considering the nature and character of a decree of separation and for alimony, and the operation and effect upon such a decree as to past-due instalments of the full faith and credit clause, it was said (p. 591):

"The parties to a cause for a divorce and for alimony are as much bound by a decree for both, which has been given by one of our state courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and over the parties, as the same parties would be if the decree had been given in the ecclesiastical courts of England. The decree in both is a judgment of record, and will be received as such by other courts. And such a judgment or decree, rendered in any state of the United States, the court having jurisdiction, will be carried into judgment in any other state, to have there the same binding force that it has in the state in which it was originally given."

And, again, determining the effect of a decree for future alimony, the court expressly declared (p. 595): "Alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is." And it is, we think, clear from the context of the opinion, that the court held that the decree in favor of Mrs. Barber operated to cause an indebtedness to arise in her favor as each instalment of alimony fell due, and that a power to modify, if exerted, could only operate prospectively.

The facts in Lynde v. Lynde which are pertinent to this controversy are these: A decree of the court of chancery of New Jersey in favor of Mrs. Lynde was rendered in 1897 for the sum of $7,840, as alimony due at the date of the decree, with $1,000 for counsel fees, and payment was directed to be made of $80 weekly from the date of the decree. An action on this New Jersey decree was brought in May, 1898, in the supreme court of New York, and recovery was allowed by the trial court for the alimony due at the date of the New Jersey decree, with interest, counsel fee, and costs, and for an additional amount representing future alimony, which had accrued from the date of the decree to the commencement of the action in New York. The judgment also directed the payment of future alimony as fixed by the New Jersey decree, and awarded certain remedies for the enforcement of the decree in accordance with the relief which had been awarded in the New Jersey decree, in conformity to the law of that state. The judgment thus rendered by the trial court in New York was ultimately modified by the court of appeals of

New York by allowing the recovery only of the alimony which had been fixed in the New Jersey decree as due at its date, with interest and the counsel fee, and disallowing recovery of the instalments of future alimony which had accrued when the action was commenced in New York, as well as the allowance in respect to alimony thereafter to accrue. In this court three questions were presented: 1. Whether the decree of the New Jersey court was wanting in due process because of the absence of notice to the defendant; 2, whether the duty to enforce the decree for alimony was imposed upon the courts of New York by the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution; and, 3, upon the hypothesis that the full faith and credit clause was applicable, whether that clause required that the remedies afforded by the laws of New Jersey should be made available in the state of New York. Deciding that the New Jersey decree was not wanting in due process, the court came to consider the second and third questions, and held that in so far as the New Jersey decree related to alimony accrued at the time it was rendered and fixed by the decree and the counsel fee, it was entitled to be enforced in the courts of New York; but that, in so far as it related to future alimony, its enforcement was not commanded by the full faith and credit clause. No reference was made to the case of Barber v. Barber, the opinion briefly disposing of the issue as follows (p. 187): "The decree for the payment of $8,840 was for a fixed sum already due, and the judgment of the court below was properly restricted to that. The provision of the payment for alimony in the future was subject to the discretion of the court of chancery of New Jersey, which might at any time alter it, and was not a final judgment for a fixed sum." These sentences were followed by a brief adverse disposition of the claim that there was a right to avail, for the enforcement of the New Jersey decree in the courts of New York, of the remedies peculiar to the New Jersey law.

When these two cases are considered together we think there is no inevitable and necessary conflict between them, and, in any event, if there be, that Lynde v. Lynde must be restricted or qualified so as to cause it not to overrule the decision in the Barber Case. In the first place, in the Lynde Case no reference whatever was made to the prior decision, and it cannot be said that such decision was overlooked, because it was referred to in the opinion of the court below and was expressly cited and commented upon in the briefs of counsel submitted in the Lynde Case. In the second place, in view of the elaborate and careful nature of the opinion in Barber v. Barber, of the long period of time which had intervened between that decision and the decision in Lynde v. Lynde, and the fact which is made manifest by decisions of the courts of last resort of the several states that the rule laid down in the Barber Case had been accepted and acted upon by the courts of the states generally as a final and decisive exposition of the operation and scope of the full faith and credit clause, as applied to the subject with which the case dealt, it is not to be conceived that it was intended by the brief statement in the opinion in Lynde v. Lynde to announce a new and radical departure from the settled rule of constitutional construction which had prevailed for so long a time. And nothing in the mere language used in the Lynde Case would justify such a conclusion, because the reasoning expressed in that case was based solely and exclusively on the ground that the portions of the decree for alimony which were held to be not within the purview of the full faith and credit clause were not so embraced, because their enforcement "was subject to the discretion of the court of chancery of New Jersey, which might at any time alter it, . . ." In other words, the ruling was expressly based upon the latitude of discretion which the courts of New Jersey were assumed to possess over a decree for the payment of future alimony. But it is said although this be true, the decision in the Lynde Case must be here controlling and treated as overruling the Barber Case, since it will be found, upon examination of the New Jersey law which governed the New Jersey decree considered in the Lynde Case, that such law conferred no greater discretion upon the New Jersey court of chancery as to the enforcement of past-due instalments of future alimony than will be found to be possessed by the New York courts as to the decree here in question. But this is aside from the issue for decision, since the question here is not whether the doctrine expounded in the Lynde Case was there misapplied as a result of a misconception of the New Jersey law, but what was the doctrine which the case announced. And, answering that question, not only by the light of reason, but by the authoritative force of the ruling in the Barber Case, which had prevailed for so many years, and by the reasoning expressed in the Lynde Case, we think the conclusion is inevitable that the Lynde Case cannot be held to have overruled the Barber Case, and therefore that the two cases must be interpreted in harmony, one with the other, and that on so doing it results: First, that, generally speaking, where a decree is rendered for alimony and is made payable in future instalments, the right to such instalments becomes absolute and vested upon becoming due, and is therefore protected by the full faith and credit clause, provided no modification of the decree has been made prior to the maturity of the instalments, since, as declared in the Barber Case, "alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is." Second, that this general rule, however, does not obtain where, by the law of the state in which a judgment for future alimony is rendered, the right to demand and receive such future alimony is discretionary with the court which rendered the decree, to such an extent that no absolute or vested right attaches to receive the instalments ordered by the decree to be paid, even although no application to annul or modify the decree in respect to alimony had been made prior to the instalments becoming due.

It follows, therefore, from the statement which we have made of the case, that the New York judgment which was relied upon came within the general rule, and, therefore, that the action of the supreme court of errors of Connecticut in refusing to enforce it was in conflict with the full faith and credit clause, unless it be, as a result of the law of the state of New York, the judgment for future alimony in that state, even as to past-due instalments, was so completely within the discretion of the courts of that state as to bring it within the exceptional rule embodied in the second proposition. A consideration of this subject brings us to an investigation of the second question, which we have previously stated.

Second. The finality of the New York judgment as to past-due instalments for future alimony under the law of the state of New York.

The conception of the statute law of the state of New York and of the decisions of the courts of that state, interpreting that law, which led the supreme court of errors of Connecticut to conclude that the enforcement of the judgment before it was so completely subject to the discretion of the court which had rendered it as not to entitle it to enforcement in virtue of the full faith and credit clause, was thus stated in its opinion:

"The nature, operation, and effect, within the state of New York, of orders like that in question, directing payments in futuro to a wife by a husband living in judicial separation, and passed in 1899, pursuant to the then provisions of statute, have been well settled by the repeated decisions of the courts of that jurisdiction. They have been declared to be tentative provisions, which remain at all times within the control of the court issuing them, and subject at any time to modification or annulment. Tonjes v. Tonjes, 14 App. Div. 542, 43 N. Y. Supp. 941. The right of modification or annulment which is thus reserved to the court is one which extends to overdue and unsatisfied payments as well as to those which may accrue in the future. Sibley v. Sibley, 66 App. Div. 552, 73 N. Y. Supp. 244; Goodsell v. Goodsell, 94 App. Div. 443, 88 N. Y. Supp. 161; Kiralfy v. Kiralfy, 36 Misc. 407, 73 N. Y. Supp. 708; Wetmore v. Wetmore, 34 Misc. 640, 70 N. Y. Supp. 604. The amount awarded 'does not exist as a debt in favor of the wife against the husband, in the sense of indebtedness as generally understood.' Tonjes v. Tonjes, supra. The order is not one 'which simply directs the payment of a sum of money,' and not such an one as can have enforcement by execution. Weber v. Weber, 93 App. Div. 149, 152, 87 N. Y. Supp. 519. The special remedies provided in §§ 1772 and 1773 for the enforcement of the orders are exclusive. Weber v. Weber, supra; Branth v. Branth, 20 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 33, 13 N. Y. Supp. 300. No judgment in another court can be entered upon them. Branth v. Branth, supra."

But we are unable to assent to the view thus taken of the statute law of New York, or to concede the correctness of the effect attributed by the court to the New York decisions which were referred to.

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of New York, pertinent to be considered in determining the scope and effect of judgments for separation and alimony rendered by the courts of New York, are copied in the margin.†

In considering the meaning of these provisions, it must be borne in mind that the settled rule in New York is that the courts

Erkenbrach*, 96 N. Y. 456, 463; Livingston v. Livingston, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L.R.A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600, 66 N. E. 123.

Other than the provision in § 1767, authorizing the revocation of a judgment for separation upon the joint application of the parties, the power of the court to vary or modify a judgment for alimony, if it existed in 1899, was to be found in § 1771. It is certain that authority is there given to the courts of New York to modify or vary a decree for alimony by the following:

"The court may, by order, upon the application of either party to the action, after due notice to the other, to be given in such manner as the court shall prescribe, at any time after final judgment, vary or modify such directions. But no such application shall be made by a defendant unless leave to make the same shall have been previously granted by the court by order made upon or without notice, as the court, in its discretion, may deem proper, after presentation to the court of satisfactory proof that justice requires such an application should be entertained."

But it is equally certain that nothing in this language expressly gives power to revoke or modify an instalment of alimony which had accrued prior to the making of an application to vary or modify, and every reasonable implication must be resorted to against the existence of such power, in the absence of clear language manifesting an intention to confer it. The implication, however, which arises from the failure to expressly confer authority to retroactively modify an allowance of alimony is fortified by the provisions which are expressed. Thus, the methods of enforcing payment of the future alimony awarded, provided by the statute, all contemplate the collection and paying over as a matter of right of the instalments as they accrue, as long as the judgment remains unmodified, or, at least, until application has been made or permission to make one in pursuance to the statute has been accorded. And the force of this suggestion is accentuated when it is considered that it was not unusual in New York to resort to executions as upon a judgment at law to enforce the collection of unpaid instalments of alimony. Wetmore v. Wetmore, 149 N. Y. 520, 527, 33 L.R.A. 708, 52 Am. St. Rep. 752, 44 N. E.

action may be maintained in either of the following cases:

1. Where both parties are residents of the state when the action is commenced.
2. Where the parties were married within the state and the plaintiff is a resident thereof when the action is commenced.
3. Where the parties, having been married without the state, have become residents of the state, and have continued to be residents thereof at least one year, and the plaintiff is such a resident when the action is commenced.

Sec. 1768. Support, maintenance, etc., of wife and children.—Where the action is brought by the wife, the court may, in the final judgment of separation, give such directions as the nature and circumstances of the case require. In particular, it may compel the defendant to provide suitably for the education and maintenance of the children of the marriage, and for the support of the plaintiff, as justice requires, having regard to the circumstances of the respective parties, and the court may, in such an action, render a judgment compelling the defendant to make the provision specified in this section, where, under the circumstances of the case, such a judgment is proper, without rendering a judgment of separation.

Sec. 1767. Judgment for separation may be revoked.—Upon the joint application of the parties, accompanied with satisfactory evidence of their reconciliation a judgment for a separation forever, or for a limited period, rendered as prescribed in this article, may be revoked at any time by the court which rendered it, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the court thinks fit to impose.

Sec. 1769. Alimony, expenses of action, and costs; how awarded.—Where an action is brought, as prescribed in either of the last two articles, the court may, in its discretion, during the pendency thereof, from time to time, make and modify an order or orders requiring the husband to pay any sum or sums of money necessary to enable the wife to carry on or defend the action, or to provide suitably for the education and maintenance of the children of the marriage, or for the support of the wife, having regard to the circumstances of the respective parties. The final judgment in such an action may award costs in favor of or against either party, and an execution may be issued for the collection thereof, as in an ordinary case; or the court may, in the judgment or by an order made at any time, direct the costs to be paid out of any property sequestered or otherwise in the power of the court.

Sec. 1771. Custody and maintenance of children and support of plaintiff.—Where an action is brought by either husband or wife, as prescribed in either of the last two articles, the court must, except as otherwise expressly prescribed in those articles, give, either in the final judgment or by one or more orders made from time to time before final judgment, such directions as justice

169. Indeed, as in principle, if it be that the power to vary or modify operates retroactively and may affect past-due instalments so as to relieve of the obligation to pay such instalments, it would follow, in the nature of things, that the power would exist to increase the amount allowed, it is additionally impossible to imply such authority in the absence of provisions plainly compelling to such conclusion. Beyond all this, when it is considered that no provision is found looking to the repayment by the wife of any instalments which had been collected from the husband, in the event of a retroactive reduction of the allowance, it would seem that no power to retroactively modify was intended.

A brief consideration of the state of the law of New York concerning the power to modify allowances for alimony prior to the enactment of the provisions as to modification in question, and the rulings of the court of last resort of New York on the subject of such power, we think will serve to further establish the impossibility, in reason, of supposing that the statutory provisions in question conferred the broad and absolute power of retroaction as to past-due instalments of alimony which the court below assumed to exist. Prior to 1894, the courts of New York did not possess the power to modify a judgment in the case either of an absolute divorce or of a judicial separation, except in respect to the custody, etc., of the children of the marriage. Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, 96 N. Y. 456. In the year 1894, the statute was amended to permit the court to vary or modify the provision for the support of the wife upon her application alone, on notice to the husband. Laws of 1894, chap. 728. Subsequently, § 1771, which, by the amendment of 1894, conferred power upon the application of the wife to vary or modify the allowance, was enlarged to read as it stood in 1899, when the action was brought in which the judgment in question was rendered; that is, so as to confer authority upon the court to vary or modify an allowance of alimony on the application of either party. Laws of 1895, chap. 891.

But in view of the well-settled doctrine prevailing in New York, that no power exists to modify a judgment for alimony, absolute in terms, unless conferred by statute, and the practice of treating the right to collect accrued instalments of alimony as vested and subject to be enforced by execution, and in view of the further fact that decrees for alimony in New York, where authority to modify was not expressly conferred by statute, or was not reserved in requires between the parties for the custody, care, education, and maintenance of any of the children of the marriage; and where the action is brought by the wife, for the support of the plaintiff. The court may, by order, upon the application of either party to the action, after due notice to the other, to be given in such manner as the court shall prescribe, at any time after final judgment, annul, vary, or modify such directions. But no such application shall be made by a defendant unless leave to make the same shall have been previously granted by the court by order made upon or without notice, as the court, in its discretion, may deem proper after presentation to the court of satisfactory proof that justice requires that such an application should be entertained.

Sec. 1772. Support, maintenance, etc., of wife and children. Sequestration.—Where a judgment rendered, or an order made, as prescribed in this article, or in either of the last two articles, requires a husband to provide for the education or maintenance of any of the children of a marriage, or for the support of his wife, the court may, in its discretion, also direct him to give reasonable security, in such a manner and within such a time as it thinks proper, for the payment from time to time of the sums of money required for that purpose. If he fails to give the security, or to make any payment required by the terms of such a judgment or order, whether he has or has not given security therefor, or to pay any sum of money which he is required to pay by an order, made as prescribed in § 1769 of this act, the court may cause his personal property, and the rents and profits of his real property, to be sequestered, and may appoint a receiver thereof. The rents and profits, and other property, so sequestered, may be, from time to time, applied, under the direction of the court, to the payment of any of the sums of money specified in this section, as justice requires.

Sec. 1773. Id.; when enforced by punishment for contempt.—Where the husband makes default in paying any sum of money specified in the last section, as required by the judgment or order directing the payment thereof, and it appears presumptively to the satisfaction of the court, that payment cannot be enforced by means of the proceedings prescribed in the last section, or by resorting to the security, if any, given as therein prescribed, the court may, in its discretion, make an order requiring the husband to show cause before it, at a time and place therein specified, why he should not be punished for his failure to make the payment; and thereupon proceedings must be taken to punish him, as prescribed in title third of chapter seventeenth of this act. Such an order to show cause may also be made, without any previous sequestration, or direction to give security, where the court is satisfied that they would be ineffectual.

the decree at the time of rendition, created vested rights not subject to either judicial or legislative control (Livingston v. Livingston, supra), we think it becomes quite clear that the mere enlargement of the power of the court so as to permit modification of the allowance for alimony upon the application of the husband did not confer the authority to change or set aside the rights of the wife in respect to instalments which were overdue at the time application was made by the husband to modify the decree. And although we have been referred to and can find no decision of the court of last resort of New York dealing with the subject, the view we have taken, as an original question, of the Code provision in question, accords with that of the first department of the appellate division of the supreme court of the state of New York, announced in a decision rendered in 1903. Goodsell v. Goodsell, 82 App. Div. 65, 81 N. Y. Supp. 806. Nor do we find that the New York decisions relied upon by the lower court, and cited by it to sustain its conclusion that "the right of modification or annulment which is thus reserved to the court is one which extends to overdue and unsatisfied payments as well as to those which may accrue in the future," have even a tendency to that effect. The cases cited and relied on are Sibley v. Sibley, 66 App. Div. 552, 73 N. Y. Supp. 244; Goodsell v. Goodsell, 94 App. Div. 443, 88 N. Y. Supp. 161; Kiralfy v. Kiralfy, 36 Misc. 407, 73 N. Y. Supp. 708; and Wetmore v. Wetmore, 34 Misc. 640, 70 N. Y. Supp. 604.

The Sibley Case was decided in 1901 by the appellate division of the supreme court of New York, first department. The case was not concerned with a decree for the payment of permanent alimony. It related to the failure, during the pendency of an action for separation, to comply with an order for the payment of temporary alimony and counsel fees. Whether such order was made ex parte or upon notice does not appear. Among other things, the appeal presented the question of the propriety of the denial of a motion to modify the order directing the payment of alimony and counsel fees by reducing the amount directed to be paid. The order appealed from was affirmed, without prejudice, however, to the right of the appellant "to renew his application when he returns to this state and subjects himself to the jurisdiction of the court." No intimation is given in the opinion as to whether the power to reduce the amount of alimony and counsel fees could be exerted so as to have a retroactive effect. The decision in the Goodsell Case was made in 1904 by the appellate division, first department, and concerned a denial at special term of a motion to punish the defendant for contempt in not paying the difference between certain payments, made as alimony by agreement between the parties, and the amount ordered to be paid in the final judgment awarding an absolute divorce. The appellate court declined to consider the question of whether the defendant was in contempt until a report had been made by the referee who had been appointed to determine the financial ability of the defendant to pay. There was no intimation as to the extent of the power to modify an allowance of alimony. A year prior, however, in the same litigation (82 App. Div. 65), the same court, as we have already stated, decided that the provisions of the New York Code giving power to modify an allowance of alimony could only have a prospective operation. It was said (p. 70):

"It may, we think, be given full force and effect by ascribing to the legislature the intention of authorizing the courts to vary or modify the allowance of alimony from the time of the adjudication that such variation or modification is proper, without making the same retroactive."

The Kiralfy Case was a decision of the New York special term, rendered in December, 1901. The matter acted upon was a motion to amend a final decree of divorce by reducing the amount of alimony to a sum not merely less than that awarded by the decree, but less than the sum which the defendant had been paying under agreement with his wife. The motion was granted, but it was clearly given a prospective operation only. Wetmore v. Wetmore was also decided in 1901 by the New York special term. What was held was merely that the court would not relieve the defendant, who had persistently evaded a decree of absolute divorce, in which there had been awarded future alimony for the support of the wife and children. There is no discussion as to the extent of the power to modify decrees of divorce in respect to alimony, and a modification of a decree as to the amount of alimony to be paid, which is referred to in the course of the proceedings, plainly had only a prospective operation.

Contenting ourselves in conclusion with saying that, as pointed out in Lynde v. Lynde, although mere modes of execution provided by the laws of a state in which a judgment is rendered are not, by operation of the full faith and credit clause, obligatory upon the courts of another state in which the judgment is sought to be enforced, nevertheless, if the judgment be an enforceable judgment in the state where rendered, the duty to give effect to it in another state clearly results from the full faith and credit clause, although the modes of procedure to enforce the collection may not be the same in both states.

It follows that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut must be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

And it is so ordered.

LORENZO E. McDONALD, Impleaded, etc.,
Plff. in Err.,

v.

E. E. KELSON.

(79 Kan. 105, 98 Pac. 772.)

Tax sale — possession — eviction — improvements — reimbursement.

A tax-deed holder in possession was defeated in an action of ejectment, and was given a lien for taxes. At the date of the judgment he did not live on the land, and had no claim for improvements. The landowner did not satisfy the judgment lien, and allowed the land to sell for taxes. The lien holder purchased at the tax sale and was given a tax-sale certificate. Without force, fraud, or collusion, he then moved on the land, took full possession, and made lasting and valuable improvements. Subsequently the landowner redeemed from the judgment and tax sale, and caused a writ of possession to issue in the ejectment suit. Held, the occupant of the land is entitled to an injunction against eviction until his claim for improvements is adjudicated and satisfied.

(December 12, 1908.)

ERROR to the District Court for Ness County to review a judgment granting a temporary injunction preventing plaintiff's eviction from certain lands. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John F. Wood, for plaintiff in error:

An action for recoupment on account of improvements to the amount of the rents and profits is the only remedy.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action of ejectment brought by Lorenzo E. McDonald against E. E. Kelson to recover the land in controversy, a tax deed under which Kelson claimed was set aside, and he was given a lien for taxes. The judgment to this effect was rendered in February, 1903. At that time Kelson was not living on the land, and made no claim for improvements. McDonald did not discharge the judgment lien for taxes, and allowed the land to sell at tax sale in September, 1904, for the taxes of 1903. Kelson purchased at this sale, and was given a treasurer's certificate of sale. He then moved on the land, made it his home, erected a dwelling house and other buildings, made other lasting and valuable improvements, and has resided there ever since. He paid the taxes for 1904 and 1905. In October, 1906, McDonald redeemed the land from the judgment and tax sale, and caused a writ of possession to be issued in the ejectment case. Kelson then brought suit for an injunction to prevent eviction until his claim for improvements is adjudicated and satisfied. The probate judge granted a restraining order, which the district court, after hearing a motion to dissolve, continued in force, and a demurrer to the petition was overruled. McDonald prosecutes error upon these rulings.

The petition is criticized for indefiniteness in certain particulars, but indefiniteness is not ground for demurrer if a cause of action be made to appear. Properly interpreted, the petition shows that the plaintiff, having the right of possession and possession in law under the judgment in the ejectment suit, rested upon his legal rights until he purchased the land at tax sale; but that, when he obtained his tax-sale certificate, he entered for the first time into full actual physical occupancy of the land, and that in the situation he then occupied he made the improvements for which he claims protection. Plainly his possession could not in any view be wrongful as against the defendant when the improvements were made, and the legal question presented is whether the holder of a tax-sale certificate, in quiet and rightful possession acquired and held under the circumstances stated, can be evicted under a judgment in ejectment rendered before the tax-sale certificate was issued, without receiving pay for lasting and valuable improvements made while holding possession under the certificate. The plaintiff was under no obligation to pay taxes because he remained in possession to secure the satisfaction of his judgment lien for taxes. The right to keep possession until reimbursed for such an outlay is burdened with no duty to expend more money to keep the land clear of new tax liens accruing from the land owner's subsequent defaults. Therefore the plaintiff could rightfully purchase at the tax sale. The occupying claimant's act is clear and positive, that no one in possession of lands held under a sale for taxes shall be evicted or thrown out of possession by anyone holding a better title, until he has been paid the full value of all lasting and valuable improvements made under such holding; and a person in possession holding a certificate of sale issued by the county treasurer upon a sale for taxes shall be considered as having sufficient title to demand the value of such improvements. Civ. Code, §§ 601, 602.

In the early case of Stebbins v. Guthrie, (1868) 4 Kan. 353, these sections were construed as follows: "One of the conditions pointed out in the first section is: Being in possession of, and holding any land under any sale for taxes authorized by the laws of the state, entitle the occupant to the benefit of the provisions of the statute, if his possession has been obtained without fraud or collusion. It will be seen that in this section it is only made necessary that the occupant holds under any sale for taxes; but lest it should be contended, as it was in this case, that no sale was perfected until the deed was made, thus leaving property unimproved and unproductive for two years, it is further provided in § 2, which is a legislative construction of § 1, that, if the claimant holds a certificate of sale of the lands from a collector of taxes or county treasurer, etc., he shall be deemed to have sufficient title to said land to demand the value of improvements made under provisions of the first section. Now, the plaintiffs in error had such certificate at the time they made the improvements for which they demand compensation, and that, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the obvious terms of the law, entitled them to its benefits." In another part of this opinion expressions were used indicating that a purchaser at a tax sale becomes the actual owner of the land sold, when he receives a tax-sale certificate. This misapprehension of the effect of a sale for taxes before a tax deed issues was corrected in Douglass v. Dickson, 31 Kan. 310, 315, 1 Pac. 541, but the language quoted above has been recognized as a correct statement of the law in numerous subsequent cases dealing with the question. When a tax sale occurs, the land itself is offered for sale, is bid for, and is sold. The certificate issued describes the land purchased, states the amount paid therefor, and the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed. This certificate may be assigned, and an assignment has the same force as an assignment of a bond for a conveyance. The certificate may be acknowledged by the treasurer, and, if acknowledged, it may be recorded as an instrument affecting title. Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 7641, 7643, 7648. The purchaser acquires more than a mere lien for the purchase money. He acquires a kind of title. Coonradt v. Myers, 31 Kan. 30, 2 Pac. 858. This title is too inchoate and incomplete to constitute the purchaser an owner. It will not support ejectment, and it is not strong enough to authorize an entry upon land in the actual possession of the owner. But, if the owner has no other possession than that which the law annexes as an incident to his ownership, and the holder of the tax-sale certificate can take full possession in fact without force and without fraud or collusion with anyone, he may do so. Should he do so, his possession is rightful to the extent that he may not be evicted until he is paid for his improvements. See Stebbins v. Guthrie, supra; Millbank v. Ostertag, 24 Kan. 462, 472; Coonradt v. Myers, 31 Kan. 30, 34, 2 Pac. 858.

Of course the adverse judgment in the ejectment action is binding upon the plaintiff, and concludes him in respect to the title and possession ineffectually defended in that action; but under many circumstances there may be a title and possession entirely distinct and wholly disconnected from that involved in the ejectment action, so that there is in fact no privity between the holder and the defeated ejectment defendant. In such cases the judgment extends no further than the title and possession which the parties were able to litigate; and, if a person claiming separate, paramount, and undetermined rights enter pending the ejectment action, a writ of possession may not be executed against him. Harrod v. Burke, 76 Kan. 909, 92 Pac. 1128, 123 Am. St. Rep. 179, and authorities there cited; Smith v. Pretty (Towle's Motion) 22 Wis. 655; Howard v. Kennedy, 4 Ala. 592, 39 Am. Dec. 307; Clark v. Parkinson, 10 Allen, 133, 136, 87 Am. Dec. 628; Irving v. Cunningham, 77 Cal. 52, 18 Pac. 878; Atkinson v. Dixon, 89 Mo. 464, 1 S. W. 13; Strabala v. Lewis, 80 Iowa, 510, 45 N. W. 871; Warvelle, Ejectment, § 511, p. 569. In Irving v. Cunningham, supra, the execution of a writ of possession against a stranger to the suit entering under a tax deed was enjoined.

The plaintiff claims just such a new independent and paramount right. If the defendant's default had continued long enough to allow the tax proceeding to ripen into a valid tax deed, all his rights would have been extinguished. When a landowner fails to discharge his duty to the state, he exposes himself to the penalty inflicted by the tax laws, which is the annihilation of his entire estate and the vesting of it in the tax purchaser. A tax sale will cut across titles and rights of possession established by judgment in ejectment as well as other kinds; and it makes no difference that the tax purchaser is also the defendant in ejectment, so long as he rests under no disability to take a tax deed. The occupying claimant's act is just as rigorous, but not so far reaching. The holder of a tax-sale certificate enjoying a possession which is not wrongful in any respect cannot be evicted until he is paid for his improvements.

The occupying claimant's act is based in part upon a wise public policy, which encourages the improvement of real estate. The interests of the state as a corporation needing revenue are advantaged, and the general welfare of the people is enhanced and promoted. In this case the plaintiff had no semblance of title after the judgment in ejectment, but only barren possession until his lien should be discharged. He could not improve the land except at the risk of loss, and, if the defendant chose not to redeem, it must have remained unimproved at least until the full period of redemption expired and a tax deed issued. Another consideration underlying the act is the inequity and injustice of forfeiting improvements made under a title which the law recognizes. In order to accomplish the purpose of the act, and to carry out the spirit in which it is framed, it must be liberally construed, and the conclusion must be that the facts stated in the petition entitle the plaintiff to an injunction notwithstanding the judgment in the ejectment suit.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS EX REL. JOHN S. DAWSON

v.

PARSONS STREET RAILWAY & ELECTRICAL COMPANY et al.

(81 Kan. 430, 105 Pac. 704.)

Street — subway — abutting owner — remedy.

1. If the public officers who are charged with the control of such matters authorize a subway for a car line in a public street, an owner of abutting property, the value of which is thereby diminished, cannot interfere to prevent its construction, however seriously he may be inconvenienced by it. In such case his only remedy, if any, is by an action for the consequential damages.

Street railway — power to enlarge franchise rights — delegation.

2. The legislature, having paramount authority over public streets, may authorize a street car company, which has by ordinance been granted a right to operate only a surface road, to construct a subway beneath the tracks of a railroad. And it may devolve the power to permit and to require this upon the board of railroad commissioners.

Same — subway under railroad track — authorization by railroad commission.

3. Under the statute (Laws 1907, chap. 267, p. 426, § 1; Gen. Stat. 1901, § 5974) giving the board of railroad commissioners power to determine whether there is a necessity for the crossing of a railroad track by a street car line, "and, if so, the place thereof, whether it shall be over or under the existing railroad, or at grade, and in other respects the manner of such crossing," the board can authorize the street

Headnotes by MASON, J.

Note. — Preventive remedy of nonconsenting abutting property owner where use of highway for street railway is authorized by public.

It is not intended to include in this note cases considering preventive remedies of abutting owner where the authority to lay street railway was not lawfully granted by the public; the question considered presupposes that the consent of the public was a valid consent.

Where a street railway is not an additional servitude, and its construction and operation in a public street is not inconsistent with the general and ordinary public highway purposes to which the street was originally dedicated, although injury may result therefrom for which damages may be recovered, yet such construction does not entitle an abutting landowner to injunctive or other relief to prevent same, at least, where the road is constructed and operated railway company to construct a subway in the street of a city beneath the tracks of a railroad company, in accordance with whatever regulations it may see fit to impose, so that they have relation to the safe operation of both roads and are not unreasonable.

Same — commissioners' plan — conclusiveness.

4. Unless the board acts arbitrarily or capriciously in such matters its determinations are conclusive.

Same — mandamus — necessary parties.

5. In a mandamus brought by the state to require a street railway company to construct a subway beneath the tracks of a railroad, the city is not a necessary party.

Same — subway under railroad track — construction — mandamus.

6. Where a street railway company is operating a continuous line across a city except for a break caused by a number of railroad tracks over which its passengers are transferred, the board of railroad commissioners may require it to construct a crossing below grade.

(December 11, 1909.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant Parsons Street Railway & Electrical Company to comply with an order of the board of railroad commissioners directing the construction of a subway for its car line under the tracks of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company. Awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John S. Dawson, for plaintiff:

The state board of railroad commissioners has jurisdiction of the matter of street railroad crossings over railroad rights of way.

In some jurisdictions no distinction has apparently been made as to the remedy of an abutting owner owning the fee of the street and one having only an easement therein, the fee being in the municipality in trust for street purposes; and the cases do not clearly show whether abutting owners seeking preventive relief owned the fee or whether it was in the municipality. In Haskell v. Denver Tramway Co. and Gray v. Dallas Terminal R. & Union Depot Co. and the Illinois cases cited, the fee of the street was in the public. In Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. the opinion shows that the fee of the street was in the abutting owners. The other cases, however, do not clearly indicate whether the fee was in the abutting owners or in the public.

It has been held that it is immaterial whether the fee of the street is in the abutting owner or in the municipality; that in either event a street railway is not an additional servitude, and the abutting owner is without a preventive remedy against such use of a street without reference to the ownership of the fee, his remedy being at law for damages. Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634, 48 N. W. 1007; Watson v. Fairmont & Suburban R. Co. 49 W. Va. 528, 39 S. E. 193. To the same effect are Spencer v. Point Pleasant & O. River R. Co. 23 W. Va. 406, and Arbenz v. Wheeling & H. R. Co. 33 W. Va. 1, 5 L.R.A. 371, 10 S. E. 14.

The question was directly raised in Gillette v. Chester & M. R. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. R. 450, and it was there held that an abutting owner who owned the fee of a street was not entitled to an injunction to restrain the construction therein of a street railway where it was being constructed under proper municipal authority. The court said that such use of a street was not a diversion of the use for which it was originally taken, and hence an abutting owner who owned the fee subject to the easement of the public had no right to additional compensation for such taking, and therefore was not entitled to injunctive relief against it.

While the Illinois cases have clearly denied the right of an abutting owner who did not own the fee of the street to injunctive relief against its use for street railway purposes, no case in that state has considered the question as to whether an abutting owner who owned the fee of the street was entitled to preventive relief against the construction therein of a street railway under proper municipal authority.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. supra, has been construed

The order of the railroad commissioners to construct a subway does not conflict with the franchise to construct a street railway at grade.

Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. South-west Pennsylvania R. Co. supra; Worcester v. Railroad Comrs. 113 Mass. 161; *Ottawa, O. C. & C. G. R. Co. v. As the jurisdiction of the railroad commissioners to regulate the manner of crossing the railroads is express, the power to issue the order to build a subway the declining grade of which may extend back a reasonable distance along the street is to be implied.

both ways upon this question. Some language used in that case would perhaps indicate the view of the court to be that an abutting owner was not entitled to preventive relief against the use of a street for a street railway under municipal authority, even though he was the owner of the fee to the center of the street. The decision of the court, however, was based upon a finding of fact that the railroad company, which claimed to be the owner of the fee of the street, subject to the public easement, was not such owner, but only had an easement therein; and the doctrine therein stated, denying the right of an abutting owner to preventive relief, expressly limits the rule to an abutting owner not owning the fee of the street. It is also worthy of note that the court in this case distinguishes between the remedies of an abutting owner who owns the fee of the street and an abutting owner who has only an easement in the street. This distinction would not have been necessary had the court taken the view that the ownership of the fee was immaterial as affecting the right of an abutting owner to preventive relief in this class of cases.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that an abutting landowner who owns the fee of the street to the center thereof is entitled to compensation for the construction of a street railway in a street abutting his property, and if such compensation is not made he is entitled to restrain the construction until compensated. This is the well-settled doctrine of New York state, wherein the rule prevails that a street railway is an additional servitude. Craig v. Rochester City & B. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 404; Washington Cemetery v. Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. 68 N. Y. 591; Paige v. Schenectady R. Co. 178 N. Y. 102, 70 N. E. 213; Spofford v. Southern Boulevard Co. 15 Daly, 162, 4 N. Y. See also Lange v. La Crosse & E. R. Co. 118 Wis. 558, 95 N. W. 952, which holds that an abutting owner who owns the fee to the center of the street, subject only to the public easement, has a right to compensation as a condition precedent to the placing of tracks for a street railway in front of his premises, even though the company has the permission of the proper municipal authorities; and hence he is entitled to enjoin the laying of the tracks until compensated for such use of the street.

Compare with La Crosse City R. Co. v. Higbee, 107 Wis. 389, 51 L.R.A. 923, 83 N. W. 701, which holds that a street railway is not an additional servitude, and hence an adjoining property owner who holds the fee to the center of the street has no right to interfere with the construction of such a railway therein, by cutting down supporting trolley wire poles, and will be enjoined from so doing.

An abutting lot owner owning to the center of the street is not entitled to an injunction to restrain the use of the opposite side of the street for a street railway, where such use is with the consent of the abutting owners on that side and also of the proper municipal authorities. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Inland Traction Co. 205 Pa. 579, 55 Atl. 774.

By the weight of authority the doctrine is settled that where, as a matter of fact or of law, the use of a street for street railway purposes constitutes an additional servitude, an abutting owner who owns the fee of the street is entitled to enjoin such use until compensated therefor.

On this subject in Hyland v. Short Route R. Transfer Co. 10 Ky. L. Rep. 900, 11 S. W. 79, the court said that an abutting lot owner, whether he owns the fee of the street subject to the public use or not, has a peculiar private right in it, which attaches to his lot and which the law will protect; and while he is entitled to the reasonable

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Parsons Street Railway & Electrical Company operates a street railway in the city of Parsons. It desired to cross the tracks of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company in a street of that city. It applied to the state board of railroad commissioners, which body, on October 9, 1909, upon due hearing, ordered it to construct for that purpose a subway under the tracks of the railroad, in accordance with certain plans covering all the details of the work, including the approaches. On October 15th a proceeding by mandamus was brought in this court in the name of the state on the relation of the attorney for the board of railroad commissioners to require the street railway company to comply with the order. The defendant answered expressing its willingness to do so if it has the necessary authority, but stating that the city ordinance under which it operates provides that its tracks shall be laid at the grade of the streets. Several owners of property abutting on the site of the approaches shown in the plan have intervened, and urge various reasons why a peremptory writ should not be allowed. The cause is submitted upon the pleadings.

use of it in all ordinary ways, yet he cannot complain of a mere inconvenience or decline in the value of his property, arising from the use of the street by the public in the way of improved modes of travel, but it is only when the use becomes destructive of the primary purpose, and he is deprived of its reasonable use for such purpose, that he will be heard. And added: "The construction of a railroad over a street is not per se an illegal invasion of his right. . . . Whether he can complain depends not upon the existence of the railroad, but the manner of its construction and operation. If he be thereby deprived of the reasonable use of the street, he may apply to the courts for relief; but if he be merely inconvenienced, or suffers some remote consequential injury, it is damnum absque injuria. . . . Relief by injunction should not be afforded in such a case unless the evidence clearly shows the existence of the right and its invasion, and that such a remedy is necessary to adequate relief."

A bill by abutting owners for an injunction to restrain the construction of a street railway, which shows that the company has the consent and authority of the municipality so to do, is not maintainable unless it is also shown by proper averments that the railway would be a nuisance in fact, and that complainants would suffer special injury different in kind from that sustained by the general public. Baker v. Selma Street & Suburban R. Co. 135 Ala. 552, 93 Am. St. Rep. 42, 33 So. 685.

In Dilley v. Wilkes-Barre & K. Pass. R. Co. 6 Kulp, 503, where the fee of the street was in a city, an injunction was denied an abutting property owner who did not allege that he would suffer irreparable damage from laying tracks for a street railway in a street abutting his property; the action of the street railway company being with the consent of the municipality.

The use of a street for interurban railway purposes is an additional burden on the fee, and hence abutting lot owners who own the fee of the street are entitled to enjoin the construction of such a railway in the street or its use for such a purpose. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. 167 Pa. 62, 27 L.R.A. 766, 46 Am. St. Rep. 659, 31 Atl. 468; Younkin v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 120 Wis. 477, 98 N. W. 215; Schuster v. Milwaukee Electric R. Light Co. 142 Wis. 578, 126 N. W. 26; Wilder v. Aurora, D. & R. Electric Traction Co. 216 Ill. 493, 75 N. E. 194.

So, where the municipality owns the fee of the street in trust for public uses, the use thereof for street cars, if within the scope of the trust, gives an abutting owner no right to compensation or injunctive re-

The power of the state over the public streets, whether exercised directly by the legislature, or through the city council or some other body, is absolute. La Harpe v. Elm Twp. Gaslight, Fuel & P. Co. 69 Kan. 97, 76 Pac. 448; Prince v. Crocker, 166 Mass. 347, 32 L.R.A. 610, 44 N. E. 446; 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 287; 15 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 626. If the public officers who are charged by the statute with control of the matter have authorized the subway in question, the owners of the abutting property have no standing to object to its construction on their own account, however much inconvenience and injury they may suffer from it. None of their property is actually taken, and the only remedy, if any, which the law affords them for merely consequential damages, is by an action for compensation. Ottawa, O. C. & C. G. R. Co. v. Larson, 40 Kan. 301, 2 L.R.A. 59, 19 Pac. 661; Leavenworth v. Douglass, 59 Kan. 416, 53 Pac. 123; 15 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 781. The rights of abutters under somewhat similar conditions are discussed in 1 Lewis on Eminent Domain, 3d ed. §§ 138, 174, 178, 191. Notwithstanding no relief can be given them in this proceeding, it is appropriate that the individuals whose interests are injuriously affected should be heard as friends of the court, especially as no objection to the work is urged from any other quarter. The city has not been made a party, and a majority of the council approve the proposed plans and prefer that it shall not lief unless his easement of light, air, or access to and from the street, is substantially interfered with. Oviatt v. Akron Street R. Co. 2 Ohio N. P. 84.

Where the construction of a railroad in the street of a municipality will work material injury to an abutting owner, such construction may be enjoined at the suit of the owner, until the right to construct same is acquired under proceedings against the owner as required by law for the appropriation of private property; and it is immaterial whether the fee of the street is in the city or in the abutting owner. Cincinnati & S. G. Ave. Street R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 524; Scioto Valley R. Co. v. Lawrence, 38 Ohio St. 41, 43 Am. Rep. 419; Root v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 7 Ohio N. P. 337.

The construction in a public street of a signal tower to be used in connection with a street railway system will be restrained at the suit of an abutting property owner; it not appearing that such tower could not be erected on private property. Williams v. Los Angeles R. Co. 150 Cal. 592, 89 Pac. 330.

Injunctive relief will be granted an abutting lot owner against the construction and operation of a street railway system in an alley adjoining his property, where the alley is so narrow that to operate the cars as intervene. Although the franchise granted by the city to the street car company only authorizes it to lay its tracks at grade, the legislature, as the paramount authority, can enlarge its power in this regard, and this may be done directly or through some other body. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 168, 178; 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 848; Wulf v. Kansas City, 77 Kan. 358, 373-375, 94 Pac. 207.

The force of the order of the board of railroad commissioners depends wholly upon the statute. In 1907 the jurisdiction of the board was extended to electric lines, which previously had not been under its control. Kansas City, O. B. & Electric R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 73 Kan. 168, 84 Pac. 755. The amended statute concludes with this provision: "This act shall not be construed to apply to electric street or street railway lines operating exclusively within any county, except as to the crossings of any railroad over any other railroad, as provided in § 5974, General Statutes of 1901." Laws 1907, chap. 267, p. 426, § 1. The section of the General Statutes referred to, so far as here important, reads as follows: "Any railroad company authorized to operate a railroad in this state, desiring to cross or unite its track with any other railroad upon the grounds of such other railway corporation, shall make application in writing to the board of railroad commissioners, stating the place of crossing or intersection; whereupon the provided in an ordinance permitting the use of the alley for such purpose would amount to a practical appropriation of all of the alley lying between its curbs, and would effectually prevent the passage of other vehicles over the alley, and deprive the abutting owners of the privilege of receiving and discharging freight and goods at the side doors of their buildings fronting on the alleyway. Watson v. Robberson Ave. R. Co. 69 Mo. App. 548.

To the same effect as to a steam railway in a narrow street is Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. 86, 24 L.R.A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, 26 S. W. 698.

It has been held that the legislature has not the power, and hence cannot delegate to a municipality power, to permit a street railway to lay an additional track in a public street in which there are already sufficient tracks to meet public needs; and that an owner of land abutting upon such street may enjoin the laying of additional tracks, even though the laying thereof is authorized by the municipality. The right to such relief is not affected by the fact that the municipality owns the fee of the street in trust for ordinary street purposes. Dooly Block v. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co. 9 Utah, 31, 24 L.R.A. 610, 33 Pac. 229.

A. G. S.

board of railroad commissioners shall fix a day for the hearing of such application, and notify the railway corporations interested, at which time, unless further time be granted by the board, the corporations interested shall be heard in regard to the necessity, place, manner and time of such crossing or connection; and upon such hearing either party, or the board, may call and examine witnesses in regard to the matter; and the board shall, after such hearing and a personal examination of the locality where a crossing or connection is desired, determine whether there is a necessity for such crossing or not, and, if so, the place thereof, whether it shall be over or under the existing railroad, or at grade, and in other respects the manner of such crossing and the terms upon which the same shall be made and maintained." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 5974. By the terms of the statute the board of railroad commissioners had power to determine that the crossing should be made at the place indicated, by means of a subway beneath the railroad tracks. But in addition to this it also had power to determine the "manner" of crossing, and we think this fairly implies the right to make any reasonable requirement having relation to the safe operation of both roads, that being a matter committed to its control. 33 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 296. For instance, the kind of support to be provided for the surface railroad, and the grade and consequent length of the approaches to the subway, are details clearly subject to regulation by the board. Consequently a proper function of the board is to decide upon a plan of the work, as has been done in this case, and its decision in the absence of exceptional circumstances must be final. Of course if its action had been arbitrary or capricious the courts could afford relief. And doubtless the city could insist upon compliance with any conditions it might see fit to impose consistent with the requirements of the board, for the purpose of minimizing any resulting damage and inconvenience.

The interveners complain of public and private inconvenience that will result from the carrying out of the present plans. The situation presents, however, merely a problem in engineering. The wisdom of a particular method of construction is for the determination of the railroad board. There is nothing in the record to suggest remotely any abuse of discretion. The court cannot presume to pass judgment upon the fitness of the plans adopted. The interveners also contend that the city should have been made a party to this proceeding and that in its absence there is a defect of parties. Technically in mandamus the only necessary parties are the plaintiff, who asserts the right to have an act done, and the defendant, upon whom the public duty rests to perform it. The practice is common and commendable to bring in other persons who are likely to be injuriously affected by the judgment, in order that they may have an opportunity to be heard in their own behalf, and in a proper case the court will suspend proceedings until this is done. Livingston v. McCarthy, 41 Kan. 20, 20 Pac. 478. But such procedure is for the protection of the persons so affected. Here no one authorized to speak for the city asks for a hearing in its behalf, a majority of the officers who, by acting together, could represent it, disclaim any desire for it to be heard, and it is not apparent that any injury will result to it by the decision. Under these circumstances there is neither a technical nor a practical defect of parties.

The further objection is made that the plan involves the exclusive use by the railway company, not only of the subway itself, but of that portion of the street taken up by the approaches. The most suitable arrangement to be made in this regard is a fair matter for the determination of the railroad board. The statute (Laws 1903, chap. 122, p. 189, § 58) giving the mayor and councilmen of cities of the first class authority to regulate public grounds contains a prohibition of any exclusive privilege for a railway in a street, but the restriction applies only to acts of the city officials, as it is a limitation of the power granted to them.

The final objection that is thought to require specific mention is that the writ ought not to issue because, granting that the street railway company must construct the kind of crossing prescribed by the board, or none at all, it is under no public duty to construct any, and therefore is not subject to mandamus in that regard. The allegations of the alternative writ show that the company is now operating a continuous line from one side of the city to the other, save for the break caused by the railroad tracks. This arrangement may be regarded as in effect an operation of the street railway across the railroad by means of a transfer, and it is competent for the railroad commissioners to order this method to be changed.

A peremptory writ will be awarded.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA, & SANTA FE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Kan. —, 109 Pac. 1005.)

Appeal — erroneous decision on former appeal — conclusiveness.

1. Ordinarily a question considered and determined on the first appeal of a case is deemed to be settled, and not open to re-examination on a second appeal, but it is not an inflexible rule, and if the prior decision is palpably erroneous, it is competent for the court to correct it on the second appeal.

Same — matter not considered on former appeal.

2. If the point, though involved in the record of a first appeal, is not brought to the attention of nor considered by the court, its decision then made does not preclude the consideration and determination of the point when presented on the second appeal.

Carrier — wrongful refusal to deliver goods — subsequent damage — liability.

3. A railway company transported goods to destination, and notified the owner to come and take them away. In response to the notice the owner promptly called at the freight depot, tendered the charges due thereon, and demanded the delivery of the goods, but the railway company refused the demand. One day thereafter an unprecedented flood occurred, which damaged the goods. Held that, by the refusal of the demand and the wrongful detention of the goods, the railway company held them at its own risk, and was responsible for the loss occasioned to them by the flood.

(July 9, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's goods by flood while the goods were in defendant's freight house. Affirmed.

Statement by Johnston, Ch. J.:

In this action W. B. Henry alleged that the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company undertook to and did transport his goods of the value of $2,500 from Topeka to Kansas City, and that when the goods reached destination and he demanded delivery of the same, the railway company wrongfully refused to give him his goods, and that subsequently they were injured and destroyed. Besides a general denial, the railway company answered that it received the goods and promptly carried them to Kansas City, where they arrived about May 28, 1903; that Henry was then notified of their arrival, but that he neglected to call for or remove the goods from the station, and that on May 31, 1903, they were damaged by an act of God, the unprecedented flood of 1903, and not by the negligence of the railway company. It was also alleged that if a demand was made for the goods on May 30, 1903, it was done upon a legal holiday, and the company's freight office was not open for business or the delivery of freight on that day, and, further, that no demand was made for the goods in business hours on any business day. On the first trial judgment was given for Henry, but for errors committed that judgment was reversed. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henry, 78 Kan. 490, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177, 97 Pac. 465. The last trial was upon a transcript of the testimony given on the first trial, on which the court made the following findings of fact and law:

"(1) I find that on or about the 27th day of May, 1903, the said W. B. Henry shipped by the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company certain household goods and furniture, in and for a valuable consideration from the city of Topeka to Kansas City, Missouri, there to be delivered to the said W. B. Henry.

"(2) That the said property was transported by the Santa Fé Railway Company from Topeka to Kansas City, Missouri, arriving in Kansas City, Missouri, upon the 28th day of May, 1903, and that upon the afternoon of May 29th, 1903, notice was sent by the said company to W. B. Henry of the arrival of said property, notifying the said W. B. Henry to call and remove the same from the freight house of said company. That W. B. Henry received said notice of the arrival of said property between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock upon the 30th day of May, 1903, and, immediately, within one hour, went to the proper offices at the freight depot of defendant company, prepared to remove said property, as notified, and then and there demanded of said company said property, and offered to pay all charges thereon, but that the said company did, at the time of said demand, upon the 30th day of May, refuse, failed, and neglected to deliver said property to the said W. B. Henry.

pany's office and place of business was open for the transaction of business, and that said company did not recognize the 30th day of May, 1903, or any part thereof, as a legal holiday at Kansas City, Missouri, in connection with the delivery of freight at its said depot. That the said company had its place of business open, and was transacting business upon said day, as usual, when Henry called and demanded said property.

"(4) I further find that the market value of said property in Kansas City upon the 30th day of May, 1903, was in the sum and value of $2,220.73.

"(5) I further find that, upon the 31st day of May, there was an extraordinary and unprecedented flood, an act of God, in the Kaw and Missouri rivers at Kansas City, Missouri, and the said property was, on the 31st day of May, wholly destroyed by said flood, while in the freight house of defendant company.

"(6) That upon making application for his shipment of goods to the clerk in the freight office at the time above mentioned, he was informed by the clerk in the freight office of the defendant that he could not obtain the shipment in question on that day, as it was a legal holiday and the cashier was not in his office; plaintiff repeated his demand for the goods, and insisted on obtaining the shipment, and told the said employees that he had the change, and had come prepared to take the goods, and that he wanted them. Plaintiff was not told to call again later in the day, but was informed that he could not obtain the shipment on that day, whereupon plaintiff left the said freight office, and did not return or make other demands upon any other person for the shipment on that date.

"(7) That on the 9th day of June, 1903, the plaintiff received from the defendant, and receipted to it for his shipment of freight in question in a damaged condition, with the understanding that in so doing he waived no legal right or claim that he might have against the defendant for the ruined or damaged condition of the goods.

"(8) I further find that said property was in the freight house of the said company upon the 30th day of May, 1903, when Henry called for and demanded the same, and the said company could have delivered said property to Henry, but, without any just reason or proper cause therefor, wrongfully refused and neglected to deliver the same.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant contends that, as the testimony on which the judgment in question rests was exactly the same as upon the earlier trial, the decision on the former appeal necessarily determines the result of this appeal, and requires judgment in its favor. If it be assumed that no new elements were brought into the case on the second trial, it does not follow that the former decision, right or wrong, is conclusively binding upon this appeal. Ordinarily, a question considered and decided on the first appeal is deemed to be settled, and, except for very cogent reasons involving palpable error, will not be re-examined on a second appeal. Some courts hold that a decision, whether right or wrong, is conclusive in all subsequent appeals, but what is called the "law of the case" is not an inflexible rule which requires a court to blindly reiterate a rule of law that is clearly erroneous. In Central 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Branch Union P. R. Co. v. Shoup, 28 Kan. 394, 42 Am. Rep. 163, the court, after stating generally the importance of stability and uniformity in the interpretation of the law, said: "We do not understand that the rule that a decision once made becomes the established law of the case is a cast-iron rule, and incapable of relaxation in any event. Cases may arise in which it will be very clear that the first decision was erroneous; that not only in the case at bar will wrong result from adhering to the decision, but also other interests through the state will be imperiled; hence we do not doubt the power of the court to reconsider and reverse a prior decision in the same case." In the late case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Merrill, 65 Kan. 436, 59 L.R.A. 711, 93 Am. St. Rep. 287, 70 Pac. 358, it was insisted that a ruling on the first appeal, however incorrect, was conclusive on the second, but the court again refused to sanction the theory that it was required to readopt and repeat a decision founded in serious error. Mr. Justice Smith answered the contention that a decision once announced by the supreme court must be adhered to, by saying: "This would come to us with more force if we were not now considering the same case with the same parties before the court. If an erroneous decision has been made, it ought to be corrected speedily, especially when it can be done before the litigation in which the error has been committed has terminated finally. We are fully satisfied that the rule of the former case is shattered by the pressing weight of opposing authority, and that reason is against it." In Ellison v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 87 Ga. 691, 13 S. E. 809, the learned Chief Justice Bleckley used the following forcible language: "Some courts live by correcting the errors of others and adhering to their own. . . . Minor errors, even if quite obvious, or important errors, if their existence be fairly doubtful, may be adhered to and repeated indefinitely, but the only treatment for a great and glaring error, affecting the current administration of justice in all courts of original jurisdiction, is to correct it. When an error of this magnitude, and which moves in so wide an orbit, competes with truth in the struggle for existence, the maxim for a supreme court, supreme in the majesty of duty as well as in the majesty of power, is not stare decisis, but fiat justitia, ruat cælum."

This being the well-established rule in our own state, it is unnecessary to consider or review the rulings of other states upon the binding force of an erroneous decision on a prior appeal. On the first appeal in this case no account was taken of the distinction between mere neglect of the carrier and its wilful wrong in refusing to deliver the goods twenty-four hours before the occurrence of the flood. The findings specifically show that the goods arrived at Kansas City on May 28, 1903, and that on the following day Henry was notified to come and remove them from the freight depot. On the next day, and within an hour after receiving the notice, he went to the depot, tendered the amount of charges, and demanded his goods, but the railway company refused to deliver them to him. It is true that May 30th was a legal holiday, but that is not a matter of consequence in this case, as the company did not recognize it as a holiday. Its place of business was open on that day, and it was transacting business as usual when the demand was made and refused. While the testimony is the same as on the former appeal, the findings in the last trial are more specific in regard to the fact that the freight depot was open for business on the day of the demand and as to the refusal of the demand. The wrongful withholding of the goods and its consequences were in the case, it is true, and might have entered into the decision on the first appeal, but the case was tried as one of mere negligence in the performance of a duty by the carrier, like neglect in the forwarding of freight, and, following Rodgers v. Missouri P. R. Co. 75 Kan. 222, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 658, 121 Am. St. Rep. 416, 88 Pac. 885, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 441, the case was decided on the theory "that, for the negligent failure of a party to perform a duty imposed by his contract, he is liable in damages to the other party for such loss as at the time of the omission would probably, or should reasonably, be expected to flow therefrom, and no other. If one owing a duty neglect to perform it, and a cause which could not have been reasonably apprehended intervene, and loss result, the latter cause, and not the omission of duty, is the proximate cause of the loss." [78 Kan. 494, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 179, 97 Pac. 465]. Now, there is directly presented the effect of the tortious detention of the goods before and up to the time of the flood which injured them. The goods were there ready for delivery. The owner was entitled to the possession of them when the demand was made. There was no excuse or justification for withholding them from him, and the refusal of the railway company to deliver them made it guilty of a wilful wrong but for which there would have been no loss. The wrongful detention of the goods is sometimes called a conversion, and, while it is not a conversion in the sense that there was an intention of the company to convert the goods to its own use, yet, upon the refusal, plaintiff at once became entitled to maintain an action to recover the goods or 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

their value, against which the company would have had no defense. In Watt v. Potter, 2 Mason, 77, Fed. Cas. No. 17,291, Justice Story said: "Whoever undertakes tortiously to deal with the property of another as his own, or tortiously detains it from the owner, is in contemplation of law guilty of a conversion of it." The case of Rodgers v. Missouri P. R. Co., supra, so much discussed by counsel, was well decided, and there is no intention to limit the rule there announced or weaken its force as an authority. Even in that case the difference between mere negligence in transporting goods subsequently injured by an act of God and some positive wrongdoing by the carrier was recognized. Referring to cases in which it was held that there was such a departure from the line of duty of the carrier and such misconduct as to make it liable for goods injured by an act of God, and which would not otherwise have been injured, it was said: "That case was one of deviation, a positive misfeasance, which makes the carrier liable as for conversion. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 383; Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. Dunlap, 71 Kan. 67, 80 Pac. 34. Mr. Chief Justice Tindal bases his argument upon the proposition that the wrong of the master in taking the barge out of its proper course was undoubtedly a ground of action. The rule first appears in the law of marine insurance, and was adopted to meet the spirit of dangerous adventure on the part of sea rovers which disregarded the safety of both property and life. Such a tortfeasor is held to take all risks as if they were actually foreseen, and is not allowed to apportion or qualify his wrong." In referring to an argument made in another case, in which a loss resulted from the wrongdoing of the defendant co-operating with an act of God, and where it was impossible to say how far the act of God contributed to the loss, and wherein it was concluded that the act of God was not the sole or proximate cause of the loss, it was said: "No one will dispute the soundness of this argument. It has been decided that if a carrier undertake to transport freight in an unseaworthy ship, it makes no difference that the storm which foundered it was of unusual severity. Hazard existed when the voyage began, and it is not possible to determine the effect of the delinquency upon the final event. Bell v. Reed, 4 Binn. 127, 5 Am. Dec. 398. If baggage be put off in the rain without any protection, it makes no difference that the rainfall is unprecedented. It is the carrier's duty to protect property in its custody from exposure to rain. Sonneborn v. Southern R. Co. 65 S. C. 502, 44 S. E. 77. In all such cases, and in cases of actual deviation from the usual route, it is proper to say that an act of God must not combine with human instrumentality; that if a carrier depart from the line of duty, he is liable, though an act of God intervene; and that he must be free from fault in order to claim his exemption." The flood was only the remote cause of the injury and loss in this instance. While it is true that the flood was one not to be anticipated, the railway company by withholding the goods became, as was stated, "a tortfeasor, and is held to take all risks as if they were actually foreseen." The effect of the wrongful taking or withholding of possession of the property of another finally lost through the act of God is shown in Blaker v. Sands, 29 Kan. 551, where it was said: "A party not being the owner of personal property, who takes it out of the possession of the real owner without his consent, holds it in his own wrong and at his own risk, and if subsequently judgment is rendered against him for the return of the property or its value, he cannot be excused from satisfying the judgment under the plea that the property has been lost in his hands, even by the act of God." Another case of the same import is Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morrison, 34 Kan. 502, 55 Am. Rep. 252, 9 Pac. 225, where a passenger traveling with a trunk arrived at destination, and the check for the trunk was presented to the baggageman and delivery of the same demanded, but he was told that the trunk had not arrived, when in fact it had. Shortly afterwards the depot in which it was kept was broken into by burglars, and the contents of the trunk stolen, and one of the questions in the case was the effect of the refusal of the demand. It was said: "If plaintiff demanded his baggage, as testified to, and the company, having the trunk at its depot at Parsons, refused to deliver it, the company is responsible to the owner for its contents, although the trunk was subsequently broken open and robbed without its fault." In Union P. R. Co. v. Moyer, 40 Kan. 184, 10 Am. St. Rep. 183, 19 Pac. 639, the responsibility of the railway company for goods wrongfully withheld from the owner was determined. The goods were shipped from Ohio to Kansas, and after their arrival the owner demanded the delivery of them from the company, and was informed by the agent of the company that they were not there. Two days later the depot was accidentally burned, and it was held that the wrongful withholding of the goods when they were demanded made the railway company liable for the loss.

It is argued that the flood was not only a concurring, but that it was the proximate, cause of the injury and loss. While the wrongful withholding of the goods had nothing to do with the occurrence of the flood, it did in fact cause the loss, as there would have been no loss if there had been no wrongful detention. The fact that the intervention of the flood concurred with its own wrong in the injury of the goods does not relieve it from responsibility for the loss. It was said in Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 273, "that no wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong." The effect of the wrongful withholding of goods from delivery, after they have been received, was a subject of comment in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lawson, 88 Ky. 496, 11 S. W. 511. There, goods were shipped over a railroad, and when they reached destination the railway company notified the owner of their arrival. On the next day the owner demanded the goods, but was informed that they were not there. In the succeeding days several other demands were made and like answers given. The refusal, it was said, should be regarded as a tortious detention, or what is the same thing, a wrongful withholding from the owner. It was said: "We do not mean to decide that a mere delay by a carrier in delivering goods amounts to a conversion. He is not bound to deliver until a demand is made. But, when made, he must know whether the property is at hand; and if it be, and he wrongfully fails to deliver it, he cannot escape the charge of conversion because he did not, in express words, refuse to deliver it, but informs the consignee it has not come to hand, when he is bound by law to know otherwise. Such conduct on his part should be regarded as a misfeasance, and not as a mere nonfeasance." Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Benson, 86 Ga. 203, 22 Am. St. Rep. 446, 12 S. E. 357. was a case where goods were directed to be shipped by a particular route, and, instead of sending them directly, the railroad company transported them in a roundabout way, thereby causing a delay of several days. Two days after the goods were received, they were damaged by a flood. For several days before the flood the consignee sent every day to the depot of the railroad company and asked for the goods, but was informed that they had not arrived. The goods, however, were then in the possession of the railroad company, but the agent failed or refused to deliver them. The court held the refusal to deliver and the wrongful detention of the goods made the railroad company liable for the loss sustained. See also *Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

FIDELITY TRUST COMPANY, Committee, etc., of Marie Louisa Hoffman, Appt.,

v.

MOSES BOBLOSKI.

(228 Pa. 52, 76 Atl. 720.)

Will — defeasible fee — grant with directions.

1. A defeasible fee which becomes absolute on the death of the widow without remarriage is created by a will which, after reciting that testator is fully convinced that his wife will educate the children and administer "our joint property" as well as if testator was living, directs that she shall take possession and enjoy and administrate the property for the time that she remains a widow, with a direction that she assist the children to procure the means best adapted for their future welfare; and it is immaterial that she is forbidden to sell the realty without the consent of the executors or that, in the event of her remarriage, the property is to go to the children.

Same — construction — primary intent.

2. The construction of a will should in case of doubt be in favor of the first rather than of the second taker, and of a general or primary intent rather than of a particular or secondary one.

Same — devisee subject to burden — resolution of doubts.

3. Where a devisee is subject to a charge or burden, doubts as to the quantum of the estate should be resolved in his favor.

(April 18, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover certain real estate to which plaintiff alleged title under the will of Jacob Hoffman, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. George S. Munson and H. Gordon McCouch, for appellant:

Testator's wife was only given an estate during widowhood, subject to determination and substitution of a different interest therefor in case of her remarriage.

Redding v. Rice, 171 Pa. 301, 33 Atl. 330; Morrison v. Semple, 6 Binn. 98; Drennan's Appeal, 118 Pa. 176, 12 Atl. 348; Kane's Estate, 185 Pa. 544, 40 Atl. 90.

The fact that the widow has a qualified power to dispose of the property does not enlarge her life estate.

Note. — Effect of testamentary provision restricting widow to enjoyment during widowhood, upon quantum of estate taken by her.

It is frequently a matter of judicial remark anent the construction of wills, that the diversity of their terms and the variety of the circumstances surrounding the testator are such that ordinarily but little assistance can be had from adjudicated cases, which are rarely more than precedents for the principles they illustrate. But while a decision interpreting one will may not control the construction to be placed upon another, it is believed that a collation of the decisions upon the present question, although not developing any general rule by which the quantum of estate devised in any given case may be determined, may prove useful.

The fundamental inquiry upon the result of which the quantum of estate taken under any particular devise or bequest must depend is whether the event of not marrying is interwoven into the original gift, thus creating an estate durante viduitate only, or whether it is a condition or contingency on which the estate is to be divested and determined. The purpose of this note is to bring together the decisions involving the determination of the question whether a gift to a widow, accompanied by a provision of some sort relative to her remarrying, is to be regarded as giving her a fee, or an absolute interest, defeasible upon her remarriage, or only an estate during widowhood. Although the same fundamental question is involved in the classes of cases pretermitted, namely, whether the provision restricting the beneficiary to enjoyment during widowhood is to be regarded as interwoven into the original gift, or as a condition attached to it, the purpose of this note, which, for reasons indicated in the preceding paragraph, is merely to present cases similar to that reported, is deemed to warrant the exclusion of cases in which the quantum of estate taken by the widow is not the subject of controversy, and in which the question is whether the provision relating to her enjoyment of the estate during

Mr. John Marshall Gest, for appellee:

The direction that testator's wife shall "take possession, enjoy, and administrate all his real and personal estate," was sufficient to pass the fee without words of inheritance.

The consent of the other executors did not limit the estate, as they had no interest and no power of sale as executors.

Snyder v. Baer, 144 Pa. 278, 13 L.R.A. 359, 22 Atl. 897.

A devise of real estate, even expressly for life, with a power of disposition, passes a fee.

The direction in the will that the wife shall assist the children when they become of age imposes a duty moral, if not legal, on her, which evinces the testator's intention that she should have the fee in order to fulfil it.

widowhood is a condition or a limitation,—a question which, it may be said in passing, is important only where a condition against remarriage is regarded as invalid. Neither does this note include cases in which a limitation over in event of subsequent marriage has been held void as repugnant to the estate primarily devised; nor does it include cases in which, although the testamentary provision under construction restricts the widow to enjoyment during widowhood, the extent of her estate is determined by the power of disposition annexed to the gift.

Qualified or determinable fee.

In Frey v. Thompson, 66 Ala. 287, where a will, which was very sparingly punctuated, was as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife Margaret Thompson all my landed estate [describing it] and I also give and bequeath unto my wife as aforesaid [certain personal property] to have and to hold the same during her widowhood the balance of my property I wish my executor or executors to sell and the proceeds thereof to be equally divided among my children. . . . Now should my wife Margaret Thompson marry after my decease she is to have only a child's part of all the above described property that I have bequeathed to her," it was held that, reading all the words of the will together, the testator's intention was plain to make a gift of an absolute estate to the wife, to be divested and determined on this express condition only, that she should marry again; and not a gift to her for life or during widowhood,—especially as any other construction would produce a partial intestacy.

In Bennett v. Packer, 70 Conn. 357, 60 Am. St. Rep. 112, 39 Atl. 739, it was held, construing the following testamentary provisions: "Item 3d. I give, bequeath and devise to my beloved wife, Susan M. Hooker, all the residue of my personal property and real estate owned by me at the time of my decease, for her own separate use and behoof. Item 4th. It is my will that if the said Susan M. Hooker again marries after my decease, I give, bequeath and devise to her, the said Susan M. Hooker, one third of my real estate and personal property for herself and her heirs," that, reading the third and fourth clauses together, it is clear that as to two thirds of the residue a conditional limitation is imposed by which, upon the subsequent marriage of the widow, her estate will determine.

In Black v. Nolan, 132 Ga. 452, 64 S. E. 647, where a testator provided that his wife and children should "share equal proportions" of his estate after an equalization on account of legacies received by some of the children from their grandfather, and continued: "It is my will that my wife remain on the place of residence where I now reside, during her life or widowhood, and in case she marries, for her to receive a child's part," it was held that the provision last quoted did not have the effect to limit the estate taken by the widow to an estate for life with remainder to the children, but that she took a one-seventh interest in his estate together with the right to occupy the residence during widowhood.

In Becker v. Becker, 206 Ill. 53, 69 N. E. 49, where an informally worded will contained the following provisions: "I wish to leave [certain described property, real and personal] to my wife, Lizzie Becker. . . . My wife, Lizzie, to have full charge of my estate after my death, without any restrictions of any nature. My wife, Lizzie, never to marry again, and if she does, my estate to be divided equally between my brothers [naming them] and my wife," it was held that the latter clause in the will did not have the effect of limiting the estate taken by the widow to an estate for life except in the one-third interest with which the will provided she should be invested in case of her remarriage; but that it was clearly the testator's intention, as disclosed by the entire will, to give to his wife a fee-simple estate subject to be defeated as to a two-thirds interest therein if she should remarry.

The general rule applies in favor of an absolute or vested estate, rather than of a defeasible or contingent one.

Re Jackson, supra.

N. E. 926, the following provision of a very sparingly punctuated will was under construction: "I will, give, bequeath and devise until [sic] my beloved wife, Emma Beatty, in lieu of and instead of and in full of her legal, equitable and lawful interest and absolute rights as my widow in and to my estate and property left by me at my death and upon the conditions following as to said real estate the following real estate [describing it] now owned by me, and of which I may die seised in fee simple together with all my interest, right and title in and to a certain lease and contract affecting a part of the last above described real estate [describing the contract], together with all money and rents due and owing to me or to become due and owing to me or to my estate upon and by virtue of said lease together with all the growing crop or crops whether severed or unsevered that may be on the last above described real estate, and the last above described real estate I so will and devise unto my beloved wife, Emma Beatty, only so long as she shall be and remain my unmarried widow if in the event my said wife, Emma Beatty, shall after my death marry again then all said real estate so willed and devised to her herein is hereby willed and devised," etc. It was held that the phrase "in fee simple" should be read as describing the estate devised, and not the estate of which the testator should die seised; and that, while the language restraining the widow's enjoyment to widowhood if isolated would be construed as giving her no more than a life estate, yet that its effect when taken in connection with the express devise of the fee simple was to create a condition against remarriage,—such construction being fortified by the fact that the qualification of the wife's estate was three times referred to in the will as a condition, and that the provision made for disposition in event of remarriage referred to it three times as a forfeited estate.

In Busby v. Busby, 137 Iowa, 57, 114 N. W. 559, a testator in the first paragraph of his will devised certain realty to his wife 23 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Under the act of April 8, 1833, § 9, P. L. 249, words of inheritance are no longer necessary, the whole estate of the testator passes under the devise, and the burden of proof is upon those who claim that a less estate was intended by the testator.

The fee was not cut down to a life estate by the further provisions in case of the widow's remarriage.

without words of limitation; the second paragraph containing a bequest to her of a sum of money, and the third creating a trust for her benefit. The fourth provided: "These bequests above made in the first, second and third provisions of this my will is on the express conditions and only to be paid to her or title passing, on her remaining my widow, and in case of her remarriage said property is to revert to my children." It was held that, in view of the fact that the first paragraph contained no words of qualification, and the fact that there was no gift over to take effect upon her death, so that, if the will were construed as giving her a life estate, there might be a partial intestacy, she took, subject to the condition of remarriage, the real estate in fee and the personal property absolutely.

In Swope v. Swope, 5 Gill, 225, where testator devised his entire estate to his wife "as long as she continues my widow; but if she intermarries she is to have no more than the law allows her, and the residue to be equally divided among [testator's children], but if she continues my widow, she is to hold, enjoy, or dispose of it at her discretion, as I do at present," it was held that if the devise had stopped after the provision for the division among the children, the wife would have taken only an estate during widowhood, but that in view of the further provision, and in order to give effect to all the words of the will, it was necessary to hold that the wife took a fee simple provided she continued his widow.

In Traphagen v. Levy, 45 N. J. Eq. 448, 18 Atl. 222, a testator gave to his wife all his household furniture and one third of the net income derived from his real estate, going on to designate a portion of this real estate to be occupied by her "free of rent during her natural life or as long as she shall remain my widow, and in the event of her remarrying again then the income to be derived from said estate shall go to and be equally divided among" the children. It was held that, no other disposition being made of the income devised to the widow, or of the undivided third of the principal of the estate which it represented, her interest

Super. Ct. 79; Scott v. Murray, 218 Pa. 186, 67 Atl. 47.

Moschzisker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question raised by this appeal concerns the quantum of the estate taken by the widow under the following will:

"I. Fully convinced that my wife, Philippina (née Doll), is able as well as willing, after my decease, to instruct and educate our children and to take care and administer our joint property, just as good as if I was still living, I wish and direct that my said wife shall take possession and enjoy and administrate for the time that she remains a widow all of my real and personal estate and effects, including the shares of the different building associations to which I do belong or might hereafter belong, subject, however, to the condition, that she shall not sell, dispose of, or contract any debt or liabilities of and on, any of my said real estate or city loan, without the consent of executors, hereinafter named.

"II. I wish and direct that my said wife shall assist to the best of her ability, our children, when they become of age, to procure the ways and means best adapted for their future welfare, and position to secure their own means.

"III. At and of the event of my said wife again becoming married, all my real and personal estate shall be divided between herself and our children, according to the laws of this commonwealth, and a guardian was an equitable fee in one third of testator's estate, subject to be defeated by her remarriage.

In Foust v. Ireland, 46 N. C. (1 Jones L.) 184, the following testamentary provision was under construction: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary Foust, the plantation I now live on, with all the household and kitchen furniture, with all the horses, cows and stock of every kind, wagon and plantation tools, of every kind, with all the negroes unmentioned, so long as she remain my widow; but, if she marry, she must quit the plantation, and have the half of the household and kitchen furniture and a negro man and a negro woman her lifetime, and they and their offspring, if any, to return to my children, to be equally divided between them, living at that time." It was held that the facts that testator did not use words commonly used in creating a life estate, but went out of the way to get words of less direct signification, that he made no disposition of the reversion, that in the event of her remarriage he gave the widow a life estate and part of the property which she would lose by her marriage, and disposed of the reversion in the part which she would be allowed to retain, except a small part given to her absolutely, showed that he did not intend to restrict her to a life estate if she remained his widow.

In Redding v. Rice, 171 Pa. 301, 33 Atl. 330, a testator provided as follows: "I will and bequeath all my real and personal property to my beloved wife, Mary, to have and to hold the same for her own proper use and behoof as long as she shall remain my widow, and if she should get married, then she shall be only entitled to the one third in said property, the balance, being two thirds to my youngest daughter, Kate; if the said Kate should die then I will and bequeath the two thirds to my son William, and if both should die then the residue remaining shall be equally divided among my remaining children." It was held that had the will stopped short of the gift over in event of her remarriage, the widow would have taken only a life estate, but as the various limitations over were evidently intended to be in fee, this certainly implied that the prior estate in the whole was also a fee, subject to a condition that she should not marry again,—such construction being aided by the absence of a devise over after the widow's death if she should not remarry.

In Rohrbach v. Sanders, 212 Pa. 636, 62 Atl. 27, in which the following testamentary provision was under construction: "I give and devise unto my beloved wife Sarah Ann and to my son Henry V. Simpson, all my property, both real, personal and mixed to be held for herself and in trust for my said son—provided, however, that if my said wife should again marry then I give and devise the property before mentioned to my son Henry V. Simpson and his heirs forever, and the trust thereby created in favor of my son shall after such marriage be null and void," it was held that, the devise being of the property itself, the words used being apt words for the creation of an estate upon a condition, and there being no limitation over in event of the widow not remarrying, she took a defeasible fee simple in the undivided one half of the real estate, which, upon her death without having remarried, became an absolute fee simple.

In Scott v. Murray, 218 Pa. 186, 67 Atl. 47, it was held that, under a devise of all testator's estate to his wife, "and her heirs and assigns forever, so long as she remains my widow," the wife took a defeasible fee, the court saying that the words, "so long as she remains my widow," being susceptible of construction as a condition, could not be regarded as manifesting the clear intent necessary to cut down the quantum of estate granted.

In Koble v. Bennett, 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 79, a testator made the following provision: "After the payment of the debts and expenses above mentioned, I give and bequeath to my wife, Maggie E. Koble, the residue of my personal property and real estate absolutely, to have and to hold the same for her own use and benefit, so long as she shall remain unmarried and if she shall marry again, then she shall be restricted to such estate therein as she would have been en-shall be appointed for such of our children as are then not of age.

"IV. To assist my wife in the execution of my real and personal estate as well as in the execution of my last will and testament, I herewith appoint herself, Peter Kohlhas, and my brother, P. C. Hoffman, all of the city of Philadelphia, state of Pennsylvania, as executors of and to this my last will and testament."

The testator, Jacob Hoffman, died seised of certain real estate. The court below held that the widow took a fee in this real estate defeasible upon her remarriage. The question is not entirely free from doubt, but we are convinced that this is the correct interpretation of the will. In case of doubt, the construction of a will should be titled thereto if I had died without a will." It was held that, in view of the testator's use of the word "absolutely," and of the facts that the testator died without issue, that his wife was the principal object of his bounty, that in disposing of his estate he blended his real estate and personal property in a gift to her, in terms which would carry a fee, and that he made no devise over after her death, it was a plain case for the application of the principle that the absolute estate of the principal object of the testator's bounty is not to be cut down to an estate for life without clear evidence of such intent; and that no such inference could be drawn from the words "so long as she remain unmarried."

In Squier v. Harvey, 16 R. I. 226, 14 Atl. 862, the testator directed as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary Harvey, all of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, wherever or however situated, together with all my household furniture and family stores, except as hereinafter named, to and for her own use, benefit, and behoof forever, as long as she shall remain my widow. To have and to hold the same, with all the rights and privileges thereof, to her, the said Mary Harvey, her heirs and assigns forever. But in case my said wife shall marry again at any time after my decease, then I give and bequeath all of my real estate, however or wherever situated, to James G. Harvey, to and for his own use, benefit, and behoof forever." It was held that the most reasonable construction of which the will was capable gave the widow the entire estate, less so much thereof as should be necessary to pay debts and legacies, subject to defeasance by her marriage, notwithstanding that the will contained a residuary clause, the beneficiary of which would, under the construction given the will, take nothing except in event of the widow's remarriage.

In Haring v. Shelton (Tex.) 122 S. W. 13 (which apparently reverses on this point the decision of the court of civil appeals in 114 S. W. 389), it was held, where a testator devised to his wife "her heirs and assigns forever, the following in favor of the first rather than of the second taker, of a general or primary intent rather than of a particular or secondary one; and where a devisee is subjected to a charge or burden, doubts as to, the quantum of the estate should be resolved in his favor. Re Jackson, 179 Pa. 77, 36 Atl. 156.

The testator refers to the estate as "our joint property," and shows an intention to substitute his wife for himself in relation thereto. She appears the first and principal object of his bounty, and his general or primary intent seems to be to give her the property as he had it, trusting her to take care of their children. His expression of confidence that his wife would educate the children, and his direction that she described tracts of land," and, after describing the land, went on to provide, "It is my will that my said wife, C. C. Shelton and her heirs, shall hold said lands in fee simple forever, or so long as she shall remain a widow," that the wife took a fee-simple estate determinable upon her second marriage.

In Vaughan v. Vaughan, 97 Va. 322, 36 S. E. 603, a testator by a will, the whole operative part of which was as follows, directed: "I do hereby bequeath to my wife, Emma Lee Vaughan, and to my children, all my property of every kind, real and personal, and do hereby appoint my wife my sole executrix without security as long as she shall remain my lawful widow; should she marry again the minor children to choose guardians, and my wife in that event to take a child's part, to be hers as long as she lives, and at her death to be distributed amongst my children then living." It was held that the only harmonious construction to be drawn from all the provisions and words of the will, considered together, is that the testator intended to give his wife the entire estate, but if she married again, then she was only to have a child's part for her life. This construction was supported by reference to the fact that the testator considered it necessary that the minor children should have guardians only in case of her remarriage; and the fact that under a different construction the wife would, notwithstanding the manifest affection of the testator for her and his confidence in her judgment and discretion, take only a small part of what the law would have given her had her husband died intestate.

In Wright v. Wright, 16 U. C. Q. B. 184, a testator devised as follows: "In the first place, my will is that my beloved wife, Nancy Stockwell, shall inherit [certain described realty]; also all my personal estate, goods and chattels, of what kind and nature soever, I give and bequeath to my loving wife, Nancy Stockwell, during her widowhood; and in case of her marriage or decease, then to be disposed of and equally divided between should assist them when they became of age, "to procure the ways and means best adapted for their future welfare, and position to secure their own means," tend to demonstrate this primary intent, and go far to show a purpose to give her an estate in fee. It is a well-settled rule that an indefinite devise, coupled with a charge on the devisee, passes a fee. In Lloyd v. Jackson, L. R. 1 Q. B. 571, s. c. L. R. 2 Q. B. 269 (before the wills act), the testator directed: "I give and bequeath to my well-beloved wife, . . . all and singular my lands, messuages, and tenements, by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed, . . . all my children to be educated and settled in business according to my wife's discretion." And it was held that the language indicated an intention that the wife should take such an estate as would enable her to carry out the wishes of the testator, and that she took an estate in fee. This view was sustained on appeal by the exchequer chamber, L. R. 2 Q. B. 269; Kelly, Chief Baron, saying: "Whether this duty be obligatory or whether it be discretionary, we are of opinion that the effect of this part of the will is to confer the fee simple, and not merely an estate for life." The rule laid down in this English case has always obtained in Pennsylvania. Burkart v. Bucher, 2 Binn. 455. 4 Am. Dec. 457; Coane v. Parmentier, 10 Pa. 72; Fahney v. Holsinger, 65 Pa. 388; Re Jackson, 179 Pa. 77, 36 Atl. 156. "Our cases all hold that a devise generally or indefinitely, with power of disposition, car-my sons and daughters [naming them]; to my son John Stockwell, Jr., I bequeath one hundred acres of land" out of the land given the widow. By a codicil the testator provided that an after-born child should share equally with the rest of his children; "and in case of the death of either of the above named children before the estate be divided, their share to be justly divided among the survivors." It was held, by a divided court, that the widow took a fee in the land devised, and that the codicil did not have the effect of cutting down her estate to one for life.

In Re Deller, 6 Ont. L. Rep. 711, it was held, construing the following testamentary provision: "My wife, née Catharine Kittel, shall have the whole of my estate which remains at my decease however with the observation that should she marry again then she shall only receive the third part and the residue shall be equally divided between my five children," that there was an absolute gift of the whole residue to the widow, followed by a gift over as to two thirds of it if she should marry again.

In Re Mumby, 8 Ont. L. Rep. 283, where a testator directed: "I give, devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate in manner following, that is to say: To my beloved wife Margaret Ann Mumby, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns to and for her and their sole and absolute use and benefit, according to the nature and quality thereof respectively. The real property being described as follows:" (here followed a description of the real property), "while the said Margaret Ann Mumby remains my widow; but in case my wife Margaret Ann Mumby should again marry I request by executors to sell all my real and personal estate when my youngest child should come of age, and that they, my executors, shall divide the proceeds, after deducting expenses, between my six younger children, share and share alike," it was held that, no disposition having been made of the remainder expectant on the determination the widow's estate in the event of her not marrying again, she would not be held to have taken only an estate during widowhood, but that her estate and interest were absolute if she should remain a widow.

In Day v. Dameron, 12 Sim. 200, a testator devised to his wife certain real estate "for her sole use and benefit after my decease," and also devised to her, for the term of her natural life, the rents and benefits arising from certain other real property, and further gave her all his household goods, plate, linen, books, and wearing apparel, adding: "Nevertheless, if my said wife, Sarah Caley, shall marry after my decease, then this will and testament shall be void and of no effect; but the whole of the above property shall become the property of my daughter, Ann Caley, during her natural life, and, after that, to be divided between her children." In case his wife should remain unmarried, the real property in which he had given her a life estate was similarly limited to the daughter and her children. He further provided: "I also appoint my wife, Sarah Caley, provided she remains unmarried, sole executrix and residuary legatee to all other property I may possess at my decease." It was held, in view of the language of the will, and of the fact that testator made no disposition of the property forming the subject of the first devise to his wife in event of her remarriage, and of the fact that she was made residuary legatee, that she took a fee simple in such property.

In Pickwell v. Spencer, L. R. 7 Exch. 105 (affirming L. R. 6 Exch. 190), a testator, after devising to his wife certain real estate without words of limitation, together with all his personal property, then directed that, if his wife should marry again, an inventory should be taken of all the land, goods, etc., before mentioned, by certain persons whom he appointed guardians of his children, with power to take away the goods, chattels, and effects, and to "reserve" them and the land for the benefit of his children until the two youngest should have arrived at an age capable of providing for themselves, and then to sell the whole and divide the proceeds equally among the surviving children. It was held that as the ries a fee." Witmer v. Delone, 225 Pa. 450, 74 Atl. 347. The present will, by clear implication, gives to the widow the power to sell and dispose of the estate. The executors are expressly appointed "to assist my wife in the execution of my real and personal estate." They are given no interest in or power of sale over the real estate, and their function respecting it is made advisory to the widow. The direction that the widow could not sell or dispose of the real estate or city loans without the consent of her coexecutors cannot serve to defeat the fee.

The words of the devise, taken in connection with the other parts of the will, are sufficient to vest a fee in the widow. In Snyder v. Baer, 144 Pa. 278, 13 L.R.A. 359, 22 Atl. 897, the words, "I direct that my beloved wife shall have and hold the property where I now reside," were held to carry a fee. In the present instance the testator directs that his wife shall take possession of and enjoy all of his real and personal estate. In Campbell v. Carson, 12 Serg. & R. 54, we held that a devise to a wife of property "to be by her freely possessed and enjoyed" passed a fee; and this was before the act of April 8, 1833 (P. L. 240). "The act of 1833 changes the rule of construction by its command that 'all devises of real estate shall pass the whole estate of the testator in the premises devised . . . unless it appear by a devise over, or by words of limitation, or otherwise, in the will, that the testator intended to devise a less estate.' Starting with this statutory testator, while providing for his children in the event of his wife's marrying, had not done so in the event of her dying unmarried, his intention was to leave his property in such a way that his wife might, in after years, make such a disposition of it, with reference to the state of things which may then have supervened, as he would have made if he had survived her, securing his family at the same time against the possibility of her putting herself into a condition where she could not be safely trusted to perform that duty, which intention would be entirely defeated if the wife took only an estate for life.

In Rishton v. Cobb, 5 Myl. & C. 145, where a testator bequeathed a sum of money to trustees upon trust to invest in securities and to authorize and empower a certain woman "to receive the dividends as they become due, so long as she shall continue single and unmarried; but in case she sells, assigns, or disposes of, or anticipates such dividends, I do hereby revoke the bequest so made for her benefit, and thereupon do will and direct that the said sum of £2,000 shall become part of the residue of my estate," it was held that, had the legatee been single and unmarried, and so remained, she would have been entitled to the dividends without any limitation of time, the court saying: "Her interest would not have been determinable by her death, but (independently of the forfeiture upon alienation) only by her ceasing to be single and unmarried. This is different from a gift of dividends during widowhood. The state of widowhood must determine with the life of the widow; but the gift, so long as the legatee shall remain single and unmarried, must be considered as requiring the act of marriage to determine the interest. This gift, therefore, is of the dividends of stock, without limitation as to time, which carries the stock itself."

The foregoing decision was held binding in Re Howard [1901] 1 Ch. 412, in which it was held, construing the following provision: "I desire my said executor and trustee to set aside 200l., and thereout pay to my said wife, the said Amelia Howard, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the sum of 3l. monthly so long as she remains unmarried or until the said sum of 200l. becomes exhausted, the said payment of 3l. monthly to cease on my said wife marrying again," that upon the wife's death without having married again, and before the exhaustion of the 200l., that her estate was entitled to the balance.

This case was in turn held to govern the decision in Mason v. Mason, 101 L. T. N. S. 669, in which it was held, where a testator directed the income of a trust to be paid to his daughter "until she shall marry, and after her marriage shall pay to her the legacy or sum of £3,000 free of legacy duty out of the said trust premises, and then divide the balance thereof equally between all my sons surviving me," that, the daughter having died unmarried, her estate was entitled to the corpus.

Estate during widowhood.

In Lester v. Kirtley, 83 Ark. 554, 104 S. W. 213, a testator provided "2. After the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give to my wife, Elenor Lester, my entire estate, to wit; Moneys, stock, and farm, for her sole use and support, and it is expressly understood that my entire estate is to be controlled and managed by my said executors, that is to say, James T. and Nathaniel T. Lester, or either of them; that they, or either of them, are to manage and control said farm, stock and effects to the best of their judgment and ability for the use of my said wife as aforesaid. 3. If my wife, Elenor Lester, should see proper, after my decease, to marry again, then in that case she shall have one hundred and sixty acres of land, to include the homestead, and one hundred and fifty dollars worth of property out of my estate, the balance to be disposed of as hereinafter provided. 4. After the marriage of my wife, Elenor Lester, or death, if she should not marry, I direct that said executors shall advertise my entire property for sale, and, if it can be, agreeable with all my children, divide the same into such lots and parcels as shall give each one of my children an equal share of my prop-presumption, the burden of proof is now upon those who claim that a less estate was intended by the testator." Kiefel v. Keppeler, 173 Pa. 181, 33 Atl. 1043. There is no devise over in the present will; nor does it appear by words of limitation or otherwise that the testator intended to give his wife an estate less than a fee. The fee given to the wife was not cut down to a life estate by the provision that she was to take possession and enjoy the estate "for the time that she remains a widow," or by the further provision that in the event of her marriage the estate was to be divided between herself and the testator's children according to the intestate law. There are cases where provisions restricting a widow to the enjoyment of the property during widowhood have been held to limit the estate to her life, and others where the contrary has been ruled. It depends in each instance upon the intent to be gathered from the will as a whole. In Redding v. Rice, 171 Pa. 301, 33 Atl. 330, Mr. Justice Mitchell distinguished the former class of cases, particularly Cooper v. Pogue, 92 Pa. 254, 37 Am. Rep. 681, and Long v. Paul, 127 Pa. 406, 14 Am. St. Rep. 862, 17 Atl. 988, and truly said: "Precedents are of little value in the construction of wills, because, when used under different circumstances with different context, the same words may express different intentions." It was held in that case that a devise to the wife "as long as she remains my widow, and if she should get married then she shall only be erty; if it cannot be so divided in lots and shares, then they shall sell to the highest bidder and the proceeds be equally divided between them all." It was held that the widow did not take a fee in the real estate, but that the testator's purpose was to devise a life estate in his entire property to his wife for her use and support, subject to be defeated by her remarriage.

In Batterton v. Yoakum, 17 Ill. 288, where a testator devised to his wife his entire estate, except such as might be necessary to pay debts, "the said Nancy Batterton, to all and everything over, so long as she, the said Nancy Batterton, remains my widow and no longer, then the estate to be equally divided among my heirs," it was held that the evident intention of the testator was to vest in his widow a life estate in his lands, subject to be defeated by subsequent marriage.

In Mulberry v. Mulberry, 50 Ill. 67, where a testator devised to his wife certain real estate "to hold and dispose of the same as she may see proper during her widowhood," it was held that the widow did not take an estate of inheritance, but only a limited estate terminating with her widowhood or at her death.

In Green v. Hewitt, 97 Ill. 113, 37 Am. Rep. 105, where a testator directed: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Elizabeth Thompson, the farm on which we now reside, [describing it], also all my personal property of every description, so long as she remains my widow; at the expiration of that time the whole, or whatever remains, to descend to my daughter, Mary Thompson," it was held that the wife took a mere life estate in the entire gift.

In Rose v. Hale, 185 Ill. 378, 76 Am. St. Rep. 40, 56 N. E. 1073, in which the following testamentary provision was under construction: "I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved wife Mariah Church the farm on which we now reside, [describing it] thirdly all the live stock horses cattle sheep hogs by me now owned and kept thereon also all the household furniture wagons, carriages and all my farming implements and all my personal property not herein enumerated or otherwise disposed of whilst she remains my widow. But if she should marry then it is my will that she divide the farm and give each of my children an equal share after taking her thirds," it was held that the will did not vest in the wife a fee defeasible on condition of her marriage, but that the estate created was not greater than an estate for life.

In Kratz v. Kratz, 189 Ill. 276, 59 N. E. 519, where a testator gave and devised to his wife "during her widowhood" all his property "absolutely and unconditionally," going on to direct that after the decease of his wife all the property which his said wife at the time of her death might possess be given, devised, and bequeathed to his only child absolutely, and on condition that all of the wife's just debts and funeral expenses be paid, it was held that the widow took only an estate for life subject to be terminated by her remarriage.

In Sayer v. Humphrey, 216 Ill. 426, 75 N. E. 170, where a testator gave his wife the rest and residue of his estate "to hold for the future benefit of herself and children, and which she may dispose of to our children in just and proper proportions as necessity and due regard to prudence may dictate, so long as she remains unmarried and my widow," it was held that the will created in the widow at most a life estate.

In Harmon v. Brown, 58 Ind. 207, where a testator gave to his wife "during her widowhood" all his real and personal estate "to be held and freely possessed and enjoyed during her widowhood," it was held that the widow did not take the fee in lands devised to her, but only an estate during widowhood.

In Tate v. McLain, 74 Ind. 493, where a testator provided: "I will and bequeath to my beloved wife, Minerva Tate, all the residue of my estate, both real and personal property of every description, to have and hold and use as her own, for the benefit of herself and family, so long as she remains my widow," going on to provide that, in case she should marry again, then she should take as in case of intestacy, and entitled to one third in said property," gave the widow a fee, and, as she had not remarried, that a conveyance made by her vested an estate in the grantee which became indefeasible after her death. In Rohrbach v. Sanders, 212 Pa. 636, 62 Atl. 27, the devise was to a wife, "provided, however, that if my said wife should again marry, then I give and devise the property before mentioned to my son," and it was held that the widow took a defeasible fee which upon her death before marriage became an absolute fee simple. And in Scott v. Murray, 218 Pa. 186, 67 Atl. 47, we held that the words, "so long as she remains my widow," annexed to the grant of a fee, did not indicate an intention to cut down the quantum of the estate.

In the present case there is sufficient in the will to show an intention that the widow should take a defeasible fee, and there is not enough to restrict the devise to an estate for life. The widow not having remarried, the fee became absolute upon her death, and the real estate in question passed under her will.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

that, if she should remain his widow until her death, then all the residue of his estate, including all the real estate, should be sold and the proceeds divided among the children, it was held that the wife did not take a fee in the real estate, but only an estate during widowhood.

In O'Harrow v. Whitney, 85 Ind. 140, where a testator devised all the residue of his estate to his wife "so long as she remains my widow," it was held that her estate in point of duration was limited to the period of her widowhood.

In Levengood v. Hoople, 124 Ind. 27, 24 N. E. 273, construing the following testamentary provision: "I give and bequeath to my wife Mary and heirs, for her to dispose of as she sees best, sell, bargain and convey, as much so as myself in person, to all intents and purposes, in law and equity, as follows, to wit: [describing certain real and personal property], that is to say, during the time she lives a widow or in my name. Then said land is to be equally divided amongst—" certain persons,—it was held that the widow did not take a fee simple, upon condition that she should not remarry, but an estate during her widowhood only.

In Stivers v. Gardner, 88 Iowa, 307, 55 N. W. 516, where a testatrix, after devising to her husband without qualification certain described lands, and directing that at his death all of said lands should go to her son, went on to provide, "If my husband should get married after my death, in that event all of said property, both real and personal, to revert to my said son and daughter," it was held that the husband did not take a fee simple, but only a life estate terminable upon his marriage.

In Shaw v. Shaw, 115 Iowa, 193, 88 N. W. 327, where a testator devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate to his wife "to have and to hold to her, my said wife, so long as she remain my widow; then two thirds of what is left to go to my heirs, to be equally divided," it was held that the wife did not take a fee-simple title, but only a life estate subject to be defeated by remarriage.

In Koonz v. Hempy, 142 Iowa, 337, 120 N. W. 976, where testator gave and bequeathed to his wife "all of my real estate both real and personal and mixed so long as she lives or remains my widow, but in case my said wife shall marry and ceases to remain my widow, then, in that case I order and direct that all my estate shall be" divided in manner specified, it was held that such provision did not vest in the widow an estate in fee if she did not remarry.

In Mohn v. Mohn (Iowa) 126 N. W. 1127, where a testator gave his wife certain real estate (describing it) "during life or so long that she shall remain my widow," going on to provide that after the death of his wife his son should have the land described, it was held that the widow did not take title in fee simple absolute, but that the will indicated an intention to give the land to the widow only during widowhood.

In Mudd v. Mullican, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 417, 12 S. W. 263, 385, where a testator devised all his property to his wife "so long as she remains my widow; but, should she marry or die, I will one half of my property to her, or, in case of her death, to her relations, and the remaining half to go to my relations," it was held that a fee passed to the wife in one half of the property.

In Mansfield v. Mansfield, 75 Me. 509, where a testator devised to his wife all his "property and estate of any description and wherever situate, to hold the same so long as she shall remain my widow," going on to devise to a son two thirds of the same property and estate upon the termination of the wife's estate therein, the remaining third being devised to a daughter, it was held that the testator evidently intended to give to his wife, at best, but an estate for life, and to make a devise over in fee upon the wife's death or marriage to the son and daughter above mentioned.

In Clark v. Tennison, 33 Md. 85, where a testator devised to his wife his residuary estate so long as she remained his widow, and at her death to be equally divided among the children, it was held that the plain intent was that the widow should have the property no longer than during her widowhood.

In Russell v. Werntz, 88 Md. 210, 44 Atl. 219, where a testator bequeathed to his wife all the residue of his estate, "to have and to hold and dispose off (sic) as she may see fit, while she remains single, and at her death or marriage, the remaining property is to be equally divided between my two daughters," it was held that the plain intent of the testator was that the widow should have the property no longer than widowhood.

In Knight v. Mahoney, 152 Mass. 523, 9 L.R.A. 573, 25 N. E. 971, a testator devised as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sabra A. Knight, all my real estate and personal property, of every kind and description, after paying all my debts and legal charges, and paying out to my children the allowances herein-after made, so long as she remains my widow." The will contained no devise of real property except that to the widow. It was held that the true construction of the will was that the testator intended to give to his wife the use of the real estate only so long as she remained his widow.

In Fuller v. Wilbur, 170 Mass. 506, 49 N. E. 916, a testator, after giving his children each a trifling legacy, proceeded as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Pella L. Wilbur, all my real and personal estate of whatever name, for her sole use and benefit so long as she remains my widow, except the legacies to my children." It was held that while there was some ground for saying that, with the exception of the legacies to the children, the widow took the entire estate absolutely and in fee, subject to be divested of it if she married again, the better construction, and the one according to the weight of authority, was that she took a life estate determinable on remarriage, the court saying: "The words 'so long as she remains my widow' imply a continuance of the estate during widowhood, and no longer; and at most it could not extend beyond her life. Further, the estate is given to her for her 'use and benefit,' which are apt words in connection with a life estate, but which hardly would be used where the intention was to give an absolute estate, and to render it liable to be defeated on the happening of some future event. Neither are there any words which give her a power of disposition over the estate. It is true that an unqualified gift of the use, income, or improvement of personal property vests the property absolutely in the taker. But the gift here was not unqualified."

In Haab v. Schneeberger, 147 Mich. 583, 111 N. W. 185, where a testator devised to his wife a farm "to be enjoyed by her as long as she shall remain my widow. In case of her marriage, my daughter Caroline shall take the said farm, to be enjoyed by her during her life, and after her decease the said farm shall be divided among her issue," it was held that the widow took a life estate terminable upon remarriage.

In Peck v. Griffis, 148 Mich. 682, 112 N. W. 722, a testator devised to his wife certain lands "to have and to hold the same as long as she remains my widow; but if she shall marry again, I request and direct that she sell said lot and divide the proceeds of such sale equally between herself 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) and my sons . . . I also give and bequeath to my wife all my personal property . . . to be used and disposed of by her as she may think best and proper." It was held that, in view of the language employed and the fact that testator disposed of his personal property absolutely, his real estate upon condition, and to the same person, it was his intention to devise to the wife no more than an estate for her life, rather than an estate in fee subject to be divested if she should remarry.

In Morgan v. Morgan, 41 N. J. Eq. 235, 3 Atl. 63, where a testator devised to his wife all his household goods and furniture, "also one third of the income or interest of my estate during her widowhood, in lieu of dower," it was held that the widow's interest in the household goods and furniture was subject to the same limitation as the gift of one third of the income, to an estate for life.

In Dubois v. Van Valen, 61 N. J. Eq. 331, 48 Atl. 241, where a testator devised as follows: "To my wife, Eliza Van Valen, all my real and personal property for her use and benefit so long as she remains my widow, but should she marry then the property, real and personal, remaining, shall immediately or as soon as possible be equally divided among my children then living," etc., it was held that it was plainly the testator's intention to confine his wife's estate to one for life.

In Place v. Burlingame, 75 Hun, 432, 27 N. Y. Supp. 674, (affirmed without opinion in 149 N. Y. 617, 44 N. E. 1128) the will under construction contained the following clause: "I give and bequeath to my wife, Johanna Jones, my real estate in the town of Willett, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, together with all my household furniture, or rather the use thereof during the period that she may live and remain my widow; her furniture, bedding, etc., that she had of her own when I married her is to be at her disposal. I also give to her my cow free and clear. Also, further, I give to her one hundred dollars, said hundred dollars to be paid to her by my executors, hereinafter named, within two years after my decease, and the other property above named she is to have at my decease." It was held that the language of the will limited the wife to the use of the property, both real and personal, during the period of her life, subject to an earlier determination in case of her remarriage,—such construction being aided by the presence of a residuary clause in the will.

In Rausch v. Rausch, 64 N. Y. S. R. 490, 31 N. Y. Supp. 786, where a testator devised to his wife all his estate, "to be her own as long as she remains my widow," going on to make provision in the event of her remarrying, it was held that the widow took no more than a life estate.

In Corbitt v. Corbitt, 54 N. C. (1 Jones, Eq.) 114, where a testator devised to his wife certain negroes "and all my household and kitchen furniture and farming utensils, as sees proper, during her widowhood, and a sorrel mare and colt, and her choice of four head of cow cattle, and all my stock of hogs and sheep, and my crop of corn, wheat and oats, to dispose of as she may think proper," the remainder in the slaves being in a subsequent clause given to his "lawful heirs," it was held that the widow did not take an absolute estate in the negroes, but one during widowhood only.

In Re Brooks, 125 N. C. 136, 34 S. W. 265, where testator devised to his wife all his property, "to have and possess as long as she remains my widow. Should she remarry, then the law is my will," it was held that the language of the will clearly showed that the intention of the testator was to limit the estate of the widow to a life interest, notwithstanding his failure to dispose of the reversion, which, as is apparent, would go by descent to the same persons to whom the property was limited in event of a remarriage.

In Sink v. Sink, 150 N. C. 444, 64 S. E. 193, the following testamentary provision was up for construction: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Mahaley the remainder of my land, after selling off, as directed in the tenth item, whatever there may be remaining, to have and to hold to her own proper use and behoof, to embrace my mansion house and other outhouses and improvements of the land I now live on, during the term of her widowhood, and after her marriage to be equally divided between my brother and sisters or their legal representatives share and share alike." It was held that, although there was no general residuary clause in the will, the estate in the land devised to the widow could not endure beyond her life. It appeared, however, that the brother and sisters to whom the property was limited in the event of remarriage were testator's legal heirs, and so would take the remainder not disposed of by the will.

In Winchester v. Hoover, 42 Or. 310, 70 Pac. 1035, it was held that under a devise to testator's wife, "to have and hold during her life or while she shall remain unmarried, to pay my debts, to support herself, and to maintain and educate minor children, and at her death or marriage the said property to descend in equal proportions or shares to all my children," the wife did not take title to the property in fee, but only an estate for life.

In Boyd v. Bigham, 4 Pa. 102, it was held that under a devise of testator's estate to his wife, "her heirs and assigns forever, and to will the same to whom she pleases (on condition she remain my widow) and in case of marriage or death without a will, I desire my estate real and personal" to be disposed of in manner specified, the widow took an estate for life, with concurrent remainders in fee to her appointees, or the persons designated by the testator, dependent on a contingency with a double aspect.

Rep. 681, in which the following testamentary provision was under construction: "To my beloved wife, Sarah Pogue (so long as she remains my widow) I give all the income of the home farm, on which I now live, containing two hundred acres, more or less, with all the tenements and appurtenances belonging thereto, together with all the products arising therefrom, also the mansion house in which I live, together with all belonging to it, and all that is in it, or about it, I give to my beloved wife, Sarah Pogue, the same to be hers, and to belong to her forever," it was held that the testator clearly intended to devise to his wife an estate in the land less than a fee, and that the fact that he did not devise the remainder was insufficient to overcome or change the effect of the language giving his wife a life estate only.

In Long v. Paul, 127 Pa. 456, 14 Am. St. Rep. 862, 17 Atl. 988, the following testamentary provision was under construction: "I also give devise and bequeath to her my said wife Sarah Maurer all my improvements and income of my messuage and lot and house where I now live and all that peace of land where Samuel Weary lived now deceased bud now occupied by his wido Catharine Weary on which a dwelling house and barn is on containing 93 acres more or less with its appurtenances; and all that piece or parcels of land situated &c here described on the South by Mahanoy Creek on the West by Benjamin Kness and others on the North by land of the estate of Thomas Henninger on the east by lands of Amos Vastine and my beloved wife Sarah Maurer is to pay all my debt and if she cannot pay it she shall sell so much of the land to pay for the rest of the land and keep it for her one youse, as long as she keeps my name and after she marries and dound keep my name any more she shall have the one half of all my real and personel property for her own youse and the other half I beques to my 3 sisters share and shore alike . . . Lastly I appoint my esteemed friend Jarred Henninger to be the executor of this my last will and testament after my beloved wife Sarah Maurer dound keep my name my above executor shall thevide it to my wife the one half of all real and personall property and the other half to my three sisters share and share alike if can be devided without spoyling the hole if spoyling the hole he shall selling it at public sale and divided the money is directed." It was held that taking the whole will together, the testator's intention was reasonably clear to give his wife the use and income of his whole estate so long as she remained his widow, and of half of it in case she remarried, but not in either event to give her more than a life estate in the realty. The court said that, although it was by no means clear that the widow would have taken one half absolutely in event of her remarriage, yet assuming that she would, it could not be said as a matter of law that it was a larger or more favorable provision for her than that made in case she should not marry again.

In Patton v. Church, 168 Pa. 321, 31 Atl. 1079, it was held that under a devise to testator's wife of certain realty and personalty, "to be occupied and used by her as and for a family home during her widowhood," the widow took no more than a life estate.

In Yetzer v. Brisse, 190 Pa. 346, 42 Atl. 677, where a testator devised to his wife all his property "for her to have, to hold, and to enjoy during her natural life, or so long as she shall remain my widow," it was held that the estate devised was not an estate in fee.

In Geist's Estate, 193 Pa. 398, 45 Atl. 437, where a testator made provision for his widow by giving her "all his household and kitchen furniture, horses, cattle, and farm implements and other goods . . . or as much thereof as she may need during the time she shall remain my widow living and unmarried," going on to direct that all goods not retained or needed by her should be sold by his executor, that she should have the full control of the farm, and that after her death the farm should be sold and the proceeds divided, it was held that, in view of all the provisions of the will, the testator did not make an unqualified gift of his personal estate to his wife, but gave her only so much thereof as she might need during life or while she remained his widow.

In McGuire's Appeal, 8 Sadler (Pa.) 177, 11 Atl. 72, where a testator devised to his daughter-in-law, "while she remains the widow of [naming his son] in fee simple the tract of land upon which the said widow now resides," the court said that they were inclined to think that the devisee took but a life estate.

In Long v. Hill, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 606, where a testator gave his wife all his estate, "to be held by her for her own use and benefit so long as she shall remain my widow," and the subsequent portion of the will conferred upon his executors full power and authority to convey any portion of his real estate in fee simple, it was held that the wife took only an estate for life defeasible on her remarriage, as otherwise the power of sale would have nothing to operate on.

In Schaeffer v. Messersmith, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 366, where a testator, after giving to his wife, in words which, standing alone, would be held to import a devise in fee simple, certain described real estate and also an annuity, went on to provide that "should she, my wife Mary, marry again at any time after my decease, then and in that case . . . the said above-mentioned annuity of $250, and all the other legacies and bequests hereby by me given or intended her, shall cease and be void to all intents and purposes, anything to the contrary notwithstanding," it was held, in view of the omission from the operative clause of the word "forever," used elsewhere where an absolute gift was clearly contemplated, and the reference throughout the will to the provisions for his wife as "legacies and bequests," and upon the ground that the testator's design was not to prevent the remarriage of his widow, but simply to provide her with the means of support until she should have someone else capable of maintaining and bound to maintain her, and to guard against the employment of his property to maintain the children of the second marriage, by devoting it thereafter to the better provision of his own children,—that the testator meant, not to convey a fee, but simply to limit the estate given the wife to the period of her widowhood.

In Padfield's Estate, 10 Kulp, 184, where a testator made the following provision: "I give, devise and bequeath to my wife Ann, all my property, real, personal and mixed, of what nature and kind soever and wheresoever the same shall be at the time of my death. 2. The above shall continue in force so long as my wife remains a widow. 3. Upon the second marriage I direct that all the property that shall remain with her, such as I willed to her, be equally divided among my four children," it was held that the widow took no more than an estate for life.

In Re Musser, 12 York Leg. Record 145 (as digested in vol. 9 of the General Digest), it was held that where a testator gave his wife the use, benefit, and control of all his estate so long as she should remain his widow, with power to sell, and after her death or marriage the residue to be divided among his heirs, the widow took a life estate with power of consumption and disposition.

In Joyce v. Bode, 74 S. C. 164, 54 S. E. 239, the construction of the following provisions of the will of a rather illiterate testator was in question: "I give, devise and bequeath to my wife Mary Meagher of Charleston and State aforesaid all My Real Estate and Personal Property of which I may die Seized and Possessed of and I Nominate, Constitute and appoint My Wife, Mary Meagher of Charleston and State aforesaid, Executrix of this My last Will and Testament Without Bond as long as she Remains My Widow, but if She gets Married again then her authority must cease and all My Real Estate and Personal Property must be sold and I make the following Bequests: [such bequests being for a monument, the care of cemetery lots, the saying of masses, and for certain charitable purposes] and after My Wifes Death or if She gets Married again then I Nominate, Constitute and appoint the Rev. D. J. Quigley or his Successor Executor of this My last Will and Testament giving him full Power and authority to Sell or any Part of My Estate Real Personal or Mixed and at Such times and Such terms and for Such Purposes as he May deem Well at Public or at Private Sale." It was held that the intention of the testator, as gathered from the various provisions of the will, was to give to the wife but a life estate at most, and that the bequests and the residue were to become operative upon her remarriage or death.

In Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Garrett (S. C.) 67 S. E. 903, it was held, construing the following testamentary provision: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Penelope C. Tucker, so long as she remains a widow, all the other property that I may possess at the time of my death; and in case she never marries again the division of the property among our children shall be according to her will. But in case she marries again, then all my property, except the ten-thousand-dollar policy in the Pledmont Life Insurance Company, shall be equally divided between my children and their heirs, to have and to hold forever,"—that the widow took a life estate defeasible on her marriage, with power of appointment in case she never married again, and, in case of her marriage or in default of appointment, the property was to be equally divided between the children and their heirs.

In Gourley v. Thompson, 2 Sneed, 387, which involved the construction of the following provisions of an obscurely worded will: "It is my will that my wife, Mary H. Parker, and James R. Walsh, is to live on my farm, and, also, Margaret Gourley to remain in the family free from any charge for board. It is my will that if my wife should marry, that she is then to take one half of my estate, and the remainder to go to my lawful heirs," it was held that the estate of the wife was not absolute in the whole property, or any part of it, except in the event of a division in case she should marry, as the reasons and objects of the testator did not require that she should have a greater estate.

In Newman v. Newman, 60 W. Va. 371, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 370, 55 S. E. 377, where a testator directed as follows: "I do hereby authorize my beloved widow to dispose of my property real and personal when it shall be for the benefit of the family and in all cases it shall be legal in law for the benefit of my eight children [naming them]. And the court is not to require security for the faithful discharge as I have unbounded confidence in her virtue and love for the interest of those she is left to protect. Subject however to the possibility that she should become the wife of another man; in that event, she is to surrender my childrens' property as before named to my brother-in-laws [naming them] who I do appoint my Executors in that contingency,"—it was held that the will did not vest in the widow an absolute fee estate, but vested in her a life estate, and created a trust in her as trustee for the benefit of her children.

In Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 291, 26 L. ed. 745, a testator's will contained the following ing sole bequest: "After all my lawful debts are paid and discharged, the residue of my estate, real and personal, I give bequeath and dispose of as follows, to wit: to my beloved wife, Edith J. Dawson, I give and bequeath all my estate, real and personal, of which I may die seised, the same to remain and be hers, with full power, right and authority to dispose of the same, as to her shall seem meet and proper, so long as she shall remain my widow; upon the express condition that, if she shall marry again, then it is my will that all of the estate herein bequeathed, or whatever may remain, shall go to my surviving children, share and share alike; and in case any of my children should have deceased, leaving issue, then the issue so left to receive the share to which said child would be entitled." It was held that it was not the purpose of the testator to devise an estate in fee to his wife, but that he intended to give her an estate for life in his property, subject to be divested on her contracting a second marriage, and, on the determination of the wife's interest, either by her death or marriage, then an estate in fee to his children. The force of this decision is, however, considerably impaired by the case of Roberts v. Lewis, 153 U. S. 367, 38 L. ed. 747, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 945, which involved the construction of the same will, and which, after stating that in the earlier case the effect of certain Nebraska statutes providing that every devise of land should be construed to convey all the devisors' estate therein, unless it should clearly appear that he intended to convey a less estate, and that technical words of inheritance should not be necessary to create or convey an estate in fee simple, was not properly presented for the consideration of the court, refers with approval to the decision of the Nebraska supreme court in Little v. Giles, 25 Neb. 321, 41 N. W. 186, in which it was held that the widow took an estate in fee. It not being necessary, however, to go further than to hold that the widow had power to convey in fee, the court declined to express a positive opinion as to the quantum of estate taken by her.

Although not strictly within the scope of this note, the case of Harlow v. Bailey, 189 Mass. 208, 75 N. E. 259, may be of interest in the present connection. There a testatrix devised to her sister a house "so long as she shall remain unmarried," with authority to the devisee to sell the real estate and "to invest and reinvest safely the proceeds of such sale and to receive and appropriate to her own use the income of such investments so long as she shall remain unmarried." It was held that the devisee did not take a fee, but only a life estate with power of sale, terminable on her marriage.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

T. W. WELLER et al., App'ts.,
v.
J. T. CAMP.

(— Ala. —, 52 So. 929.)

Bailee — hiring team — conversion.

1. One hiring horses to draw castings along a public road does not convert a team by detaching it from the wagon on which it is working, and attaching it to one of his own which has become stalled on a defective road, to assist in getting it out, so as to render him liable for an accident to it while it is so engaged.

Evidence — injury to horse while in possession of bailee — burden of proof.

2. Where a hired horse injured while in possession of the bailee was at the time in charge of a driver furnished by the owner, the bailee is not bound to establish his freedom from negligence in the first instance, but the burden of showing his negligence is on the owner.

Same — opinions — questions for jury.

3. Upon the question of negligence on the part of a bailee of a horse, which resulted in its injury, opinion evidence is not admissible as to whether or not the vehicle was properly loaded and the driver was acting under the direction of the bailee, such questions being for the decision of the jury.

Same — rejected testimony — failure to show relevancy.

4. It is not reversible error to refuse to permit a question to be put to a witness who was a bystander at a time when a horse was injured, as to a remark which he made to the driver, if it is not made to appear that the expected answer would be relevant to any issue in the case.

(May 12, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of a horse. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Note. — Liability of hirer for injury to horse while being used for a purpose other than that for which it was hired.

The use of a hired horse for a longer trip than that contemplated in the contract of hiring will render the hirer liable for loss of or injury to the horse, where such loss or injury was the result of the longer trip. Broussard v. Sells-Floto Show (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 439.

But it has been held that the hirer of a horse, although he violates the contract 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. W. T. Hill and James A. Mitchell, for appellants:

When one hires a horse from another, and, pursuant to the contract of hiring, the owner sends his own servant along to drive the horse while being used for the hirer, the hirer of the horse is not responsible for an injury to it which is caused by the act of the driver.

As the plaintiff's own driver was driving the horse, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the horse was lost or injured through the negligence of the defendants.

Messrs. London & Fitts for appellee.

Sayre, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Posey v. Hair, 12 Ala. 567, it was said that the certainty required in declaration or plea is such a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action or ground of defense, as will enable them to be understood by the party who is to answer them, the jury who are to ascertain their truth, and the court which is to give judgment. The later statute (Code, § 5321), which enjoins brevity as far as consistent with perspicuity, and the presentation of facts in an intelligible form, so that a material issue in law or fact can be taken thereon by the adverse party, has not impaired the substance of the requirement stated in the early cases, though it may be admitted that in some late cases the limit has been reached in permitting the allegation of mere conclusions. No fault is to be found with the complaint in question. It is meritorious as a clear statement of of hiring, is not liable where the loss or injury was not the result of driving the excessive distance. Carney v. Rease, 60 W. Va. 676, 55 S. E. 729.

It was held in Ledbetter v. Thomas, 130 Ala. 299, 30 So. 342, that the hirer of a team of mules was liable for the death of one of them as for a conversion, by reason of their use on a farming implement other than the one for which they were hired, and for a longer period of time.

The earlier cases upon this question will be found in the note to Doolittle v. Shaw, 26 L.R.A. 366.

plaintiff's case without the encumbrance of unnecessary detail, and, as to substance, meets every requirement of early case or later statute.

There is no dispute but that the plaintiff hired to defendants two teams, each consisting of a wagon and two horses, to be used by the defendants in hauling heavy castings between the Lynn Iron Works and defendants' place of business in the city of Birmingham. Defendants were to load and unload the wagons. Plaintiff furnished drivers for his teams. Defendants were to pay for the teams by the hour. At the same time defendants had teams of their own engaged in the same business. All the teams were driven along the customary route between the points indicated. At a point where the paving had been torn up, one of defendants' wagons got into a hole or ditch from which the team was unable to move it. Thereupon the driver of one of plaintiff's teams, who had just had a similar experience at the same place, unhitched his team and took it back to help defendants' team; and because his team would not work in the lead, hitched them to defendants' wagon with defendants' team in the lead. The driver did this of his own initiative, but it is clear that one of the defendants approved and acquiesced. In the effort to extricate the wagon from the hole or ditch, the casting fell from the wagon upon plaintiff's horse, killing it. There was dispute as to whether the accident resulted from the negligent manner in which, according to plaintiff's contention, the casting had been placed upon the wagon, and whether negligence of the driver in the management of his team did not cause or proximately contribute to the result. These matters of dispute became thereby questions for the decision of the jury, and appellee contends that, upon the facts and tendencies detailed, it was a question for the jury whether there had been a conversion of plaintiff's team as alleged in count A of the complaint. And so the court below ruled. But we are of the contrary opinion. Where the owner of a horse lets him to hire for a certain purpose, any material departure from the contemplated use amounts to a conversion for which the bailee will be liable in trover if the horse is injured or destroyed while being so used. 2 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 312. But this rule proceeds upon the principle that the bailee becomes a wrongdoer by putting the horse to a use not within the contemplation of the parties when they entered into the contract of hiring. They must be held to have had in mind such contingencies as may and do naturally occur in the course of the use contracted for, unless specifically excluded. The manner of rightful use to which defendants might put the horse is to be ascertained from the agreement for hire as rationally interpreted. Mr. Schouler, speaking on this subject, remarks that "the leaven of common sense, which keeps our law in constant ferment, is here at work, recalling the injustice of visiting blameworthy and blameless deviation with the same penalties of absolute or insurance accountability. One hires a horse for a given journey, but unexpectedly encounters a friend, and turns off to visit him, using, all the while, a prudent care of the animal; or he finds obstructions in the road, and changes the point of destination to another which must have equally suited his bailor; or he misses his way. Such instances are matters of everyday occurrence." And he suggests that a serviceable defense in such cases lies in a just and reasonable interpretation of the undertaking of bailment itself, which, "if pursued with ordinary prudence, under all the circumstances, ought not to be too literally construed against a bailee who may have found himself in some unforeseen emergency, and, while far from the bailor, obliged to act upon his own judgment. For one who hires may be presumed to have much latitude as to time and methods of enjoyment; and local usage and the good sense of the contract should interpret favorably, where restrictive use was not clearly specified. If hiring be general, any prudent use of the thing is permissible; and even if it be particular, terms not fairly meant for exclusion need not warp the hirer's discretion." Schouler, Bailm. §§ 140, 141. See also Spooner v. Manchester, 133 Mass. 270, 43 Am. Rep. 514. Here the facts were shown without contradiction or contrary inference,—the facts as to which there was dispute not being of consequence in this immediate connection,—and the issue thereupon became one of law for the decision of the court. Assuming the defendants co-operated in the use of the animal charged as a conversion to the extent which would make that use chargeable to them, we are of opinion that their act in temporarily using the horse as one of a team of four instead of as a team of two, to get their wagon over a hard place in the road, under the circumstances shown, did not amount to a tortious breach of the contract of hiring, and that the defendants were entitled to the general charge on the count for trover.

In oral and special written charges, the court told the jury that if the horse was in the possession of the defendants at the time of its injury, the burden rested upon them to show that it had not been injured by their negligence. The court was authorized to assume as facts the bailment, and that the horse was injured while in the possession of the bailees, for as to that there was no dispute. And on these facts, nothing else appearing, the statement of the burden of proof would have been free of fault. Higman v. Camody, 112 Ala. 267, 57 Am. St. Rep. 33, 20 So. 480. But there was a circumstance of material qualification which the charge seems to have overlooked. In proving the bailment the plaintiff proved also, as a part of the contract, an agreement that he was to furnish the driver; and it clearly appeared that he did so. In that situation the presumption must in reason rather be that any injury which came to the animal resulted from the negligence of the driver, if the character of the injury indicated negligence on the part of anyone; for, although the bailee had possession in a certain large and loose sense, that possession was not exclusive. The rule that the burden of proof rests upon a bailee is generally stated of cases in which the bailee has exclusive possession. Collins v. Bennett, 46 N. Y. 490. And it rests upon the consideration that in such cases the facts attending loss or injury must be peculiarly within the bailee's own knowledge. On no other principle can a departure from the rule which requires the plaintiff to make out his case be sustained, and, unless the bailor goes with his property or reserves a certain oversight, as where the owner of a horse rides with the hirer, or the guest at an inn puts his watch under his pillow, or a drover goes on the train with his cattle,—instances mentioned in the books,—the bailee must have peculiar knowledge. Here the bailor sent his own driver. The safety of a team depends most immediately upon the driver, as we know from common experience. The case was the same as if the owner had driven his team, and in such case it seems that common sense and sound law would place the burden of proof upon the plaintiff, as it is ordinarily placed where negligence is charged. Hughes v. Boyer, 9 Watts, 556. There was error in the charges.

Assignments based upon rulings on the admissibility of evidence need not be treated in detail. It will suffice for a proper disposition of the case here to say that those questions which sought to have witnesses state as mere conclusions—such was the effect of a number of them—whether the casting had been so placed upon the dray as that it would probably fall under circumstances which did intervene and which ought to have been foreseen in the exercise of due care, and whether the driver, to whose negligence the jury were free to refer the accident, was acting under the control of the defendants, were, of course, properly disallowed. Those 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

questions the jury were brought to decide upon consideration of the facts in detail.

One ruling may be mentioned. Appellants cite United Teleph. Co. v. Cleveland, 44 Kan. 167, 24 Pac. 49, to prove that a witness who had been a bystander while the driver was endeavoring to get his wagon out of the foundrous place in the street should have been allowed to testify to a remark made by him to the driver. If the witness had called attention to a fact of the situation which ought to have influenced a careful driver in the management of his team, that would have been allowed to go to the jury under the special plea, as evidence of the driver's knowledge of the danger of the situation; but it may well have been that the remark was irrelevant to any issue involved. The question itself afforded no intimation as to the relevancy of the expected answer. The trial court could not be put in error until the party showed that the expected answer would be relevant. The Kansas case contains nothing to the contrary.

For the errors indicated, we are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PERRY J. MASSIE

v.

CHARLES E. CESSNA, Appt.

(239 Ill. 352, 88 N. E. 152.)

Assignment — salary — regulation — validity.

1. A statute making invalid the assignment of any salary unless it is in writing, signed and acknowledged by the assignor and his or her husband or wife, and the as-

Note. — Constitutionality of statute restricting right to assign salary or wages.

This note does not cover the question of the validity of acts regulating the making of contracts, whereby an employee undertakes to accept checks or something other than lawful money in payment for his services.

The cases passing upon the constitutionality of statutes restricting the right to assign one's salary or wages are not numerous. The power, however absolutely, to forbid such right has been upheld.

Thus, in International Text-Book Co. v. Weissinger, 160 Ind. 349, 65 L.R.A. 599, 98 Am. St. Rep. 334, 65 N. E. 521, a statute which forbade altogether the assignment of future earnings of an employee signment entered on the justice's docket and a copy served upon the employer, is invalid as interfering with the constitutional rights of liberty and property of the one earning it.

Same — discrimination.

2. A statute making void assignments of wages or salaries when given as security for loans tainted with usury is invalid where no such provision is made with respect to other instruments or conveyances given to secure such debts.

(April 23, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County canceling certain assignments of wages given him by complainant as security for loans alleged to be tainted with usury, and restraining him from proceeding to enforce any of such assignments. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clark & Clark for appellant.

Messrs. Edgar A. Bancroft and Victor A. Remy, with Messrs. Elmer E. Led-

was held constitutional, and not an unreasonable restraint upon the liberty of the citizen, and it was held, further, not to deprive the citizen of his property without due process of law. The court said: "A large proportion of the persons affected by these statutes of labor are dependent upon their daily or weekly wages for the maintenance of themselves and their families. Delay of payment or loss of wages results in deprivation of the necessities of life, suffering, inability to meet just obligations to others, and, in many cases, may make the wage earner a charge upon the public. The situation of these persons renders them peculiarly liable to imposition and injustice at the hands of employers, unscrupulous tradesmen, and others who are willing to take advantage of their condition. Where future wages may be assigned, the temptation to anticipate their payment, and to sacrifice them for an inadequate consideration, is often very great. Such assignments would, in many cases, leave the laborer or wage earner without present or future means of support. By removing the strongest incentive to faithful service,—the expectation of pecuniary reward in the near future,—their effect would be alike injurious to the laborer and his employer. It is clear that the object of the act of 1899, supra, was the protection of wage earners from oppression, extortion, or fraud on the part of others, and from the consequences of their own weakness, folly, or improvidence. We cannot say that no just ground existed for such legislative interference for so commendable a purpose."

To the same effect is Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Fbersole (Ind.) 87 N. E. 1090.

So, a statute requiring that orders or assignments of wages to be earned in the future, given to secure loans of less than 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

better and M. B. Wellington, for appellee.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal comes directly from the circuit court of Cook county, and presents the question of the constitutionality of the statute of May 13, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 79), entitled "An Act in Relation to the Assignment of Wages, Income, or Salary" (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1908, p. 176), which reads as follows:

"Section 1. No assignment of the wages or salary of any person shall be valid, so as to vest in the assignee any beneficial interest, either at law or in equity, unless such assignment shall be in writing, signed by the assignor and acknowledged in person by the assignor before a justice of the peace in and for the township in which the assignor resides, and entered by such justice upon his docket, and unless, within three days from the date of the execution and acknowledgment of such assignment, a true

$200, be accepted in writing by the employer, and in case of a married assignor that the written consent of the wife be obtained, and providing, further, that the assignment be recorded, has been held constitutional as a proper exercise of the police power. Mutual Loan Co. v. Martell, 200 Mass. 482, — L.R.A.(N.S.) — 128 Am. St. Rep. 446, 86 N. E. 916.

And such statute is not unconstitutional as an unlawful discrimination because it deals only with security for loans, and does not include security for other debts. Ibid.

And a provision exempting national banks and banking institutions under the supervision of the bank commissioner, and loan associations established by special charters, from the operation of the act, does not render it invalid as denying the equal protection of the law to other lenders, where there was reason for the legislature to believe that the institutions mentioned need not be subjected to such regulations in order to protect the interests of employees or employers. Ibid.

And in McCallum v. Simplex Electrical Co. 197 Mass. 388, 83 N. E. 1108, it was held that there was no doubt as to the constitutionality of a statute providing that "no assignment of future earnings, whether made by the assignor in person or by his attorney, shall be valid unless executed in writing, for a period not exceeding two years from the date of said assignment, or of any power of attorney under which said assignment is made."

Generally, as to validity of assignment of wages or salary to be earned, see note in 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 565, and later case, Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Provolt, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 587.

and complete copy of said assignment and of the certificate of its acknowledgment shall be served upon the person, firm, or corporation from whom such wages or salary is due or is to become due, in the same manner that the summons in chancery is now required by law to be served: Provided, further, that no assignment of wages or salary by a married person shall be valid unless the same is also executed and acknowledged as above, by the assignor's wife or husband, as the case may be.

"Sec. 2. The term 'assignment,' as used in this act, shall include every assignment, transfer, sale, pledge, mortgage, or hypothecation, however made or attempted, of the wages or salary of any person, or of any interest therein.

"Sec. 3. Whenever any assignment of the wages or salary of any person or persons shall be given as security for a loan tainted with usury, or shall be given to secure the payment or fulfillment of a usurious contract, or the payment of the principal or the interest of a usurious debt, such assignment shall be absolutely void.

"Sec. 4. Every assignment of wages to be earned in whole or in part more than six (6) months from and after the making of such assignment shall be absolutely void.

"Sec. 5. Whenever any person, firm, or corporation shall bring or threaten to bring any action or suit to enforce any assignment of wages or salary which has not been duly executed, acknowledged, and served upon the employer in conformity with the provisions of this act, or which is declared invalid by the provisions of this act, courts of equity shall have full power, upon the application either of the assignor of such wages or salary, or of the person, firm, or corporation from whom such wages or salary is, or is to become due, to perpetually enjoin the threatened or attempted enforcement of any such assignment, and the fact that the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law shall constitute no defense to the maintenance of a suit in equity for the purposes aforesaid.

"Sec. 6. The invalidity of any portion of this act shall not affect the validity of any other portion thereof which can be given effect without such invalid part."

The appellee filed his bill for an injunction against the appellant, alleging that he had been for a number of years continuously in the employ of the Inter-Ocean Newspaper Company; that about twelve years ago he commenced a course of dealing with the appellant, who loaned money to wage earners and salaried people at exorbitant, illegal, and usurious rates of interest, which dealings had continued until the present time, and all of which had been usurious; 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that he had upon a number of occasions borrowed from appellant certain sums of money at 10 per cent interest per month, and had repaid to appellant, by way of interest and other moneys, many large sums for which he had received no credit upon the principal, which sums greatly exceeded the amount of money borrowed, together with legal interest thereon; that there were executed by appellee, at various times, assignments of his wages as security for the payment of the several usurious loans, all of which assignments appellant now holds and has threatened to file with appellee's employer, thereby intending to compel appellee to comply with appellant's unlawful and usurious demands. The bill further alleges that in February, 1907, as a transaction wholly separate and apart from the previous dealings with appellant, the appellee borrowed $25, for the use of which he agreed to pay $2.50 per month as interest until said sum was repaid, and he executed to appellant an assignment of wages to be earned until August 18, 1908, as security for the payment of said sum and interest; that this assignment was given as security for a loan tainted with usury, and was never acknowledged in person nor before a justice of the peace nor before any person or official whatsoever, so that, by reason of the statute in such case provided, it is not valid; that appellant has filed with the Inter-Ocean Newspaper Company a copy of this assignment, and now threatens to bring suit to enforce the same, which would result in great and irreparable injury to the complainant; and the appellant, Cessna, will bring said suit unless restrained from so doing. The prayer of the bill was that all of said assignments of wages now in the hands of the appellant or his agents be canceled, and appellant enjoined from proceeding in any manner to enforce any of said assignments. A demurrer to the bill having been overruled, the defendant elected to stand by his demurrer, and a decree was entered in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

The appellant insists that the statute in question violates § 2 of article 2 of the Constitution of the state, which provides that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." This is the only question for consideration, as the averments of the bill with reference to transactions prior to that of February, 1907, are too indefinite to show the existence of any equity in favor of appellee.

The right to labor for and to render services to another, and the right to dispose of the compensation to be received for so doing, are property rights within the meaning of the language just quoted from the Constitution. Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L.R.A. 492, 31 N. E. 395; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L.R.A. 340, 37 Am. St. Rep. 206, 35 N. E. 62; Mallin v. Wenham, 209 Ill. 252, 65 L.R.A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 233, 70 N. E. 564. It is at once apparent, upon an examination of this statute, that it abridges the right of the man who earns a salary and the right of the man who earns wages to contract with reference thereto. Notwithstanding this fact, appellee contends that the act in question is not prohibited by the Constitution, for the reason that it is referable to the police power of the state. The laws which the legislature may enact in the exercise of that power are laws which have a tendency to promote the public comfort, health, safety, morals, or welfare, or which have a tendency to prevent some recognized evil or wrong. Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 20 L.R.A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315, 40 N. E. 454; Chicago v. Netcher, 183 Ill. 104, 48 L.R.A. 261, 75 Am. St. Rep. 93, 55 N. E. 707; Noel v. People, 187 Ill. 587, 52 L.R.A. 287, 79 Am. St. Rep. 238, 58 N. E. 616; People v. Steele, 231 Ill. 340, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 361, 121 Am. St. Rep. 321, 83 N. E. 236.

It is urged that wage earners compose a class of inhabitants of the state who, when they desire to borrow money and secure the same by the assignment of their wages earned or to be earned, become victims of men engaged in the business of loaning money at usurious rates, who are commonly denominated "loan sharks;" that when the wage earner finds it necessary to borrow money upon such security, he is unable to deal with the money lender upon an even footing; that the latter is able to exact usury, and to practise various like wrongs and impositions upon him by reason of his poverty, and sometimes by reason of his improvidence; and that this creates a condition of affairs which the legislature may remedy by the exercise of the police power. While we think this evil exists, it is yet apparent, upon a careful examination of this statute, that it is too broad in its terms to be justified as an exercise of the police power for the purpose of mitigating or remedying the wrong at which it is aimed. It applies not only to wages, but also to salaries. "Wages," in its ordinary acceptation, has a less extensive meaning than "salary." "Wages" is usually restricted to sums paid as hire or reward to domestic or menial servants and to sums paid to artisans, mechanics, laborers, and others employed in various manual occupations, while "salary" has reference to the compensation of clerks, bookkeepers, other employees of like class, officers of corporations, and public officers. 2 Standard Dict. p. 1573; Re Stryker, 158 N. Y. 520, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489, 53 N. E. 525. In this state salaries in excess of $5,000 per annum are not unusual. It cannot be said that an officer of a corporation who is in the enjoyment of a salary of $20,000 per annum is or may be the victim of the evil at which this statute is aimed, and yet his salary is plainly within the terms of the act. Counsel for appellee intimate that a bank president or the head of a great commercial enterprise requires the same protection in this respect as a wage earner. We have not been able to regard this suggestion as seriously made. A bank president who desires to borrow money does not need protection from a "loan shark," unless he be mentally deficient or morally delinquent. A very limited exercise of the power of observation is sufficient to demonstrate that, as a borrower, he is not in the same class as the laborer who works for $2 per day.

This statute, in so far as it would tend to make effective the right of the wage earner to receive the full benefit of the wages earned by him, is like unto the statute which prefers laborers' and servants' claims in certain instances, like unto the statute which provides that no personal property shall be exempt from execution issued for the collection of the wages of any laborer or servant, and like unto the statute which provides that, in a suit brought by "a mechanic, artisan, miner, laborer, or servant or employee," for his or her "wages" earned and due, the plaintiff may, under certain conditions, recover, in addition to the wages, an attorney's fee for the prosecution of the suit. It is to be observed that these statutes all pertain to wages, and not salaries. The statute last above referred to is the act of June 1, 1889. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1908, p. 192, chap. 13, § 13. Its validity has been assailed upon the ground that it is special legislation, conferring a right upon persons therein specified to attorney's fees, that was not given to other persons; but this court held that the enumeration, which is broad enough to include all wage earners, and which includes none but wage earners, is an enumeration of persons composing a class, upon which the right given by the statute might be conferred without violation of the Constitution. Vogel v. Pekoc, 157 Ill. 339, 30 L.R.A. 491, 42 N. E. 386. We have recently referred to that case with approval. Manowsky v. Stephan, 233 Ill. 409, 84 N. E. 365. The reasoning of the Vogel Case would seem to lead to the conclusion that wage earners are the proper objects of leg-isolation which would tend to protect them from the evil which this statute is designed to obviate. Such an act would not be rendered invalid by the fact that it placed reasonable regulations upon the right to assign wages to secure an indebtedness, and prescribed a reasonable method to be pursued in making the assignment effective. It has been recently so held by the supreme court of Massachusetts in reference to the sections of a statute regulating the assignment of wages. Mutual Loan Co. v. Martell, 200 Mass. 482, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 128 Am. St. Rep. 446, 86 N. E. 916. It is true that many persons who are salaried receive compensation not greater in amount, by the month or year, than the compensation received by many wage earners. Whether a statute protecting a salary not greater in amount than a certain sum per week or month, or protecting a portion of a salary which portion is not greater than a certain sum per month or week, would be valid, is a question not here presented.

The statute now under consideration is invalid because it violates the provision of our Constitution which has been invoked, by limiting the right of persons earning the higher salaries to assign or transfer their salaries in such manner as they see fit; there being nothing in the public policy of the state requiring or warranting such abridgment of their right, and nothing requiring or warranting a statute giving to such persons the benefit that might with entire propriety be given to wage earners by an act in reference to the assignment of wages. The third section of this statute is unconstitutional for the further reason that it makes the assignment given as security for a loan tainted with usury void, while the law of the state makes no such provision with reference to other instruments or other conveyances given to secure usurious debts. We also point out the fact that it is extremely doubtful whether the act in its entirety could in any event be made effective in the city of Chicago, for the reason that it requires the assignment to be acknowledged before a justice of the peace in and for the township in which the assignor resides, and entered by such justice upon his docket; there being now no justices of the peace in that city, and no law requiring the keeping of such a docket as that which the justice of the peace formerly kept.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Cook County will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the bill.

Vickers and Dunn, JJ., specially concurring:

We concur in holding the statute unconstitutional. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

stitutional, but not in the implication that it would be constitutional if restricted to wage earners, if the opinion contains such implication.

RE ESTATE OF HARRIET G. McVICKER, Deceased.

LORD CLARENCE H. E. ZEIGLER, Claimant, Appt.,
v.

ILLINOIS TRUST & SAVINGS BANK,
Exr., etc., of Harriet G. McVicker, Deceased.

(245 Ill. 180, 91 N. E. 1041.)

Appeal — reviewing facts — claim against estate.

1. The appellate court, having no jurisdiction to review facts in an action at law, cannot review the facts upon appeal from the allowance of a claim against a decedent's estate, where the claim is for a legal demand and no defense is made which could not have been interposed in a suit at law.

Trial — finding — law or fact.

2. A finding that a written contract is void as against public policy is one of law, and not of fact.

Evidence — public policy.

3. In determining the public policy of a state, courts are limited to a consideration

Note. — Validity of contract to furnish a patient medical services for life.

A careful search has disclosed but one other case involving the legality of an agreement between a physician and his patient by which the former agrees to render his services to the latter for life, and in that case the court granted relief from such a contract. Dent v. Bennett, 7 Sim. 539 (s. c. on appeal, 4 Myl. & C. 278). The opinion of the vice-chancellor upon the legality of the contract was expressed as follows: "It is plain that the existence of such an agreement is a direct premium to the medical adviser to accelerate that death upon the happening of which he is to have £25,000, and it is in vain to say that in fact it did happen that the party who was to give the £25,000 did live four or five years after the agreement. You must look at the agreement as it stood at the time it was made; and it must be admitted that the human mind is so constituted as that this agreement might be a temptation to some persons to do the very thing which it is obvious it was the duty of the party who took the agreement not to do; and my deliberate opinion is that it is totally void in point of law for that reason."

As to contracts for permanent employment and similar agreements, see note in 35 L.R.A. 512.

of the statutes, Constitution, judicial decisions, and practice of government officers.

Contract — medical services — validity.

4. A contract to furnish one medical attendance during life for a lump sum payable at his death is not void as against public policy, either because furnishing an inducement to threaten his life or as a wagering contract.

Pleading — defense — fraudulent character of contract.

5. That a contract between physician and patient is presumptively fraudulent may be interposed as a defense in an action at law to enforce it.

Contract — physician and patient — independent advice.

6. A physician who enters into a contract with his patient is not bound, in order to sustain the validity of the contract, to show that the patient had independent and competent advice before executing the contract.

Probate — trial — deposition.

7. Depositions may be used in the consideration by the probate court of claims against a decedent's estate, where the statutes provide for the taking of depositions in suits at law and that contested claims shall be tried in the probate court as other suits at law.

Trial — assent to procedure — effect.

8. One offering a deposition against a claim in the probate court cannot complain that depositions are admitted in support of the claim.

Physician — contract for services — performance where he is unlicensed.

9. A physician duly licensed in the state where the contract is made cannot be deprived of the benefit of the contract to furnish medical attendance to a patient by the fact that he temporarily accompanies the patient into a state where he has no license and performs some services for the patient there.

Contract — medical attendance — refusal to change location — effect.

10. A contract to furnish medical attendance to a person is not broken by refusal to accompany him to another state, where the contract was made at his permanent place of residence contains nothing to indicate any intention of a change of domicile.

A PPEAL by claimant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First Division, reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in his favor in an action brought to establish a claim against the estate of Harriet G. McVicker, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Cooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Dr. L. C. H. E. Zeigler, filed a claim in the probate court of Cook county against the estate of Harriet G. McVicker for $110,000, which consisted of three items, the first being for $100,000, based on two written contracts, or, in the alternative, for reasonable compensation as a physician for services and medical attention from December 19, 1899, to April 30, 1904; and the second and third for $5,000 each, claimed to be due on an oral contract. The probate court allowed the second and third items, but refused to allow the first. The appropriate order was entered, from which both the executor and the claimant appealed to the circuit court. There the two appeals were consolidated and tried as one before a jury. The jury returned a verdict for the claimant for $100,000. The court entered judgment for this amount and for costs, to be paid in due course of administration. From this judgment, the executor appealed to the appellate court for the first district, where the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, with 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) a finding of fact that "the contracts in evidence of December 19, 1899, and of July 24, 1901, are void, as being against sound public policy." From this judgment the claimant has prosecuted a further appeal to this court.

The facts as disclosed on the trial in the circuit court are as follows: The appellant is a physician and surgeon and was licensed to practise medicine in this state on January 17, 1899. He is also engaged in the practice of osteopathy. On April 24, 1899, he leased three rooms in the McVicker Theatre building, in the city of Chicago, from Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, which, so far as the evidence discloses, was the first time he had ever met her. These rooms, which adjoined a room used by Mrs. McVicker as an office, were used by Dr. Zeigler as his office. Mrs. McVicker's exact age is not given, but it appears that at that time she was about seventy-eight or seventy-nine years of age. She had been a sufferer from various maladies, among them being ailments of the heart, stomach, and kidneys, an affliction which caused a stiffness of the knee joints, and some disease peculiar to her sex. She employed Dr. Zeigler, and he began treating her some time during the month of October, 1899. Shortly thereafter one John Janes, now deceased, who was a friend of many years' standing of Mrs. McVicker, presented to appellant, on her behalf, a contract executed by her, whereby appellant was to be paid out of her estate, after her death, the sum of $100,000, in ten equal annual instalments, in consideration of appellant giving her such medical attention as she should require during the remainder of her lifetime. Appellant objected to the instalment plan of payment, and to other features of the instrument, and refused to execute or accept it. On December 19, 1899, appellant and Mrs. McVicker executed a contract which provided that appellant should give her such medical attention as she should require during her lifetime, and at her death should be paid the sum of $100,000 out of her estate. This was executed by Mrs. McVicker by the name of "Mrs. J. H. McVicker." Some time thereafter Dr. Zeigler was advised to have the contract re-executed, on account of the fact that Mrs. McVicker, in executing it, had used the initials of her deceased husband instead of her own name. Mrs. McVicker agreed to do this. On July 17, 1901, she sent for Rev. William F. Black, who had been a friend of her husband in his lifetime and whose custom it was to make weekly calls on Mrs. McVicker, to consult with him about the contract. John Janes was the only other person present on this occasion. Rev. Black gave it as his opinion that the contract was properly executed as it was, but Janes advised the change. Mrs. McVicker insisted upon the writing of a preamble to the rewritten contract, explaining her reasons for executing it anew. This she dictated to Janes, who took it down. This was later returned to Mrs. McVicker by Janes, and a comparison made with the original contract. Appellant was not present on these two occasions. A typewritten copy was then made of the new contract, and the same was executed by Mrs. McVicker and the appellant in the room of the former at the Lexington Hotel on July 24, 1901, in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Emil Linder, friends of both appellant and Mrs. McVicker, who had been invited by her to come there for that purpose. With the exception of the explanatory part, this contract was identical in language with the contract of December 19, 1899, and is as follows:

Chicago, Illinois, July 24th, 1901.

This agreement or contract by and between Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker of Chicago, Illinois, of the first part, and L. C. H. E. Zeigler, M. D., of Chicago, Illinois, of the second part, witnesseth: That the first party, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, first entered into this agreement or contract with Dr. Zeigler, party of the second part, on the 19th day of December, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine (December 19th, 1899). The original contract will be found hereto attached. A second contract was thought to be necessary because of the signature of the first and original contract being signed Mrs. J. H. McVicker instead of Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker. That the party of the second part, having been advised to have the signature changed from Mrs. J. H. McVicker to Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, presented the first and original instrument to the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, for the purpose of getting her consent in its being changed. On being apprised of the possibility of some legal technicality, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, party of the first part, immediately acquiesced and caused this, the second contract, to be drawn, which contains the material and relevant clauses of the first and original contract, drawn December 19th, 1899; that the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, being aware that some unscrupulous persons have conspired to ruin the doctor's good reputation and business, willingly and unhesitatingly causes the change in signature; that the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, was necessitated to have Honorable William E. Hughes to call at her home and investigate the legal aspect of the terrible and cruel conspiracy against Dr. Zeigler.

ler, led by Mr. L. D. Condee, Miss Jennie Boydston, Mrs. William Cox, Mr. George Graves, Mrs. Mack, with an eye singled to have Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, party of the first part, to discontinue the services of the party of the second part, L. C. H. E. Zeigler, M. D.; that the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, had letters presented to her purporting to be from certain individuals, which, when thoroughly scrutinized and their contents carefully questioned of Mr. L. D. Condee by Honorable William E. Hughes, it was deduced by Mr. Condee's own confession that they had been forged, and not written by the persons whom he at first declared had written them and delivered same in person. To the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, to have discontinued the professional services of the party of the second part, L. C. H. E. Zeigler, M. D., would have been equivalent to the canceling of the original contract existing between first and second parties, which is hereto attached, and for which result each of these persons did wrongfully, cruelly conspire. Knowing this by confession from Mr. Condee, also by letter received from him, the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, for truth, justice, and right, has made the second contract, in order to avoid the underhandedness of these unscrupulous persons. Persons that the party of the first part have conversed with in reference to this matter are: Mr. William E. Hughes, Rev. W. F. Black, Mr. N. E. Pearse, Mrs. N. E. Pearse, Mrs. J. I. Case, Mr. Emil Linder, Mr. James McInerney.

Contract.

That the party of the first part, Mrs. Harriet G. McVicker, does enter into an agreement and contract for the professional services to be rendered by the party of the second part, L. C. H. E. Zeigler, M. D., at any time or place, during any spell of indisposition which I may be subjected to during the remainder of my natural lifetime; that in the event of sickness such methods are to be employed or adopted as seem best and most expedient; all medicines or other paraphernalia necessary to the discharge of duties in cases of indisposition are to be provided by Dr. Zeigler; that when the critical moment comes, when it is thought that I may pass out, Dr. Zeigler may call the physician or physicians as his judgment may dictate; that the sum which I voluntarily contract to pay for the services thus rendered is to be $100,000 (one hundred thousand dollars), payable immediately, or as soon as possible, by my estate, which I leave in trust with the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank.

In witness thereof the parties hereto have set their hands and seals July 24th, 1901.

It is uncontradicted that from the time of the execution of the first contract until the death of Mrs. McVicker at Pasadena, California, August 25, 1904, the appellant attended her constantly, reserving for her exclusively, before going to California, his time from 8 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock A. M. of each day, and giving her the right to demand his attention at all other times to the exclusion of his other patients. In October, 1900, Mrs. McVicker removed from her residence in Chicago to the Lexington Hotel, and, at her request, Dr. Zeigler took up his residence there also. In April, 1904, she went to California, accompanied by the doctor, and remained there until the time of her death. A number of witnesses testified that Mrs. McVicker had stated that, in order to induce Dr. Zeigler to go with her to California, she had agreed to pay him $5,000 per annum and $5,000 for expenses, in addition to her written contract. This oral agreement was the basis of items 2 and 3 of the claim. After the execution of the first contract, on December 19, 1899, Mrs. McVicker talked with a great many of her friends about the contract and the satisfactory results appellant was accomplishing by his treatment. Prior to that time she had been treated by various eminent physicians, and, according to her oft-repeated statements, with but little success. She repeatedly referred to her contract with appellant when talking to her friends, and stated many times that he had earned the amount agreed to be paid. She gave or offered to him on several occasions large sums of money or checks for large sums, in addition to and independent of the contract, but these were all either refused or returned. On October 29, 1903, in the presence of Linder and his wife, she offered appellant $100,000 in bank certificates of deposit, as in full payment of the contract, stating that she did so for the reason she feared he might have trouble about it after her death. Appellant refused the certificates on the ground that payment at that time would not be in accordance with the contract. She afterwards expressed regret to a number of her friends that the doctor had thus declined to accept payment under the contract during her lifetime. Mrs. McVicker was a cultured and educated woman, and it is uncontroverted that her mental faculties were unimpaired up until the time of her death. She had large business interests and gave them her personal attention and supervision. She is described by all the witnesses who testified on that point as shrewd and as having exceptional business qualifications, as a woman of strong mentality, not easily influenced and accustomed to having her own way. Her only heirs at law were two nieces—one, Minnie Effey, the daughter of a deceased brother, and the other, Clara Belle Game, the daughter of a deceased sister. It is stipulated that at the time of her death her estate consisted of property of the value of $270,000. By her last will and testament she made various small bequests amounting to about the sum of $22,000, and devised the residue of her estate in trust to the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, directing that it pay three fourths of the net revenue therefrom semi-annually to one Horace McVicker, and the remaining one fourth semi-annually to her niece Clara Belle Game, who resided in San Francisco, California. The will further provided that, upon the death of Horace McVicker, three fourths of the residue of the estate should be paid to his heirs at law, and, upon the death of Clara Belle Game, one fourth of the residue was to be paid to her children then living. No provision whatever was made in the will for the niece Minnie Effey.

The record, abstracts, and briefs are all quite voluminous, and both appellant and appellee have presented a large number of points in support of their contentions. We have carefully considered all the points raised and the authorities cited, and will discuss briefly those which, in our judgment, are controlling in the matters in controversy.

It is contended on the part of appellant that this is a suit at law, and for that reason the facts are not open to review in this court, while the appellee insists that, as the probate court and the circuit court upon appeal were required to exercise equitable jurisdiction and to resort to equitable procedure, the case partakes of the nature of a chancery proceeding, and this court should review the facts as well as the law. In Grier v. Cable, 159 Ill. 29, 42 N. E. 395, we held that the prosecution of a claim against an estate in the probate court was in no proper sense a suit or proceeding at law or in chancery, but was purely a statutory proceeding, and for that reason an appeal from the judgment of the probate court allowing or disallowing the claim did not lie, under the statute, to the appellate court, but to the circuit court. Upon final appeal to this court, from the judgment of the circuit court allowing or disallowing a claim against an estate, this court will examine into the nature of the claim and the defenses to it, for the purpose of determining whether it has the power to review the facts. In a claim based on purely legal demands, and where there are no equitable defenses and the probate court is not required to exercise its chancery powers, the judgment of the appellate court is conclusive upon this court as to the controverted facts in the case; but, in the adjustment of claims where the probate court exercises an equitable jurisdiction and resorts to equitable procedure, upon an appeal to this court it is our duty to examine and determine questions of fact as well as of law. Hobbs v. Ferguson, 100 Ill. 232; Belleville Sav. Bank v. Bornman, 124 Ill. 200, 16 N. E. 210; Cheney v. Roodhouse, 135 Ill. 257, 25 N. E. 1019; Bliss v. Seaman, 165 Ill. 422, 46 N. E. 279; Henry v. Caruthers, 196 Ill. 136, 63 N. E. 629; Starrett v. Brosseau, 208 Ill. 408, 70 N. E. 354; Schell v. Weaver, 225 Ill. 159, 80 N. E. 95, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 339; Clemens v. Crane, 234 Ill. 215, 84 N. E. 884. In this case the claim filed was for a legal demand, and, as no defense was made which could not have been interposed in a suit at law, the probate court did not exercise its equitable jurisdiction. The facts, therefore, are not reviewable here. This question is not of controlling importance in this case, for the reason that there is no conflict in the evidence on any material point. In fact, appellee made but little proof, and none whatever upon any material question of fact involved, but relied wholly upon questions of law. Upon the only questions of fact necessary to be proven to sustain the claim, the evidence of appellant stands uncontradicted and tends to support the claim.

In its judgment the appellate court found, as a question of fact, that upon the allegations and proofs in the record the contracts of December 19, 1899, and of July 24, 1901, are void, as being against sound public policy. This finding is not one of fact, but of law. A similar finding was made by the appellate court in Brush v. Carbondale, 229 Ill. 144, 82 N. E. 252, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 121, and, in passing upon that question, we said: "The view of the appellate court seems to have been that the question whether the contract alleged in the declaration was contrary to public policy and void was one of fact. But that is not so." In the Brush Case the contract was oral, but, as the facts were conceded, its interpretation, as in the case of written contracts, became a question of law for the court. In this case the contract is a written one, and its construction does not depend upon any extrinsic fact. Its interpretation, therefore, is a question of law.

The position of appellee is that the original and confirmatory contract entered into between Mrs. McVicker and Dr. Zeigler are void, as against public policy, for the reasons, first, that they furnish an incentive to the commission of a crime; and, second, that they substantially form a wager on the length and continuance of the life of Mrs. McVicker. There is no precise definition of public policy, and consequently no absolute rule by which a contract can be measured or tested to determine whether or not it is contrary to public policy. Each case, as it arises, must be judged and determined according to its own peculiar circumstances. The public policy of the state or of the nation is to be found in its Constitution and its statutes, and when cases arise concerning matters upon which they are silent, then in its judicial decisions and the constant practice of the government officials. Bell v. Farwell, 176 Ill. 489, 42 L.R.A. 804, 68 Am. St. Rep. 194, 52 N. E. 346; Harding v. American Glucose Co. 182 Ill. 551, 64 L.R.A. 738, 74 Am. St. Rep. 189, 55 N. E. 577; Brush v. Carbondale, supra; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 L.R.A. 193, 17 C. C. A. 62, 36 U. S. App. 152, 70 Fed. 201; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205; United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540. Courts will not look to other sources to determine the public policy of a state. As was said in Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra: "The public policy of a state or nation must be determined by its Constitution, laws, and judicial decisions,—not by the varying opinions of laymen, lawyers, or judges as to the demands of the interest of the public." That the contract in question does not, in any of its expressed provisions, violate the Constitution or any statute of this state, does not admit of argument. The making of such a contract is not prohibited either by the express terms or any fair implication of the Constitution or of any statute of the state. Neither do we deem it to be contrary to the judicial decisions of the state. The laws and the public policy of the state permit and require the utmost freedom of contracting between competent parties, and it is only when a contract expressly contravenes the law or the known public policy of the state that courts will hold it void.

It is urged that this contract is void chiefly for the reason that it furnished an incentive to appellant to shorten the life of Mrs. McVicker by neglect or improper treatment or by the commission of the crime of murder. Each argument made by appellee in support of this contention involves a breach of the contract, and is not founded on the performance of it. It cannot be seriously contended but that, in order to comply with the terms of this contract and be entitled to receive the benefits of it, the appellant was bound to give Mrs. McVicker the best treatment within his power and skill, and to prolong her life as long as possible. Should he fail to do this, either through neglect by wilfully treating her in an improper manner or by directly causing her death, appellant would be unable to recover upon the contract. There can be no doubt that a contract to commit murder or any other crime, or a contract to give a reward to one for the commission of a crime, is void, as against public policy. This contract does not contemplate the commission of a crime, or the doing of anything which is unlawful or contrary to good public morals. Even if it be conceded that the contract, under its terms, offered some incentive to appellant to commit a crime, that would not necessarily render it void. "Where the parties to a contract do not contemplate the commission of any crime, the fact that the contract offers an incentive to do so will not render it illegal. This is well shown in contracts in which the benefit to accrue to one of the parties is conditioned on the death of the other party, thereby giving the former an interest in the death of the latter." 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 938. "That it is competent for a party to stipulate for the disposition of his property at the time of his decease is too well settled to admit of doubt or question." Jenkins v. Stetson, 9 Allen, 128; Howe v. Watson, 179 Mass. 30, 60 N. E. 415. "It is not contended . . . that a contract founded on a sufficient consideration, to make a certain provision by will for a particular person, is invalid in law. The contrary is well settled." Wellington v. Apthorp, 145 Mass. 69, 13 N. E. 10. "The owner of property may make a valid enforceable contract binding himself not to dispose of his property by will, and binding himself to permit his possessions to descend according to the laws of intestacy." Jones v. Abbott, 228 Ill. 34, 119 Am. St. Rep. 412, 81 N. E. 791.

There have been numerous decisions involving contracts entered into whereby one party has agreed that upon his death his property, or certain specific portions of it, shall go to and become the property of the other party for considerations named, being usually the caring for and maintaining of the grantor during his or her lifetime by the other party; or whereby one party conveyed his property to the other for the consideration of the care, maintenance, and support of the grantor during the remainder of his or her natural life; and these contracts have universally been held to be valid and binding. In every such case, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the incentive to hasten the death of the grantor was present to the same extent as in this case. While such contracts are usually made between parent and child, or between others closely related by blood ties, they have been frequently made between persons who bear no blood relationship to one another, and no distinction has been made by the courts on that ground. In a recent decision, this court held that complainant was entitled to a decree for specific performance against the administrator and heirs of a deceased person who had in his lifetime contracted with complainant orally that, if she would take care of him and provide him with a home as long as he lived, he would give her the house and lot which she was then occupying and which belonged to him; the contract having been fully performed by her upon the death of the promisor. In that case there was no blood or marriage relationship between the contracting parties. Anderson v. Manners, 243 Ill. 405, 90 N. E. 728. In this state litigation growing out of the execution of such contracts has usually arisen on account of the nonperformance of the grantee, but in no case has the validity of such contracts been questioned, and their validity has in every instance been recognized by this court. Frazier v. Miller, 16 Ill. 48; Oard v. Oard, 59 Ill. 46; Jones v. Neely, 72 Ill. 449; Kusch v. Kusch, 143 Ill. 353, 32 N. E. 267; Cooper v. Gum, 152 Ill. 471, 39 N. E. 267; McClelland v. McClelland, 176 Ill. 83, 51 N. E. 559; Stebbins v. Petty, 209 Ill. 291, 101 Am. St. Rep. 243, 70 N. E. 673; Fabrice v. Von der Brelie, 190 Ill. 460, 60 N. E. 835; Calkins v. Calkins, 220 Ill. 111, 77 N. E. 102. It is therefore not contrary to public policy to contract to devise property or to refrain from devising property, for a consideration; or to contract that property shall pass at once or at the decease of the grantor to the other party to the contract, in consideration of the support, care, and maintenance of the grantor during the remainder of his natural life by the other contracting party. So far as the question of an incentive to the commission of a crime is concerned, we perceive no difference between such contracts and the one here involved.

The contention that this contract is void for the reason that it is a wagering contract is not well founded. As we view it, it has none of the elements which would bring it within the designation of a wagering contract. There is a sufficient consideration moving between the parties to support it.

It is contended, further, by appellee that the fiduciary relation of physician and patient having existed between appellant and Mrs. McVicker at the time of the execution of the original and supplemental contracts, they are presumptively fraudulent and prima facie void. This is the defense which appellee claims required the probate court to exercise its equitable powers. While this contention would constitute grounds upon which to seek affirmative relief in equity, it is one which may be interposed as a defense in an action at law, and, when so interposed, its effect is merely to shift the burden of proof. So, in this case the interposition of this defense made it necessary for appellant to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Mrs. McVicker entered into this transaction voluntarily, deliberately, and advisedly, knowing its nature and effect, and that her consent was not obtained by reason of the power and influence to which the relationship between herself and appellant might be supposed to give rise.

Appellee contends that the burden was not only upon appellant to prove the fairness of the contract and that it was entered into voluntarily and advisedly by Mrs. McVicker, but that it devolved upon him also to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that she had independent and competent advice before she executed the contract. While the burden was upon appellant by reason of the confidential relations existing between him and Mrs. McVicker, to show by competent proof that the contracts were not executed as the result of undue influence, he is not held to the strict rule contended for by appellee. "To render such a transaction valid, it is only necessary to show that the other party had competent and disinterested advice, or that he performed the act or entered into the transaction voluntarily, deliberately, and advisedly, knowing its nature and effect, and that his consent was not obtained by reason of the power and influence to which the relation might be supposed to give rise." Uhlich v. Muhlke, 61 Ill. 499; Herr v. Payson, 157 Ill. 244, 41 N. E. 732. The jury was instructed upon this theory, and the instructions so given were proper.

It is contended by appellee that the trial court erred in allowing depositions of witnesses taken on the part of appellant to be read as evidence on the trial, for the reason, as it claims, that there is no authority, under the statute, for the taking of depositions in the probate court in the matter of any claim there pending. The act on evidence and depositions provides for the taking of depositions of witnesses in suits at law and in suits in chancery. Appellee, relying upon the doctrine as laid down by this court in Grier v. Cable, 159 Ill. 29, 42 N. E. 395, insists that, as this proceeding is neither a suit at law or in chancery, the 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)
